CHARLESTON, September 24, 1787.

DEAR MAJOR:

The receipt of your kind favor, by Mr. Barrel, afforded me the greatest satisfaction, and can assure you that I should have been happy in obliging not only that gentleman, but any person whom you would please to recommend to my attention. The disgust he has taken at the southern country, and his consequent short stay among us, deprive me of the pleasure of serving him as I would wish. Not many days have elapsed since my arrival from the Western waters, on particular business to this city. My intention is to return immediately to the state of Franklin, in which case I hope to see you before long. I have informed Mr. Barrel that I should have been happy in his company, but he is totally unprepared, either in baggage or horses, for a march beyond the Alleghany mountains. Though a good young man, he seems not only to be unfit for such a service, but is totally unacquainted with the country in general. I thank you for your opinion concerning certain matters. There is no part of the continent where you could live more at your ease than in Franklin. I would advise you, therefore, (previous to bringing on your family) to come southward by the first opportunity, and secure a body of land for yourself on the Tennessee river. There will be work cut out for you in that country. I want you much. By—, take my word for it that we will be speedily in possession of New Orleans. I particularly request that this letter may not extend beyond your own persona. Adieu.

JOHN SULLIVAN.

P. S. Write me immediately what you mean to do, and enclose your letters to Major Washington, of Savannah. Addressed to Major William Brown, late of the Maryland Artillery.

PHILADELPHIA, November 6, 1787.

Oliver Pollock, Esq. hath shown to us the letter of which the foregoing is a true copy. The original has every mark of authenticity, and we believe it to be a genuine letter from the above named John Sullivan, to Major William Brown.

ROBERT MORRIS, GOV' R MORRIS.

Extract of a letter from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, dated July 28, 1791.

The enclosed information may be dependent upon, as Captain Smith is a man of well known veracity; whether it is of any importance, is not for me to determine, but I have conceived it my duty to give it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

"Captain David Smith, now of Nashville, and heretofore an inhabitant of the district of the Natchez, informs, that on the 23d day of May, 1791, he was at the Walnut-hills with Governor Grasso, of that district; that the Spaniards are erecting there a fort, under Grasso's directions, that will cover ten acres of ground, the lines of which were measured to the bank of the Mississippi, about a mile and a half below the mouth of the river Yazoo, on a high bluff, in latitude 32° 44', as appeared by an observation made by Grasso himself, or by his order. This place is twenty-five miles by land above the upper settlements of the Natchez district.

That two block houses and large barracks were completed; that a galley and gun-boat were lying in the river; and that two men were expected from Orleans: that besides Spaniards, there were about thirty deserters from the federal troops, engaged in building the fort, who were paid fifteen dollars per month for their services."

"FLINT'S RIVER, July 13, 1792.

"The Cussetah King has been here with me these five days past, and went off for the town yesterday, just before I received your letter. Chief of his business was to inquire of me what I thought of the present situation of affairs in the nation, as they found what I had told them respecting Bowles turned out nearly as I had told them. He wished to know a little about the grounds of what this Spanish officer meant by the talks he had given them, which was, in the first place, not to run the line, but to come down to a meeting at Pensacola and Mobile, where the Spaniards, this officer told them, would call the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, and Creeks, and give them all one talk, and when they had all agreed to one talk, that they should all be furnished with arms, ammunition, and all other implements of war in their land, and then they were to lay still till they found that the subjects encroached on their lands; and if they did, for them to defend their rights; and that they, the Spaniards, would be at their backs. This, I told the Cussetah King, he might easily see into, as I had lately heard that there were some disputes on the Mississippi, between the Spaniards and Americans, about the land. That the Spaniards were afraid of the Americans, and that they wanted to get the Indians to fight the Americans, first, to save themselves, and get the Indians all destroyed; and then think it will be time enough for them to begin. I told him many other things that I thought would take with him, which he seemed to take great notice of. He says, that, as matters cannot be settled till towards the fall with the State of Georgia, that they have agreed to go and hear the Spaniards' talks, and if they have any thing to give them, they will take it, but that they are determined not to take any talks to do any mischief to their friends the Americans."

"WAR OFFICE, October 15, 1787.

"In consequence of a letter written by John Sullivan to Don Diego de Gardoqui, the Encargado de Negocios of his most Catholic Majesty, bearing date the first of March last, and which has been published by the said Sullivan, as if appear by the enclosed paper, Congress have passed the resolve herewith transmitted.

"If, therefore, the said Sullivan should come within the federal territory, you will seize and confine him according to the said resolution, and report the same to me for the information of Congress, and for their further orders respecting him."

"WAR OFFICE, November 14, 1787.

"My last letter to you was dated on the 26th ultimo, and enclosed a duplicate of mine to you of the 16th; and also a copy of a resolve of Congress of the 13th of the same month, directing you to apprehend John Sullivan, styling himself late captain 4th regiment light dragoons, should he come within the federal territory.

"I also now enclose a copy of a letter said to be written by John Sullivan to Major William Brown, dated Charleston, 24th September, 1787. How far it may be practicable to execute the threats therein contained, respecting New Orleans, it is difficult, or rather impossible, to judge at this distance, and with the slender information I possess on the subject.

"It has been reported generally, that the inhabitants west of the Alleghany mountains have been highly irritated by the circulation of the idea that Congress were about to relinquish the navigation of the Mississippi for a number of years. Other reports also have been received, that the inhabitants of Cumberland have talked in a vague manner of the practicability of settling the Natchez and New Orleans, and some unauthorized publications have stated that there have been consultations on the subject by the inhabitants of Kentucky and Cumberland, during the summer past. But nothing has been received that had the appearance of reducing these indirect accounts to a probability, or of any system being formed to carry John Sullivan's letter into execution, until Major Sullivan's letter was received. Indeed, his letter can be regarded only as an indication of his disposition, and not as evidence of any fixed design on the subject. Such an enterprise would be in defiance of the laws of nations, disgraceful, and perhaps ruinous to the country by whose citizens it should be attempted.

"Although I cannot persuade myself that there can be any just foundation to apprehend that such a design is seriously entertained, excepting by an insignificant banditti, yet, circumstances as the reports are, it becomes necessary that such precautions be taken on the part of the United States, as the nature of the case may require, and their means admit."
"You will, therefore, on receiving this letter, endeavor to ascertain:
1. Whether there is any plan formed, or forming, of the nature mentioned in Mr. Sullivan's letter.
2. If so, the numbers of the party, and the names and characters of the most influential persons who are concerned in, orabet, the design.
3. When the design is intended to be executed, and by what mode or route, and what means they can obtain for the purpose.
4. How they are armed, accoutred, and supplied with ammunition, and whether they have cannon, and the necessary apparatus.

In case you should receive such information on the subject as to remove all doubt that the design to which Mr. Sullivan alludes is on the point of execution, you will form your post below the Tennessee, of such strength, as in your power, will be able by force to prevent the passage of the party down the Ohio.

Previously to exerting actual force, you will represent, on behalf of the United States, to the persons conducting the enterprise, the criminality of their conduct, and the obligations of the sovereign authority to prevent, at every hazard, such audacious proceedings. Should, however, persuasions or other mild methods be ineffectual, you will then have recourse to the means in your power to prevent their proceeding in the execution of their design.

I am well aware that I am placing you in a delicate predicament. But there are points of duty which must be accomplished without regarding the consequences. I conceive my duty, and my respect to the justice and dignity of the United States, oblige me to give you these orders, which will be your justification. I am persuaded you will conceive it to be your duty to execute them as far as may be practicable.

But should you find, by your inquiries, that the design is still in embryo, and that the period of its accomplishment is at a distance, you will transmit me a full account of every circumstance relative to the subject, in order to be submitted to Congress."

"War Office, December 19, 1787.

"Since writing you on the 14th ultimo, I have seen a person from Franklin, who assures me there is no such design entertained in that country, as is intimated in Mr. Sullivan's letter to Major Brown. Notwithstanding this information, I would wish that you relax nothing of the vigilance required in my letter to you on this subject. I would have you all eyes and all ears respecting the interest of the United States.

"The inhabitants of the Western waters may rest assured, that whatever local difficulties they may experience, they may depend on the protection and assistance of the Union, in all their legal pursuits. The interests are the same, and the men who endeavor to propagate a contrary sentiment, ought to be regarded as an enemy to his country."

"War Office, April 24, 1788.

"Your visit to Monsieur Cruzat, the Spanish commandant at St. Louis, was a judicious cultivation of the harmony which ought to prevail between the two nations. You will take every opportunity of convincing the Spanish officers, that it is the sincere desire of the Government of the United States to be on the most friendly footing with their nation, and to promote the most perfect harmony and good understanding. For this purpose, you will impress strongly on all your officers and parties, that on all occasions they must manifest the best dispositions to the Spanish officers and subjects.

"I am persuaded from the information derived from you and other sources, that the intelligence respecting the designs of Mr. Sullivan and his party on the Western waters, was highly blown, and could not have been seriously entertained by any but an insignificant number of desperate men.

"While you pursue every proper mode of obtaining information, respecting any designs which may interrupt the peace and welfare of the United States, you will be sure to conduct the inquiry with the utmost caution and prudence.

"Respecting John Sullivan, you will conduct yourself agreeably to the resolves of Congress relatively to him. I do not conceive that you would be justified in apprehending him without the territory of the United States. An attempt of that nature, would involve complaints to Congress and discussions of more trouble than the value of the object."

Extract from the Secretary of War's Instructions to Captain Henry Burbeck.

"War Office, April 8, 1790.

"Being in the vicinity of a Spanish garrison, you will embrace all opportunities of evincing the most cordial friendship to that nation. If accidental differences should arise between soldiers of your garrison and any of the Spanish soldiers or subjects, you will conduct yourself with perfect temper and politeness in the inquiry; if the offence or injury should have been committed by any of your garrison, you will inflict exemplary punishment; if by any Spanish soldiers or subjects, you will make a statement of the affair with great precision and coolness to the nearest Spanish officer."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to James Seagrove, Esq. Agent of the United States to the Creek Nation of Indians.

"War Department, April 29, 1792.

"You are hereby instructed, on every occasion which shall occur, to evince the most cordial attention to the Spanish Government and interest on the Southern frontiers of the United States. In case you should know of any intentions of any desperado similar to Bowles, or any designs of the Indians, injurious to the interest or peace of the Spanish Government, you will communicate the same to the nearest Spanish officers, so that the evil apprehended may be avoided or repelled."

Extract from the Secretary of War's Instructions to Major Henry Goitl8er, of the Third Sub-legate of the United States.

"War Office, Aug. 11, 1792.

"You will, on all occasions, direct that the officers on the river St. Mary, and other places, conduct themselves towards the Spanish officers and government with the greatest politeness and respect. Any offence against this order, will be marked with the peculiar attention of the Government, and treated as the nature of the case may require."
Extract from the Secretary of War's Instructions to Major General Arthur St. Clair.

"This proclamation became necessary, as information had been received, that certain companies had purchased of the State of Georgia, the pre-emption of the almost entire lands of the said Indian nations, and that measures were taking in pursuance thereof, to effect settlements on the said lands, in direct violation of the said treaties and the peace of the United States.

"And information has lately been received, that a certain Doctor O'Fallon is levying troops in Kentucky, and issuing commissions in an illegal manner, for the purpose of making certain establishments upon the said lands.

"The conduct of the said Doctor O'Fallon is considered of such a nature, as that the attorney of the district of Kentucky has been directed to commence a prosecution against him according to law and the nature of his offence. And in order that all concerned under him should be warned of their situation, the President of the United States has issued another proclamation, which is hereunto annexed.

"It is presumed, the arrest of Doctor O'Fallon, and the issuing the proclamation, will operate to prevent the execution thereof; but should they not, and the party proceed in the execution of their plan, it becomes an important consideration, whether the military shall interpose to prevent them. This point is now under consideration of the legal department, and you shall be informed of the result."

Extract of a letter from the Turkey to Governor Blount.

Turkey's Town, September 2, 1792.

"Your good talk I have received, and am glad to find that you are pleased with the conduct of Mr. Thompson and the rest of my people that was in company with him. It was my earnest request to them to do the best for your people in the boats, which I am glad to hear they did. Now my good friend and brother, you wrote me to tell you what I thought and knew of the people that lives on the Big River. Now, I will let you know and tell you the truth, which I am sorry and ashamed for to tell you of their proceedings and bad conduct. You may be assured it is not lies. I now tell you, as you wrote me never to write or send you word about any thing but the truth. The eighth day of this month, they are determined to go off to war—all the five lower towns on the Big River. They have and will make war by yourselves, you may be assured, and believe me, it is not the consent of the whole nation, nor no part of it, only them five towns. They agreed amongst themselves. Now you may know where the bad people lives; both you and your people may know now where the good and bad lives. Now I desire you and all your people, not to come to war against no other towns, but them five towns on the Big River that has made war against you. The Spaniards has give them ammunition and guns, hatchets, knives, &c., and told them it was not to go to war, but to keep it a reserve by them. You may blame nobody for all this, only the Spaniards."

Turkey's Town, September 2, 1792.

"I am sorry to acquaint your Excellency of the bad conduct of the Indians on the Big River, or you may call them the lower towns. On the 8th day of this month, they intend to start out for war. But what part on the settlements they will fall of it, I can't tell. The first day of this month, I got to the Turkey's town; and there the news was, that the Indians was making readiness for war. I made all haste I could, back, to send you this news. You told me to tell you nothing but what was the truth, and you may believe this to be the truth. I hope you will do the same by me as agreed. These Indians will kill people everywhere where to bring on the Whites on them, that is, for peace. They have said it, that they intend to do so. But when mischief is done, you will know where they came from, and you may depend the Creeks will do their part. Your Excellency has got to blame the Spaniards for all this; they have give the ammunition, guns, hatchets, and knives, but not to make war with, but to keep it as a reserve."

Extract of a letter from Leonard D. Shaw, Agent of the United States to the Cherokee Nation, to Governor Blount.—August 29, 1792.

"In my last letter, I informed you of the frequent incursions of the Creeks, and the reason I had to apprehend some daring attempts from them. Since that time, they have killed Mr. Ramsay, and a person who had lately arrived from Charleston. This happened the 24th instant. They were very nigh killing Moses Rice the preceding day, notwithstanding he was of speaking to the King Fisher, and his wife and they had formerly been intimate with him. Mr. Ramsay was not above thirty yards from his own house, when he was killed and scalped on the spot. The other person reached the house, but instantly expired. The open and avowed intention of the Creeks, is to kill every white man they meet; and they declare that such is their orders. The great quantity of ammunition given to the Indians by the Spaniards, persuades me that we are indebted to the latter for these visitations."

Extract of information from Red Bird, a Cherokee, enclosed in a letter from Governor Blount, dated Sept. 15, 1792.

"That John Watts had been at Pensacola: that he brought home with him seven horse loads of ammunition, and as many accoutrements as were sufficient to equip two hundred horsemen, to wit, swords, &c. and that Watts was appointed to command the Creeks and the Cherokees, who should be called into the field, and be for war; and that the Creek nation had met in council, and agreed to the appointment."

Choctaw Nation, June 30, 1792.

"I take the liberty to inform you, that I had the opportunity of seeing your letter to this nation, and I think that you must be sensible that every white man in this nation must be dependent to Spanish Government. If you are not sensible of it, you must have heard that the Spaniards are a jealous people, and I have always been pointed out as an American. But I have always been true to that power that protected me; but the whole is, I am protected at my own expense. My reason was speaking to the King Fisher, it is, that I have received several insults from the Creeks, and am obliged to put up with it. For what reason? Because I am not able to help myself."
Extract of information from the Hanging Maw, enclosed in a letter from Governor Blount, dated October 7, 1792.

"The amount of the information given by John Boggs, was, that, from the 13th to the 17th instant, (September) the party, consisting of nine Creeks, under the command of Mr. Nickajack, and at a place called the Creek crossing place, about thirty miles below Nickajack, on their way to invade the district of Mcro, Cumberland settlement and that they were joined by from one hundred to two hundred Cherokees, among whom was John Watts; and that the Creeks had with them a great quantity of powder and lead, which they had received from the Spaniards that the whole were to rendezvous at the place where the different paths came together on their way towards Nashville and concert their measures of attack upon the Cumberland settlements. That while he was at the Look-out mountain, he was informed that Richard Findleton and a Frenchman had passed on from the Pensacola to Cumberland, to obtain ammunition, and we a letter from them in ten nights, and report such as they could collect. That he found it generally understood in the lower towns, that the Spaniards had sent their men to the nation through which he passed, that such of the inhabitants of the five lower towns as did not want war, had best leave them; and that such of the other towns as did want war, had best move to them; and that some of both parties were moving as to take the situation on which best suited their wishes and disposition for war among the Creeks. Boggs is a half breed, well known to many white people, and by all parties viewed as a man of veracity."
he himself, and the Turkey, and some other of the chiefs, would come down with Mr. McDonald some time hence to visit him. The Bddy Fellow then accompanied Watts to the crossing of the Coosy river, encamped with him all night, and returned; and Watts and his companions proceeded for Pensacola, with ten pack horses.

"At this time (about the last of June) the national council were about to sit at Estnauila, by appointment made at the conference at the Coyatee, at the request of the Bddy Fellow, to receive his report touching the lawness he had been on to Philadelphia, and to hear the big book read which he had brought from the war office. The council waited his coming three days, before business was entered upon. At length he sent an apology that one of his relations was unwell, and he could not come. He did not appear at the council, and his absence can be attributed only to the letters he received from Panton: for, at Coyatee, he was the warmest man for the United States, as was his friend Watts.

The demand of the Little Turkey, contained in his speech in council of the—day of June, that the ridge between the Saturia and Green Creeks, and the line through the towns of St. Domingo and New Orleans, be owned for the use of the Little Turkey by Panton. At the time the Turkey was delivering this part of his speech, the Jobber's son, sitting at a distance, observed to them, in a low accent, that it was now too late to talk of that line, for they had established a different one at the treaty of Holston to which the Young Frog replied, "that is nothing; then we had nobody to talk to. You can get nothing by it." meaning Watts.

"Immediately after the return of John Watts and his uncle from Pensacola to Williams, in the latter part of August, the brother of the late Draggan Canoe, the same that the council at Estnauila declared should succeed to his brother's estates was taken by the Governor, and was left at the house of the Old Prince, while the Old Prince was at Philadelphia, which pipe the Old Prince and the King Fisher, on their return from Philadelphia, destroyed; and being informed of the fate of his war pipe, declared, if the King Fisher was present, he would destroy the medal that had been given him at Philadelphia; that in future, his talks should be considered as a little boy's, and not as the talks of a man and a warrior. He then requested the Warrior's son, the Standing Turkey, and the Half Breed, to go to a pipe maker who lived about twenty miles from Estnauila, and have a pipe made as near like that which was destroyed as possible, that he might have it to show them afterwards, whom he daily expected at the lower towns. About an hour after this talk, Watts and his uncle had taken the three before mentioned Indians and the Big Fellow out from the company, and delivered them a talk from that: they must visit at Williams in eight nights; to pay no more attention to the talks of the old chiefs; that they were not to assist the old chiefs in the restitution of horses or any other property taken from the United States; that the day was just at hand, when the blow was to be struck; that Watts had been to Pensacola, seen Governor O'Niel, and all things were to his wishes; that the thing would be fully explained to their satisfaction on their arrival at Williams; and delivered them a string of black beads of four strands. This they agreed to, and made Carey acquainted with what had been said to them.

Watts commenced his report by stating which Governor O'Niel had written by him, to the chiefs, to be publicly read.

The contents were, that his master, the King of Spain, had sent to his care, at Pensacola, arms, and ammunition in abundance, for the use of the four Southern nations, which he had divided into four separate warehouses. That Watts had been an eye witness of the quantity he had of powder, and lead, and arms; that he had sent some of Watts by some for the Cherokees; that the King of Spain had made a greater man of McGillivray than Congress did; that it was his business to deliver out these articles; that he would be at Pensacola by the middle of October, when, if the whole of the towns would come down, they should be supplied, each town, from 400 to 500 lbs. powder, and more, if necessary, and lead accordingly, and with arms; and that he would have plenty of provisions provided for them. He then recommended Mr. McDonald and Alexander Campbell, their old friends, to give particular notice and protection. The letter being read, Watts then informed which Governor O'Niel had said to him. The Governor, he said, received him with open arms; asked him if he had seen any Spanish settlers before he arrived at Pensacola; assured him that the Spaniards never wanted a back country; wherever they landed, they sat down. Even such a sand bank as this is sufficient for them. They are not like the Americans; first take your lands, then treat with you, and give you little or nothing for it. This is the way they have always served you, and, from time to time, killed some of your people. In the late war between Great Britain and the United States, the Spaniards assisted them and lent them money, and they owe the Spaniards a great deal, and, instead of paying them what they owe, they take our lands as well as yours. That they had sent arms, for the whole four Southern Nations, in plenty, and that then was the time for them to join quickly in war against the United States, while they were engaged in a war with the Northern tribes. If they did not, that, as soon as the winter came, they would conquer the tribes in the South; and they would have enough to do in their talks which that part of the nation, who had been to visit the President, had received, was not from the heart, but only from the teeth. That, besides guns and ammunition, they should be furnished with swords, caps, pistols, bridles, and saddles, for horsemen. That the King of Spain had ordered a fort to be built at the Alabama fork, within a mile of the United States line; which was a spot, where the Spanish stood, and a great store of ammunition for both Creeks and Cherokees; and that a magazine should be erected for the Cherokees at Williams.

"Watts, having thus recapitulated the talks he received from Governor O'Neal, proceeded to address his audience, and made a doubt whether the war now on was against the Americans, or Spain; the Spaniards, he thought, was the same person that I have mentioned in my former letters as a Spanish resident or agent who had arrived from New Orleans, and lives in a house of Gen. McGillivray's, at Little Talassas.

It remains no doubt but a doubt, whether this paper, or the war, is to be considered in the same line with others, and his business in the Creek nation. His name is Oliver, a Frenchman born, a captain in the Spanish army, wears the uniform of the regiment of Louisse; and sent by the immediate orders of Baron du Condulette, Governor of New Orleans, as an agent, or perhaps something more, to conduct affairs in the Creek nation.

To the information contained in this narrative, I pay full faith and credit.

Extract of a letter from James Seagrope, Esq. Agent of the United States to the Creek nation, to the President of the United States.

"RocKLANDING, Oconee River, July 5, 1792."

"The information which I am about to give, appearing to me of importance to the United States, I hope will plead my excuse for thus intruding upon your moments of retirement. In my despatch of the 14th ultimo, to the Secretary of War, I promised to procure what information I could, respecting a Spanish officer, which Gen. McGillivray's letters is in reference to me of the 18th of May, a copy of which you have herewith.

"I find, on inquiry that the Indian object of that part is that same person that I have mentioned in my former letters as a Spanish resident or agent who had arrived from New Orleans, and lives in a house of Gen. McGillivray's, at Little Talassas."

Extract of a letter from James Seagrope, Esq. Agent of the United States to the Creek nation, to the President of the United States.
"It would appear by the style of Gen. McGillivray's letter to me, that this Spanish agent had just arrived, and that he was a stranger to him and his business. This was not the case: for it is well known, and even uncontroverted, that the Governor had been detailing the number of chief men of that nation, and had then been several months at Mr. McGillivray's own house at Little Tallassee. The general took much pains in sending for a number of the chieftains, and introduced this Spanish agent to them as their great friend, who was come to live among them, and to do great things for them. It can also be made to appear that the general was riding along the country with this Spaniard, at the time when, by his engagements, he ought to have been with me.

"I have not a doubt but that the arrival of this Spanish agent was in consequence of a preconcerted — between McGillivray and the Spaniards, on his visit last winter to their possessions, and that Captain Olivar is to be his successor in the Creek land: for, you must know, the general is again gone with nearly the whole of his property into New Orleans, and I doubt whether he returns. Certain it is, that he hath engaged to attend the Spanish treaty with the Indians at Pensacola in September next.

"As soon as Gen. McGillivray quitted the nation, Capt. Olivar threw off all mask, by calling meetings in the towns, and directing what the Indians should and should not do. He, in the most public and positive manner, forbids them parting with a foot of land to the United States, and also forbids their running the boundary line between their settlements; these petty ideas probably tell the Indians not to have anything to do with the Americans. It is said by several persons (but I cannot vouch for the truth of it) that he has gone so far in the upper towns to keep the Indians turning out against our people on the western waters. I think this is most improbable: for, about ten days past, he had the impudence to come into the lower towns, and give out public talks, advising the Indians not to come near me, and that the Spaniard must run the treaty with us. I have been present, and he had some hope of success.

"I am happy in being able to inform you that he met a very cool reception in the lower towns. The Indians who had been with me had returned home, and influenced the people so much in our favor that he found it convenient to make a speedy retreat to Little Tallassee.

"A brother-in-law of Gen. McGillivray's, a white man, who lives at Tallassee, of the name of Weatherford, is now here, who confirms what I have related of this Spanish agent; and further says, that he hath at Gen. McGillivray's house a quantity of goods, which he distributes among the Indians; that he draws orders on Government in favor of all Indians going to Orleans, who receive good for ammunition, which they bring up in trade, and that they have a constant intercourse in this way; that he is engaged in securing the chiefs to attend the treaty at Pensacola.

"It was much talked of in the nation that one object of the Spanish treaty would be to obtain leave to erect forts and establish garrisons on the Creek lands.

"Those matters seem of so much moment, come so direct, and I believe unquestionably true, that I have lost no time in giving you notice thereof.

"I cannot account for this interference of the Spaniards, and sometimes think that Capt. Olivar cannot be supported by the French, and that he is exceeding himself in doing as much as he is capable.

"I find that the Spanish agent is on very friendly terms with Bowles' successor in the nation, a man of the name of Willbanks.

"I cannot help expressing my fears to you that the Spaniards are playing a double game with us on the score of Bowles. My reason is, that they will make him useful to their views. Their very kind treatment of him since he has been among them cannot fail to create suspicion in the breast of any one as well acquainted as I am with Spanish want of lenity to actual prisoners, especially such as have offended against their Government. Bowles hath not been confined by them, and it is a doubt with me but what appeared a capture of him to us, was, in fact, a concerted plan with him. He is sent to Spain, but not in confinement. Why send him there? Sure the Governor of New Orleans, or the Captain General at the Havana, are possessed with powers equal to punishing or acquitting a man of Bowles' character. I fear there is some dark and dangerous business in contemplation among those people. I fear the object is to make the Americans, taking the Indians by surprise, and making them believe that the English are brewing, is he deeply engaged in it. I never expect he will come forward as an active character in the field. He has a false spirit, and this is the reason of his placing Olivar in his stead, and of his withdrawing to the Spaniards as an asylum. Olivar is represented to me as a man of good address, who speaks the French, Spanish, and English languages equally well.

"I fear the reason of Mr. McGillivray's not meeting me, and his not forwarding the business of the treaty made at New York, as well as his evasive conduct to all the pressing arguments made use of by him to the Secretary of War and myself, arose from preconcerted plans with his Spanish and English friends, and not from any real opposition the Indians made thereto."

Letter from General Alexander McGillivray to James Seagrove, Esq. enclosed in the foregoing.

UPPER CREEKS, LITTLE TALLASSEE, May 18, 1792.

DEAR SIR:—I received your letter of 1st inst. You have no doubt been expecting me some time. I had been waiting this month to have got our lower gentry in, which are among national matters, and to recover from the confusion they had been thrown in by the talks of the lying captain. After he was secured by the Spanish from their hope of some of their preventing him and his British fleets; when, to my surprise, some Indians from Orleans have given and spread reports that he has made matters worse than ever; and a Spanish officer has actually arrived and tells the Indians that he has orders to prevent them from running the line, or doing any other business with the Americans, and invites to a meeting in September next at Pensacola. This last stroke is too much. The Indians, at least a good many, are as mad as ever and Bowles' partisans again getting about giving away land. 'Tis no wonder that the Indians are distracted, when they are tampered with on every side, and am myself in the situation of a keeper of Bedlam, and nearly fit for an inhabitant.

Finding that the Choctaw chiefs are still at home, Randall carries a talk, desiring them, in most pressing language, to come down and have to do with us. But since Bowles had given hope of British aid, a majority of the towns would agree to cede no more than the eastern of Ocmulgee; and now they are told to give none at all; and I wish that more may not be insisted upon at present, to avoid disputes and its horrid consequences, a diabolical war, in which they will be supported, and in which I will not have any hand.

I am willing to get the true information from the persons, and the reasons for their interference. As yet I cannot guess at their motives. You are no stranger to their dispositions.

The Indians will report these Spanish talks of themselves.

Extract of a letter from James Seagrove, Esq. to the President of the United States.

"Rocklanding, July 27, 1792.

"Since my last to you, which was pretty full on the subject of Spanish and Indian matters, I have received many pieces of information, all tending to confirm me in the opinion that the Spaniards are making the most of the injury of the United States, as they possibly can; and that Gen. McGillivray hath verified my predictions of it. Such information which I can collect from white people and Indians, there does not remain a doubt with me but that the Spaniards will, if possible, they can, involve the United States in a war with the four Southern nations of Indians. Every exertion is making by the Spaniards, and undue measures taking with the savages, to stir them up against us.
To the Chiefs and Warriors of the Chickasaw Nation of Indians.

BROTHERS: Your father, General Washington, the President of the United States, has understood, through Governor Blount, that you are greatly in want of arms, and ammunition, and corn; and therefore has taken the earliest opportunity of proving to you his friendship, and the desire of being serviceable to you. It is his earnest desire to be at peace with all the Indian tribes, and he recommends the same measure to you. Nothing but the most dreadful necessity will justify a state of war. Such necessity, however, sometimes exists; but peace is always to be sought for with the greatest eagerness upon the first opportunity.

The United States has endeavored to persuade the hostile Indians to a peace, from motives of kindness to them, and not from any apprehensions as to the final issue of the war. On these grounds a treaty with the Indians north of the Ohio is to be held at Sandusky in a short time. If they listen to the dictates of justice and moderation, they will make peace if not, they will be made to repent their persisting in hostilities. Although the United States are slow to anger, yet, when once roused, their wrath will be destructive to their enemies.

Your father, General Washington, will continue to love and cherish you; and if requisite, he will supply you further with articles necessary to your situation; and for which you will apply to the General commanding the army at Fort Washington.

Given at the War Office of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, this 27th day of April, 1793.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

3d Congress.] No. 66. [1st Session.

MOROCCO AND ALGIERS.

Message from the President of the United States, communicating a Report from the Secretary of State, in relation to Morocco and Algiers.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives

I lay before you a report of the Secretary of State on the measures which have been taken on behalf of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining a recognition of our treaty with Morocco, and for the ransom of our citizens, and establishment of peace with Algiers.

While it is proper our citizens should know that subjects which so much concern their interests and their feelings, have drawn the attention of their Legislature and Executive, it would still be improper to publish the particulars of this communication should be made known. The confidential conversation stated in one of the last letters sent herewith is one of these. Both justice and policy require that the source of that information should remain secret. So a knowledge of the sums meant to have been given for peace and ransom might have a disadvantageous influence on future proceedings for the same objects.

GEO. Washington.

The Secretary of State, having duly examined into the papers and documents of his office relative to the negotiations proposed to be undertaken with the Governments of Morocco and Algiers, makes thereupon, to the President of the United States, the following report:

The reports which he made on the 38th of December, 1790, on the trade of the United States in the Mediterranean, to the House of Representatives, and on the situation of their citizens in captivity at Algiers, to the President, having detailed the transactions of the United States with the Governments of Morocco and Algiers, from the close of the late war to that date, he begins to refer to them for the state of things existing at that time.

On the 3d of March, 1791, the Legislature passed an act appropriating the sum of 29,000 dollars to the purpose of effecting a recognition of the treaty of the United States with the new Emperor of Morocco; in consequence whereof Thomas Barclay, formerly consul general for the United States in France, was appointed to proceed to Morocco, in the character of consul for the United States, to obtain a recognition of the treaty; and on the 15th of May, in the same year, the following letter was written to him:

Philadelphia, May 13, 1791.

SIR: You are appointed by the President of the United States, to go to the court of Morocco, for the purpose of obtaining from the new Emperor a recognition of our treaty with his father. As it is thought best that you should go in some definite character, that of consul has been adopted; and you consequently receive a commission as consul for the United States in the dominions of the Emperor of Morocco, which, having been issued during the recess of the Senate, will of course expire at the end of their next session. It has been thought best, however, not to insert this limitation in the commission, as being unnecessary, and it might perhaps embarrass. Before the end of the next session of the Senate, it is expected the objects of your mission will be accomplished.

Lisbon being the most convenient port of correspondence between us and Morocco, sufficient authority will be given to Colonel Humphreys, resident for the United States at that place, over funds in Amsterdam, for the objects of your mission. On him, therefore, you will draw for the sums herein allowed, or such parts of them as shall be necessary. To that port, too, you had better proceed in the first vessel which shall be going there, as it is expected you will get a ready passage from thence to Morocco.
On your arrival in Morocco, sound your ground, and know how things stand at present. Your former voyage there having put you in possession of the characters through whom this may be done, who may best be used for approaching the Emperor and effecting your purpose, you are left to use your own discretion to the best advantage.

The object being merely to obtain an acknowledgment of the treaty, we rely that you will be able to do this, giving very moderate presents. As the amount of these will be drawn into precedent on future similar repetitions of them, it becomes important. Our distance, our seclusion from the ancient world, its politics and usages, our agricultural occupations and habits, our poverty, and lastly our determination to prefer war, in all cases, to tribute under any form, and to any people whatever, will furnish you with topicks for opposing and refusing high or dishonoring pretentions to which may be added the advantages their people will derive from our commerce, and their sovereign from the duties laid on whatever we extract from that country.

Keep us regularly informed of your proceedings and progress, by writing by every possible occasion, detailing to us particularly your conferences, either private or public, and the persons with whom they are held.

We think that Francisco Chiappe has merited well of the United States by his care of their peace and interests.

Humphreys.

He has sent an account of diversbursements for us, amounting to $244 dollars. Do not recognise the account, because we are unwilling, by closing that, to give him a color for presenting larger ones hereafter, for expenses which it is impossible for us to scrutinize or control. Let him understand that our laws oppose the application of public money so informally; but in your presents, treat him handsomely, so as not only to cover this demand, but go beyond it with a liberality which may fix him deeply in our interests. The place he holds near the Emperor renders his friendship peculiarly important. Let us have nothing further to do with his brothers, or any other person. The money which would make one good friend, divided among several, will produce no attachment.

To your commission, you will receive a letter to the Emperor of Morocco, a cipher, and a letter to Colonel Humphreys.

I have the honor to be, with great esteem, &c.

TH. JEFFERSON.

To Thomas Barclay, Esq.

A private instruction, which Mr. Barclay is to carry in his memory, and not on paper, lest it should come into improper hands.

We rely that you will obtain the friendship of the new Emperor, and his assurances that the treaty shall be faithfully observed, with as little expense as possible. But the sum of ten thousand dollars is fixed as the limit which all your donations together are not to exceed.

TH. JEFFERSON.

May 13, 1791.

A letter was, at the same time, written to Francisco Chiappe, a person employed confidentially near the Emperor, who had been a minister consular there for the United States by Mr. Barclay, on his former mission, and appeared to have acted with zeal for our interest. It was in these words:

PHILADELPHIA, May 13, 1791.

Sir:

Since my entrance into the office of Secretary of State, I have been honored with several of your letters, and should sooner have acknowledged the receipt of them, but that I have, from time to time, expected the present occasion would occur sooner than it has done.

I am authorized to express to you the satisfaction of the President at the zeal and attention you have shown to our interests; and am happy to communicate a circumstance of them.

Mr. Barclay is sent in the character of Consul of the United States, to present our respects to his Imperial Majesty, for whom he has a letter from the President. We have no doubt he will receive your aid, as usual, to impress the mind of the Emperor with a sense of our high respect and friendship for his person and character, and to dispose him to a cordial continuance of that good understanding so happily established with his father.

Our manner of thinking on all these subjects is so perfectly known to Mr. Barclay, that nothing better can be done than to refer you to him for information on every subject which you might wish to inquire into.

I am, with great esteem, &c.

TH. JEFFERSON.

To Francisco Chiappe.

To this was added a letter to Colonel Humphreys, our resident at Lisbon, through whom it was thought proper to require that the draughts of money should pass. It was in the following words:

PHILADELPHIA, May 13, 1791.

Dear Sir:

Mr. Thomas Barclay is appointed by the President of the United States to go to Morocco, in the character of Consul, for the purpose of obtaining from the new Emperor a recognition of our treaty with his father.

Ten thousand dollars are appropriated for these purposes, in such form and to such persons as Mr. Barclay, in his discretion, shall think best; and he is to receive for himself at the rate of two thousand dollars a year, and his expenses.

It is thought best that the money for these purposes should be placed under your control, and that Mr. Barclay should draw on you for it. Thirty-two thousand one hundred and seventy-five guilders current are accordingly lodged in the hands of our bankers in Amsterdam, and they are instructed to answer your draughts to that amount; notify them that they are to be paid out on and by order of Mr. Barclay, that this account may be kept clear of all others. You will arrange with Mr. Barclay the manner of making his draughts, so as to give yourself time for raising the money by the sale of your bills.

A confidence in your discretion has induced me to avail the public of that, in the transaction of this business, and to recommend Mr. Barclay to your counsel and assistance through the whole of it. I enclose you one set of the bills for thirteen thousand dollars before mentioned, and a copy of my letter to the bankers. Duplicates will be sent to them directly.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TH. JEFFERSON.

To Colonel David Humphreys.

On Mr. Barclay's arrival in Europe, he learned that the dominions of Morocco were involved in a general civil war, the subject of which was the succession to the throne, then in dispute between several of the sons of the late Emperor; nor had any of them such a preponderance as to ground a presumption that a recognition of the treaty... by him would be effectual. Mr. Barclay, therefore, took measures for obtaining constant intelligence from that country, and in the mean time remained at Lisbon, Cadiz, or Gibraltar, that he might be in readiness to take advantage of the first moments of the undisputed establishment of any one of the brothers on the throne, to effect the object of his mission.

Though not enabled at that time to proceed to the redemption of our captive citizens at Algiers, yet we endeavored to alleviate their distresses by confiding to Colonel Humphreys the care of furnishing them a comfortable sustenance, as was done in the following letter to him:

PHILADELPHIA, July 13, 1791.

Dear Sir:

Mr. Barclay having been detained longer than was expected, you will receive this, as well as my letter of May 13, from him. Since the date of that, I have received your No. 15, March 31, No. 16, April 8, No. 17, April 30, No. 18, May 3, and No. 20, May 21.

You are not unacquainted with the situation of our captives at Algiers. Measures were taken, and were long depending, for their redemption; during the time of their dependence we thought it would forward our success to take notice of the captives. They were maintained by the Spanish consul, from whom applications for reimbursement, therefore, have been made; and every care was taken to prevent any loss, and to have our measures for their redemption not will succeed, renders it unnecessary for us to be so reserved on the subject, and to continue the appearance of neglecting them. Though the Government might have agreed to ransom at the lowest price admitted with any nation (as for instance, that of the French order of Mercy) they will not give any thing like the price which has been lately declared to be the lowest by the captors. It remains then for us to see what other means are practicable for their recovery. In the mean time it is our desire, that the disbursements hitherto made for their subsistence by the Spanish consul, or others, be paid off, and that their future comfortable subsistence be provided for. As to past disbursements, I must beg the favor of you to write to Mr. Carmichael, that you are authorized to pay them off, and pray him to let you know their amount, and to whom payments are due. With respect to future provision for the captives, I must put it into your hands. The impossibility of getting letters to or from Mr. Carmichael renders it improper for us to use that channel. As to the footing on which they are to be subsisted, the ration and clothing of a soldier would have been a good measure, were it possible to apply it to articles of food and clothing, so extremely different as those used at Algiers. The allowance hereafter made by the Spanish consul might perhaps furnish a better rule, as we have it from themselves that they were then comfortably subsisted. Should you be led to correspond with them at all, it had better be with Captain O'Brien, who is a sensible man, and whose conduct since he has been here, has been particularly meritorious. It will be better for you to avoid saying any thing which may either increase or lessen their hopes of ransom. I write to our bankers to answer your draughts for these purposes; and enclose you a duplicate, to be forwarded with your first draught. The prisoners are fourteen in number, with the names and qualities as follows: Richard O'Brien and Isaac Stephens, captains, the commission of Henry and Alexander Forsyth, mates; Jacob Tessanier, a French passenger; William Paterson, Philip Sloan, Peleg Lorin, John Robertson, James Hall, James Cathcart, George Smith, John Gregory, James Herum, seamen. They have been twenty-one or twenty-two.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TH. JEFFERSON.

To Colonel David Humphreys.

On the 8th of May, 1792, the President proposed to the Senate the following questions:

If the President of the United States should conclude a convention or treaty with the Government of Algiers for the ransom of the thirteen Americans in captivity there, for a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, all expenses included, will the Senate approve the same? Or, is there any, and what, greater or lesser sum, which they would fix on as the limit beyond which they would approve the ransom? If the President of the United States should conclude a treaty with the Government of Algiers for the establishment of peace with them, at an expense not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars, paid at the signature, and a like sum to be paid annually afterwards during the continuance of the treaty, would the Senate approve the same? Or, are there any greater or lesser sums which they would fix on as the limits beyond which they would not approve of such treaty?

GEO. WASHINGTON.

These questions were answered by the following resolution of the Senate, of May 6th, 1792.

IN SENATE, May 6, 1792.

Resolved, That if the President of the United States shall conclude a treaty with the Government of Algiers, for the establishment of a peace with them, at an expense not exceeding forty thousand dollars, paid at the signature, and a sum not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars, to be paid annually afterwards, during the continuance of the treaty, the Senate will approve the same. And in case such treaty be concluded, and the President of the United States shall also conclude a convention, or treaty, with the Government of Algiers, for the ransom of the thirteen Americans in captivity there, for a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, all expenses included, the Senate will also approve such convention or treaty.

Attest,
SAM. A. OTIS, Secretary.

In order to enable the President to effect the objects of this resolution, the Legislature, by their act of May 8, 1792, c. 41, § 3, appropriated a sum of fifty thousand dollars to defray any expense which might be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.

Commissioners were hereupon made out to Admiral Paul Jones for the objects of peace and ransom, and a third to consuls for the United States at Algiers. And his instructions were conveyed in the following letter:

To Admiral John Paul Jones:

PHILADELPHIA, June 1, 1792.

Sir:

The President of the United States having thought proper to appoint you commissioner for treating with the Dey and Government of Algiers on the subjects of peace and ransom of our captives, I have the honor to enclose you the commissions, of which Mr. Thomas Pinckney, now on his way to London, as our minister plenipotentiary there, will be the bearer. Supposing that there exists a disposition to thwart our negotiations with the Algerines, and that this would be very proper, I have thought it advisable that the knowledge of this appointment should rest with the President, Mr. Pinckney, and myself; for which reason you will perceive that the commissions are all in my own hand writing; for the same reason, entire secrecy is recommended to you; and that you so cover from the public your care and destination, as that they may not be conjectured or noticed; and at the same time that you do not cut off all inquiry or your affairs will possibly get lost.

In order to enable you to enter on this business with full information, it will be necessary to give you a history of what has passed.

On the 25th July, 1785, the schooner Maria, captain Stevens, belonging to a Mr. Foster, of Boston, was taken, off cape St. Vincent, by an Algerine cruiser; and five days afterwards, the ship Dauphin, captain O'Brien, belonging to Messrs. Irvine, of Philadelphia, was taken by another, about fifty leagues westward of Lisbon. These vessels, withe their cargoes and crews, twenty-one persons in number, were carried into Algiers. Mr. John Lamb, appointed agent for treating of peace between the United States and the Government of Algiers, was ready to set out from France on that business, when Mr. Adams and myself heard of these two captures. The ransom of prisoners being a case not existing when our powers were prepared, we made no provision for it. We thought, however, we ought, by all means, to have the subject of ransom in our view, and standing in view of the present authority, we should keep within the lowest price which had been given by any other nation. We, therefore, gave a supplemental instruction to Mr. Lamb to ransom our captives, if it could be done for 200 dollars a man, as we knew we could ransom them without raising the ransonee to amounts equal to that sum, and we certainly thought this sum. He proceeded to Algiers; but his mission proved fruitless. He wrote us word from thence, that the Dey asked 59,496 dollars for the twenty-one captives, and that it was not probable he would abate much from that price but he never intimated an idea of agreeing to give it. As he had settled and prepared accounts of his mission, no money was sent him, on the supposition that he had entered into a positive engagement to pay for the persons the price above mentioned, or something near it; and that he came away with an assurance to return with the money. We cannot believe the fact; and if we did, we disavowed it totally, as far as beyond his powers. We have now disavowed it formally, because it never has come to our knowledge with any degree of certainty.

In February, 1797, I wrote to Congress to ask leave to employ the Mathurins of France in ransoming our captives, and on the 19th of September, I received their orders to do so, and to call for the money from our bankers at Amsterdam, that as soon as the subscription should be raised, they might be the business put into play. They inferred that they could, the business was put into play by the general of the Mathurins, not with the appearance of acting for the United States, or with their knowledge, but merely on the usual ground of charity. This expedient was not likely to be attended with the desired success, the reputation of church property, before any proposition perhaps had been made in form by the Mathurins to the Dey of Algiers.

I have some reason to believe that Mr. Enustace, while in Spain, endeavored to engage the Spaniards to employ their agents in the business to the exclusion of any other, and that this was the reason why the Mathurins were not notified of our desires, and that they thought it, the business was put into play by the general of the Mathurins, not with the appearance of acting for the United States, or with their knowledge, but merely on the usual ground of charity. This expedient was not likely to be attended with the desired success, the reputation of church property, before any proposition perhaps had been made in form by the Mathurins to the Dey of Algiers.

It has been a fixed principle with Congress to establish the rate of ransom of American captives with the Barbary States, at as low a point as possible, that it may not be the interest of those States to go in quest of our citizens in preference to those of other countries. Had it not been for the danger it would have brought on the residue of our citizens, the excitement of these rovers against them, our citizens now in Algiers would have been long ago redeemed, without regard to price. The mere money for this particular redemption, neither has been, nor is, an object with any body here. It is from the same regard to the safety of our seamen at large, that they have now restrained us from any ransom, and therefore, with pleasure and consisitly to terms of ransom, our Government would never have consented; that is to say, to the terms stated by Captain O'Brien, in the following passage of the same letter: "by giving the Minister of the Marine (the present Dey's favorite) the sum of one thousand sequins, I would stake my life that we would be ransomed for thirteen thousand sequins, and all expenses, inclusive of that extravagant as this sum will be, under the security of peace in future, go so far: not doubting, at the same time, that you will obtain it as much lower as possible, and not, indeed, without a hope that a lower ransom will be practicable, from the assurances given us in other letters from Captain O'Brien, that prices are likely to be abated by the present Dey, and particularly with us, towards whom he has been represented as well disposed. You will consider this demand, therefore, say 27,000 dollars, as your ultimate limit, including ransom, duties, and gratifications of every kind.

As soon as the ransom is completed, you will be pleased to have the captives well clothed, and sent home at the expense of the United States, to such a sum as will consist with their reasonable comfort.

It is thought best that Mr. Pinckney, our minister at London, should be the confidential channel of communication between us. He is enabled to answer your drafts for money within the limits before expressed; and as this will be by redrawing on Amsterdam, you must settle with him the number of days after sight, at which your bills shall be payable in London, so as to give him time, in the mean while, to draw the necessary drafts in Amsterdam.

We shall be anxious to know, as soon, and as often as possible, your prospects in these negotiations. You will receive herewith a cipher, which will enable you to make them with safety. London and Lisbon (where Colonel Humphreys will forward my letters) will be the safest and best ports of communication. I also enclose two separate commissions for the objects of peace and ransom. To these is added a commission to you as consul for the United States at Algiers, on the possibility that it might be useful for you to remain there till the ratification of the treaties shall be returned from hence: though you are not to delay, till their return, the sending the captives home, nor the necessary payments of money within the limits before prescribed. Should you be willing to remain there, even after the completion of the business, as consul for the United States, you will be free to do so: giving me notice, that no other nomination may be made. These commissions being issued during the recess of the Senate, are in force, by the constitutional provision, to the next session; but you will be able to ushershell them to the next mission, by the present; but you will be able to ushershell them to the next mission, by the present, to which you have been appointed, and which will be a matter of course and of necessity, that you may consider that as certain, and proceed without interruption. I have not mentioned this in the commissions, because it is, in all cases, surplusage, and because it might be difficult of explanation to those to whom you are addressed.

The allowance for all your expenses and time (exclusive of the ransom, price of peace, duties, presents, maintenance and transportation of the captives) is at the rate 2,000 dollars a year, to commence from the day on which you shall set out for Algiers, from whatever place you may take your departure. The particular objects of peace and ransom once out of the way, the 2,000 dollars, annually, are to go in satisfaction of time, services, and expenses of every kind, and you shall act as consul or commissioner for the United States in the manner.

As the duration of this peace cannot be counted on with certainty, and we look forward to the necessity of coercion, by cruises on their coast, to be kept up during the whole of their cruising season, you will be pleased to inform yourself, by this time, whether it is practicable, of every circumstance which may influence or guide us in undertaking and conducting such an operation, making your communications by safe opportunities.

I must recommend to your particular notice Captain O'Brien, one of the captives, from whom we have received a great deal of useful information. The zeal which he has displayed, under the trying circumstances of his present situation, has been very distinguishing. You will find him intimate acquainted with the manner in which, and characters with whom, business is to be done there; and perhaps he may be an useful instrument to you, especially in the outset of your undertaking, which will require the utmost caution, and the best information. He will be able to give you the characters of the European consuls there, though you will probably not think it prudent to repose confidence in any of them.

Should you be able successfully to accomplish the objects of your mission in time to convey notice of it to us as early as possible during the next session of Congress, which meets in the beginning of November, and rises the 4th of March, it would have a very pleasing effect.

I am, with great esteem, &c.

TH. JEFFERSON.

Dear Sir:

The letter I have addressed to Admiral Jones, of which you have had the perusal, has informed us the mission with which the President has thought proper to charge him at Algiers, and how far your agency is desired for the immediate settlement of the papers, for procuring the safe and proper delivery of your noble captives, by redrawing, yourself, on our bankers in Amsterdam, who are instructed to honor your bills, and by acting as a channel of correspondence between us. It is some time, however, since we have heard of Admiral Jones. Should any accident have happened to his life, or should you be unable to learn where he is; or should distance, refusal to act, or any other circumstance, deprive us of his services on this occasion, or be likely to produce too great a delay, of which you are to be the judge, you will then be pleased to send all the papers confided to you for him, to Mr. Thomas Barclay, our consul at Morocco, with the letter addressed to him, which is delivered to you open, and by which you will understand that he is instructed, to every intent and purpose, to take the place of Admiral Jones. You will be pleased not to pass any of the papers confided to you, on this business, through any post office. I have the honor to be, &c.

TH. JEFFERSON.

To Thomas Pinckney.

The letter mentioned as addressed to Mr. Barclay, was in these words:

From the President of the United States, to Thomas Barclay, Esq.

PHILADELPHIA, June 11, 1792.

Sir: Congress having furnished me with means for procuring peace and ransoming our captive citizens from the government of Algiers, I have thought it best, while you are engaged in Morocco, to appoint Admiral Jones to proceed to Algiers, and therefore have sent him a commission for establishing peace, another for the ransom of our captives, and a third to act there as consul for the United States; and full instructions are given, in a letter from the Secretary of State to him, of all which papers, Mr. Pinckney, now proceeding to London as our minister plenipotentiary, is, I presume, in possession of. It is some time, however, since we have heard of Admiral Jones and in the event of any accident to him, it might occasion an injurious delay, were the business left to new commissions from hence; I have thought it best, in such an event, that Mr. Pinckney should forward to you all the papers addressed to Admiral Jones, with this letter, signed by myself, giving you authority, on receipt of those papers, to send the same to Mr. John Paul Jones, whose residence has been under your care for several weeks; you are requested to consider your name in each of them in the place of that of John Paul Jones. You will, of course, finish the business of your mission to Morocco, with all the dispatch practicable, and then proceed to Algiers on that hereby confided to you, where this letter, with the commissions addressed to Admiral Jones, and an explanation of circumstances without a doubt procure you credit, as an agent in the name and on the behalf of the United States, and more especially, when you shall successively prove your authority, by the fact of making, on the spot, the payments you shall stipulate. With full confidence in the prudence and integrity with which you will fulfill the objects of the present mission, I give you this letter the bearer of commissions to such powers, by hereto subscribing my name, this eleventh day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

By a letter of July 3d, the following arrangement for the payment of the moneys was communicated to Mr. Pinckney, to wit:

Philadelphia, July 3, 1792.

Dear Sir:

Enclosed is a letter to our bankers in Amsterdam, covering a bill of exchange drawn on them by the treasurer for one hundred and twenty-three thousand seven hundred and fifty current guilders, which I have endorsed thus: "Philadelphia, July 3, 1792. Enter this to the credit of the Secretary of State for the United States of America. Thomas Jefferson." To prevent the danger of interception, my letter to them makes the whole subject to your order.

I have the honor, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

On Mr. Pinckney’s arrival in England, he learned the death of Admiral J. P. Jones. The delays which were incurred in conveying the papers to Mr. Barclay on this event will be best explained in Mr. Pinckney’s own words, extracted from his letter of December 13, 1792, to the Secretary of State. They are as follows:

"As soon after my arrival here as the death of Admiral J. P. Jones was ascertained, I endeavored to obtain information whether Mr. Barclay was still at Gibraltar, or had returned to Morocco; but not knowing his correspondent here, and Mr. Johnson, our consul, not being able to clear up the uncertainty, it was some time before I learnt that he was still at Gibraltar. The particular injunctions of caution in the conveyance which I received with Mr. Barclay’s despatches, and the secrecy which I knew to be so essential to the success of his operations, determined me to entrust them to none but a confidential person. I accordingly endeavored to find some one of our countrymen (who are frequently here without much business) who might be induced to undertake the conveyance; but though, in addition to my own inquiries, I requested our consul and several American gentlemen to undertake a confidential person to undertake a journey for me, without naming the direction, it was a considerable time before I met with success. The rage for quitting the city, which emptied all the western parts of this town during the summer season, seemed to have swept away all our unemployed countrymen, and the failure of Mr. Short’s despatches, for which I could not account, the miscarriage of some of my private letters, added to the extraordinary jealousy and watchfulness of correspondences here, made me unwilling to employ any but an American in this business. At length, however, I prevailed on a Mr. Lennel Cravath, a native and citizen of Massachusetts, to undertake the delivery of the despatches in Mr. Barclay’s hand, whether at Gibraltar or Morocco, and to remain a few weeks with Mr. Barclay, if he should require it, to re-convey his answer; for which service I agreed to pay him one hundred guineas, besides defraying his expenses. No vessel for Gibraltar or any neighboring port offered immediately; but Mr. Cravath availed himself of the first which occurred, and embarked about a month ago in an English vessel bound to Cadiz, from whence he is to be enabled to get to Gibraltar; so that if the wind has proved favorably, Mr. Barclay may by this time have set out on his mission. I fear the terms of Mr. Cravath’s journey will be considered as expensive; but when I reflected on the importance of the object, and the delay which had already occurred, and was about to refuse the offer, I would undoubtedly have given much more had he insisted on it. I trust, however, that Mr. Barclay could not have arrived at a better time at his place of destination, to avoid interruptions in his negotiations from the European Powers, as their attention is now wholly engrossed by the more interesting theatre of politics in Europe."

In the meantime, Mr. Barclay had been urged to use expedition, by the following letter from hence:

Philadelphia, November 14, 1792.

Sir: Your letters to the 10th of September are received. Before this reaches you, some papers will have been sent to you, which, on the supposition that you were engaged in your original mission, were directed to Admiral J. P. Jones, but in the event of his death were to be delivered to you. That event happened. The papers will have so fully possessed you of every thing relating to the subject, that I have nothing more to add, but the most pressing instances to lose no time in effecting the object. In the mean while, the scene of your original mission will perhaps be cleared, so that you may then return and accomplish that.

I am, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

To Thomas Pinckney, Esq.

Mr. Barclay had received the papers, had made preparations for his departure for Algiers, but was taken ill on the 15th, and died on the 19th of January, 1793, at Lisbon. This unfortunate event was known here on the 18th of March, and on the 20th and 21st, the following letters were written to Mr. Pinckney and Colonel Humphreys.

Philadelphia, March 20, 1793.

Dear Sir: The death of Mr. Barclay having rendered it necessary to appoint some other person to proceed to Algiers on the business of peace and ransom, the President has thought proper to appoint Colonel Humphreys, and to send on you a copy of the letter of secret instructions, and the papers to him. I am to ask the favor of you to communicate to Colonel Humphreys whatever information you may be able to give him in this business, in consequence of the agency you have had in it. I have given him authority to draw in his own name on the bankers in Amsterdam for the money deposited in their hands for this purpose, according to the letter I had the honor of writing to you July 30, 1793. I have now that of assuring you of the sincere sentiments of esteem and respect with which I am, &c.

To Thomas Pinckney, Esq.

TH: JEFFERSON.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

PHILADELPHIA, March 21, 1793.

Sir:—The deaths of Admiral Paul Jones, first, and afterwards of Mr. Barclay, to whom the mission to Algiers, explained in the enclosed papers, was successively confided, have led the President to desire you to undertake the execution of it in person. These papers being copies of what had been delivered to them, will serve as your guide. But, Mr. Barclay having also been charged with a mission to Morocco, it will be necessary to give you some trouble with respect to that also.

Mr. Nathaniel Cutting, the bearer hereof, is despatched specially, first to receive from Mr. Pinckney, in London, any papers or information which his agency in the Algerine business may have enabled him to communicate to you. He will then proceed to deliver the whole to you, and accompany and aid you in the character of secretary.

It is thought necessary that you should, in the first instance, settle Mr. Barclay’s accounts respecting the Morocco mission, which will probably render it necessary that you should go to Gibraltar. The communications you have had with Mr. Barclay in this mission, will assist you in your endeavors at a settlement. You know the sum received by Mr. Barclay on that account; and we wish as exact a statement as can be made of the manner in which it has been laid out, and what part of its proceeds have been pleased on by this. Notice of these proceeds now existing. If they, or any part of them, can be used for the Algerine mission, we would have you by all means apply them to that use, debiting the Algerine fund, and crediting that of Morocco with the amount of such application. If they cannot be so used, then dispose of the perishable part to the best advantage; and if you can sell those not perishable for what they cost, do so; and what you cannot so sell, deposit in any safe place under your own power.

In this last stage of the business return us an exact account, first, of the specific articles remaining on hand for that mission, and their value; second, of its cash on hand; third, of any money which may be due to, or from, Mr. Barclay, or any other person on account of this mission; and take measures for replacing the clear balance of cash in the hands of Messrs. W. and T. Willinks and Nichols, and Jacob Van Staphorst and Hubbard.

This matter being settled, you will be pleased to proceed on the mission to Algiers. This you will do by the way of Madrid, if you think any information you can get from Mr. Carmichael, or any other, may be an equivalent for the trouble, expense, and delay, of the journey. If not, proceed in whatever way you may choose to go.

Proper powers and credentials for you, addressed to that Government, are herewith enclosed. The instructions first given to Admiral Paul Jones are so full, that no others need be added, except a qualification in one single article, to wit: Should that Government finally reject peace on the terms in money, to which you are authorized to go, you may or may not make the first payments for peace, and that for ransom, in naval stores, reserving the right to make the subsequent annual payments in money.

You are to be allowed your travelling expenses, your salary as minister resident in Portugal going up; and those expenses must be debited to the Algerine mission, and not carried into your ordinary account of resident. Mr. Cutting is allowed one hundred dollars a month, and his expenses, which, as soon as he joins you, will of course be consolidated with yours. We have made choice of him as particularly qualified to aid, under your direction, in the matters of account, with which he is well acquainted. He receives here advance of one thousand dollars, by draft on our bankers in Holland, in whose hands the fund is deposited. This and all other sums furnished him, to be debited to the Algerine fund. I enclose you a letter to our bankers, giving you complete authority over these funds, which you had better send with your first draft, though I send a copy of it from hence by another opportunity.

This business being done, you will be pleased to return to Lisbon, and to keep yourself and us thereafter well informed of the transactions in Morocco; and as soon as you shall find that the succession to that Government is settled and stable, so that we may know to whom a commissioner may be addressed, be so good as to give us the information, that we may take measures in consequence.

I am, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

To Col. David Humphreys.

Captain Nathaniel Cutting was appointed to be the bearer of these letters, and to accompany and assist Colonel Humphreys, as Secretary, in this mission. It was therefore delivered to him, and his own instructions were given in the following letter:

PHILADELPHIA, March 31, 1793.

Sir:—The Department of State, with the approbation of the President of the United States, having confidential communications for Mr. Pinckney, our Minister Plenipotentiary at London, and Col. Humphreys, our minister resident in that city, it is of the greatest importance that you are cleared to take charge of those communications, to proceed with them in the first American vessel bound to London, and from thence, without delay, to Lisbon, in such way as you shall find best. After your arrival there, you are appointed to assist Colonel Humphreys in the character of secretary, in the business now specially confided to him, and will be accountable, by retum directly to the United States, or receive your discharge from Col. Humphreys, at your own option.

You are to receive, in consideration of these services, one hundred dollars a month, besides the reasonable expenses of travelling by land and sea (apparel not included) of yourself and a servant; of which expenses you are to render an account and receive payment from Colonel Humphreys, if you take your discharge from him, or otherwise from the Secretary of State, if you return to this place; and in either case, Colonel Humphreys is authorized to furnish you moneys on account, within the limits of your allowances; which allowances are understood to have begun on the 20th day of the present month, when you were engaged on this service, and to continue until your discharge or return. You receive here one thousand dollars on account, to enable you to proceed.

TH: JEFFERSON, Secretary of State.

To Captain Nathaniel Cutting.

But, by a vessel which sailed on the day before, from this port to Lisbon directly, and whose departure was not known till an hour before, the following letter was hastily written and sent:

PHILADELPHIA, March 30, 1793.

Dear Sir:—Having very short notice of a vessel just sailing from this port for Lisbon, direct, I think it proper to inform you summarily, that powers are made out for you to proceed. Captain Cutting, who is to assist you in this special business as Secretary, leaves this place three days hence, and will proceed in the British packet by way of London, and thence to Lisbon, where he will deliver you the papers. The instructions to you are in general to settle Mr. B’s Morocco account, and take care of the effects provided for that business, applying such of them as are proper to the Algerine mission; and as to the residue, converting the perishable part of it into cash, and having the other part safely kept. You will be pleased to be preparing and doing in this, what can be done before the arrival of Mr. Cutting, that there may be as little delay as possible.

I am, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

To Colonel David Humphreys.
Captain Cutting took his passage in a vessel bound for London, which sailed about the 15th or 14th of April; but he did not leave England till the 5th of September; and on the 17th of that month, Colonel Humphreys embarked from Lisbon for Gibraltar, from whence he wrote the letter herewith communicated, of October the 8th last, informing us of the truce of a year, concluded between Algiers and Portugal, and from whence he was to proceed to Algiers.

These are the circumstances which have taken place since the date of the former reports of December 28th, 1793. And on consideration of them, it cannot but be obvious, that whatever expectations might have been formed of the negotiations between Algiers and Gibraltar, at its first projection, or the subsequent renewals to which unfortunate events gave occasion, they must now be greatly diminished, if not entirely abandoned. While the truce with two such commercial nations as Portugal and Holland has so much lessened the number of vessels exposed to the capture of the Barbary corsairs, it has speeded the door which lets them out upon our commerce, and ours alone; as, with the other nations navigating the Atlantic, they are at peace. Their first successes will probably give them high expectations of future advantage, and leave them little disposed to relinquish them on any terms.

A circumstance to be mentioned here, is, that our resident and consul at Lisbon have thought instantaneous warning to our commerce, to be of such weight, of sufficient importance to justify the hiring a Swedish vessel to come here express with the intelligence; and there is no fund out of which that hire can be paid.

To these details relative to Algiers, it is to be added, as to Morocco, that their internal war continues; that the succession is not likely soon to be settled; and that, in the mean time, their vessels have gone into such a state of decay, as to leave our commerce in no present danger for want of the recognition of our treaty; but that still it will be important in to readiness to obtain it, the first moment that any person shall be so established in that Government, as to give a hope that his recognition will be valid.

December 14, 1793.

Mr. Humphreys to the Secretary of State.

GIBRALTAR, September 26th, 1793.

Sir:

After a very favorable passage, we landed at this garrison on Sunday last, and the next day proceeded with all the despatch and diligence in our power, to unpick the different articles of public property left here by the late Mr. Thomas Barclay, and to select such as might be proper for the object you propose. We have not as yet made sufficient progress as to enable us to give you the full particulars.

I have seen Mr. Maitre, the British consul for Morocco, who informs me there is very little change in the state of affairs since last winter. The harvest was good. The exportation of wheat has been allowed; but is prohibited on the remonstrance of the people, who have been so much distressed by scarcity, as to dread the consequences of farther extraction.

Mr. Mave, the new British consul for Algiers, is still here. All the intelligence I can gain from that place, is contained in a letter of an old date from Mr. Logie to him. At the time when that letter was written, the plague still continued to rage, and ten of the Dutch captives had died of it. The plague has absolutely cut off all intercourse, so that nothing has been heard from the Americans in captivity there, since I was here last winter.

The frigate which escorted Mr. Lucas to Tripoli, returned here yesterday. Mr. Tully, the former consul, who came in it, I understand reports rebellion and confusion to exist in a dreadful degree in that country.

The wind came round yesterday to the eastward, so as to enable the convoy frigates Léghorn to sail from this port for England. This is a rich fleet, and the first convoy from the Mediterranean since the war.

I have concluded to go to Alicante, and hope (for many reasons) to be able to sail in company with the Portuguese fleet, mentioned in my late letters, and which may be expected whenever the wind becomes fair.

It is confidently asserted that the project for the surrender of Marseilles has miscarried, and that the republicans have made an amazing slaughter of the royalists.

Had not the cession of Toulon taken place on the very day it did, it would almost certainly have been prevented the next day by the arrival of troops in the town. Lord Hood's conduct appears to be considered here as almost rash, though successful, and the issue somewhat dubious, though in some way or another it must be important.

The commanding officers of the combined forces at Toulon have sent to all quarters for succors. The Spanish, English, and Royalist forces in that town, amount to nearly 10,000. The former an indifferent corps. The second weak in number, (2,000) both sailing ships in the outer town, the combined troops have had the worst of it. A valuable English officer (belonging to this garrison) of my acquaintance, was killed in one of them. Yesterday three ships of war arrived here from Toulon, to solicit and transport a reinforcement from this garrison. The Governor has already named officers of engineers and artillery for that service; and I think he will send some troops without waiting for orders from his court.

General O'Hara, with whom I dined yesterday, informed me an intelligent correspondent wrote him from Toulon "there is no news from Paris, except that of the death of the Queen." This, however, coming through no other channel, seems doubtful.

Admiral Gell and other officers of high rank write pressingly for all manner of cates and drinkables. If we had but the free navigation of the Mediterranean, what an extensive market would be open for our produce!

With sentiments of perfect respect and esteem,

I have the honor to be. &c.

D. HUMPHREYS.

The Secretary of State.

Mr. Humphreys to the Secretary of State.

GIBRALTAR, October 8, 1793.

Sir:

I have already forwarded for you five copies of despatches, to inform you that a truce for twelve months was concluded between Portugal and Algiers, and that a fleet of Algerine cruisers had gone through the straits into the Atlantic, on Saturday night last. They were reported to me by an officer of a Portuguese frigate, who spoke with them, to consist of eight sail; I believe, however, there were but three frigates, two yachts, and a brig. This morning another Algerine frigate was in this harbor, and has gone through the straits to the westward.

To multiply the chances of getting early information to you, I am sending off to order neutral vessels to be chartered at Cadiz and Lisbon to carry my despatches to you, if they cannot otherwise be transmitted by the most expedients and certain conveyances, and these vessels are ordered to put into the first port in the United States they can reach.

With sentiments of great esteem, &c.

D. HUMPHREYS.
SIR:—Yesterday, the 11th, I received the following note from Colonel Humphreys, our minister resident at this court, but now at Gibraltar:

"DEAR SIR: We have advice of a truce between the Portuguese and Algiers, and that an Algerine fleet has gone into the Atlantic. Pray forward the enclosed with the intelligence, and believe me yours,

Immediately on the receipt of this very alarming news, I called together all the American captains now in this port, and communicated the intelligence to them, after having first written a letter on the very same subject, which I have now so often obtained from a friendly and always well informed Portuguese gentleman, which was, that on the 5th instant an Algerine fleet, consisting of eighteen ships, had been seen by a Portuguese frigate (just arrived) sailing out of the Mediterranean, consisting of two brigs, carrying 44, 36, 30, and 28 guns; three yachts, 24, 26, and 30 guns; and one brigantine of 22 guns. Their course was to the southward, and at the same time they were made up with the foresail, gallant mast head, and a flag with blue and white, or blue and yellow stripes, at the main-top-gallant-mast head. Early this morning I waited on his Excellency Luis Pinto de Louza, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, on the subject of this unexpected event, and the unfortunate situation in which it had placed not only the American captains now here, but our nation at large, whose injury seems to have been particularly meditated in this negotiation. Mr. Louza received me with great politeness, and anticipating the cause of my visit, informed me that he was at the moment of my arrival occupied in writing to me on the subject, but was better pleased to see me, as he could more fully and particularly explain the nature of this business to me in a voice than by letter, and assured me that he would candidly communicate to me how far the court of Portugal were concerned, or chargeable for the mischances resulting from this truce, to all those Powers not at peace with Algiers. He declared that it was as unexpected to the court of Portugal, as it could be to us; and if it was not quite so unwelcome, yet it was by no means agreeable to their court, who never intended to conclude either a peace or truce with the Dey, without giving timely notice to their ministers. It might avoid the dangers to which it might otherwise be unavailing exposed by trust- ing to the protection of the Portuguese ships of war stationed in the Mediterranean. He acknowledged that the court of Portugal had about six months past expressed to the courts of England and Spain, a desire of their friendly commerce, in the administration of the business of trade towards those parts, as the Algerine controversy was not conducted with that Free and Frankness which Portugal would have had a right to expect from the Ministers of the two greatest, and most Faithful Majesty; but having appointed no person directly or indirectly to negotiate in behalf of her Majesty, they considered the business as only in embryo. But the British court, zealous over much for the happiness of the two nations, Portugal and Algiers, in order to precipitate this important business, very efficiously authorized Charles Lord Towns, our present minister at Lisbon, and Charles Martin, the British consul at Algiers, not only to treat, but to conclude, for and in behalf of the court, not only without authority, but without even consulting it. A truce was accordingly concluded between the Dey and the British agent (for twelve months) in behalf of her Most Faithful Majesty; for the performance of which, on the part of her Majesty, the British court is guarantied. The condition is, that this court shall pay to the Dey one thousand and as much as he receives annually from the court of Algiers. When this court received information of the proposed condition from Mr. Walpole, the British envoy to this court, they informed him, that, however desirable they might be of a peace with Algiers, they were so far from being disposed to submit to such a condition, that it was the determination of this court, as far as they could, to the contrary of the terms proposed by that gentleman. It was signed by the self constituted agent, Mr. Logie. The minister, Mr. Pinto, farther informed me, that this court had ordered an augmentation of the number of armed ships on the Mediterranean station, so little was there a expectation of a peace or truce with Algiers; and intimated that the Algerines would probably ere long be at liberty to cruise than at present, and mentioned less than a month. But though I have great confidence in his sincerity, and in the good wishes and disposition towards us of many of the Portuguese nobility, and of their sincere hatred of the English, yet the prince is young, weak, and obstinate; and can, and probably will, determine, as his own caprice, or Martin de Mello, may direct. The conduct of the British in this business leaves no room to doubt or mistake their object, which was evidently aimed at us, and proves that their envy, jealousy, and hatred, will never be appeased, and that they will leave nothing unattainted to effect our ruin. As a farther confirmation, it is worthy of remark, that the same British agent obtained a truce at the same time between the States of Holland and the Dey, for six months, whereby we and the Huns Tows are now left the only prey to those barbarous and blood thirsty people. The political cost the English very dear, as the Algerines had profited much by captures from the Dutch since the commencement of the late hostilities between the two nations. This will, I fear, give a fatal stroke to the advantages which we have derived from our neutrality.

Monday, 14th. I have just received a letter from Gibraltar, of the 8th, with orders to charter a vessel to carry the intelligence to you, copy of which letter I send herewith. At this moment a Swedish vessel arrives. On the 9th, in lat. 38, 13, she was boarded by an Algerine frigate. At a small distance she saw another, which had just captured a brigantine. Two brigs, one ship, and one schooner had one of our ships. The British arm in the truce, and that it was for twelve months with both Holland and Portugal. I have forwarded letters by express, wherever I thought it necessary, to notify our citizens of their danger. We are betrayed, and many, many of our countrymen will fall into the cruel snare. I send you a list of those in this port. I have chartered a ship this moment, a £500 sterling, to carry my letter to Mr. Livingston, to whom I refer you for farther particulars, which, in my great hurry, I may omit. I have not slept since receipt of the news of the hellish plot—pardon me for such expressions. Another corsair is in the Atlantic. God save us.

I have chartered the vessel to go and return with a cargo of wheat or flour, to this port or Cadiz, for 800 sterling. Her freight back will go far to pay the expense of her hire.

If it should be thought that I have chartered the vessel at a high price, I wish the Government to be informed, that I have not entered into this contract with a idea of the advantage of this Algerine news; and I have been rather favored in the contract which I have made, and therefore hope no blame will fall on me, but that I shall be enabled by the Government to fulfil my engagement.

I have, on this occasion, written to you, the facts, which I received from undoubted authority, though contradicted by the minister Luis Pinto, and at present a great secret, that one of the present Portuguese ministers is in the execrable plot—a plot loudly and publicly execrated by this nation. I asked if it was Martinho de Mello? and was answered, that all his consequence, and his pecuniary resources, were derived from the Mediterranean fleet, or Algerine war, and of course, he had daily fallen under suspicion. It was a fact, the minister directly informed me, that one of the four ministers had been privy to the whole transaction, but could not fix its but could and would tell me very soon. At present he seemed disposed rather to suspect the first minister, the Marquis Pinta de Lopes, but this intelligence is not at present in use. The minister also intimated to me, that he was to be sent to an ambassador, on his taking leave of the court to go to Algiers to negotiate a peace. "Sir, the ships attend you; you will therefore proceed without delay on your embassy. But remember what I have said, and what I now repeat, on the greatest consequence, (meaning to himself) if you succeed in making a peace, it will be well, but if you should not, remember all the reasons which, had you been advised, your own safety, and your country's may enable you to form a more adequate idea of this court than I should be able to give you. It is with this view that I trouble you with them.

One of the frights now crawling under Algerine colors was a present from the King of Spain, but not very lately; and one is certainly a very late present from the British King.

The Hon. the Secretary of State.

I am, sir, &c.

EDWARD CHURCH.
Gibraltar, October 7, 1793.

D. Humphreys, Esq. to the Secretary of State.

Sir:—I wrote to you under yesterday's date, letters to be forwarded by four different conveyances, containing information that a truce for twelve months was concluded between Portugal and Algiers; and that a fleet of eight Algerine frigates had gone through the Straits into the Atlantic.

I observed in a postscript, that I should afterwards explain by whose instrumentality the truce was made. I have now to inform you, it was effected by Mr. Logie, consul of Great Britain, at Algiers; but I am very happy to add, there are strong circumstances to induce me to believe, it was without the authority, or even knowledge, of his own court, from which (I am most credibly assured) he has not received any direct official communications for fourteen months past. This was owing to his having been recalled, and a successor appointed for that residence. By what I have learned in a confidential manner, from good authority, Mr. Logie wishes to remain at Algiers until the final negotiation between that regency and Portugal be concluded.

The strong easterly wind, called the Levantar, has prevented the Portuguese convoy, mentioned in my last letters, from proceeding any distance up the Mediterranean. The same cause still delays the English ships with troops on board, in this harbor, though a second vessel has arrived with despatches from Lord Hood to accelerate their departure. In consequence of this last arrival, some more artillerists, with field artillery, have been detached from this garrison; and General O'Hara (the Lieutenant Governor) is going to take the chief command at Toulon.

By yesterday's mail we have nothing but an account of the Duke of York's repulse, with the loss of his cannon and baggage; and considerable advantage gained by the Spaniards over the French near Perpignan.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

D. HUMPHREYS.

P. S. I shall prosecute my former plan of proceeding to Alicant, the moment the wind will permit.

The Secretary of State.

Copy of Mr. Church's first letter to Messrs. Jacob Dohrman & Co.

Lisbon, October 15, 1793.

Sirs:—I am informed that you have an inclination to charter a Danish ship to send to America on speculation, but that the difference of about one hundred pounds sterling prevents the bargain being closed. I think it probable, that neutral ships of that description will readily obtain a high freight in any port of the United States. But, if a hundred pounds sterling will induce you to close the charter immediately, put the ship in immediate readiness, so as to sail in all this week, if possible, and will change her proposed destination, which I understand is to Baltimore, for New York or Philadelphia, in order that I may send duplicates of some despatches to our Government, I will engage to pay you, in behalf of the said Government, one hundred pounds sterling, on demand, in Lisbon, after advice of the seller of said despatches has been received by the hands of the Secretary of State for the United States of America; provided advice should not be received of the payment of said sum in America, by the return of your ship to Europe, which I shall recommend in a letter to the Secretary of State accompanying my despatches.

MESSRS. JACOB DOHRMAN & CO.

I am, sirs, yours,

EDWARD CHURCH.

Copy of Mr. Dohrman's answer to the above.

Lisbon, October 15, 1793.

Sirs:—I presume you are no stranger to my strong attachment to your Government, and that I am perfectly disposed to render every possible service to the United States of America; but the freight demanded for the Swede or Dane is so high, as may expose me to great loss, which I am sure you would not wish; but if you think you can venture to add another fifty pounds, I will take the risk for one hundred and fifty pounds sterling, and change her destination for New York, and will take charge of a messenger with your despatches, deliverable at that place.

Fifty pounds can be no object to the United States, but may be of consequence to an individual. If this proposal should be acceptable to you, I will close with one of the captains immediately.

For the payment, you will give me a bill for the above sum, to be paid to the order of my house, after delivery of the despatches in America, according to the then current exchange upon London.

I am, sir, &c.,

JACOB DOHRMAN.

Copy of Messrs. Church's letter to Messrs. Dohrman, in answer to the foregoing.

Lisbon, October 15, 1793, 9 o'clock, P. M.

Sirs:—Your favor, in answer to my proposals of this morning, is just received. The good character of the vessel, and a reliance on your exertions to put her to sea immediately, and that you will not detain her a moment for any freight more than is already absolutely engaged, induce me to comply with your demand of fifty pounds more than I proposed; and will accordingly give you a bill for one hundred and fifty pounds sterling, upon the conditions already stipulated.

At the same time I wish you to understand, that I am acting in this business without any special authority, and I consider myself warranted solely, by the importance and extreme urgency of the occasion; but should the Secretary of State be of a different opinion, and therefore think that he is not authorized to honor my bill, you will then be pleased to consider that it is an error in judgment on my part, and that neither the honor of the United States, or my credit, are, or ought to be, any way affected by this transaction, and you may rely on being fully indemnified by me on receipt of the protest.

I am, sirs, yours, &c.,

EDWARD CHURCH.

MESSRS. JACOB DOHRMAN & CO.

D. Browne to E. Church, Esq.

Oporto, October 15, 1793.

Sirs:—I received yesterday noon, by express, the honor of your very esteemed favor of the 11th instant, to desire me to inform the masters of the vessels from the United States of America, that may be here or in the neighboring ports, that, in consequence of a truce being concluded and signed between the United States and Algiers, a Frigate of that nation, consisting of four large frigates, two xebecs, and one brig, from 22 to 44 guns, and, accordingly, to desire them not to proceed to sea, till they hear from you again, as several of these pirates are now hovering round your's and this coast. Immediately on the receipt of your letter, I sent for the masters of the only two American vessels that we have here remaining, viz: snow Phenix, Isaac Rea master, from Salem; ship Patty and Julia, Charles Dickinson, from New London. They both acknowledged their most grateful thanks for your care in writing them by express, that they might escape the danger that awaited them, and will not proceed till your further orders. Unfortunately, on the 11th instant, sailed from hence the schooner Fayette, captain Wyatt, and the brig Rosanna, captain Hooker Baxter, both bound to Boston. God grant to have preserved them from the sight of such an infamous and cruel enemy. I dont hear that there are any American vessels in the ports of Viamna, Caminha, or Averico, but I am going immediately to write to these several ports, to transmit them your instructions. I have to acquaint you, sir, that last week entered this port an English letter of marque, named the Oporto, captain Hamilton, from Lisbon, who captured on his passage here an American vessel named the Birmingham, William Foster, master, bound from Lisbon to London, on suspicion of his being destined to some port in France, her cargo consisting as per note enclosed, and by which you will please to observe, that the three black sailors therein mentioned, are free American born, and, notwithstanding, they are forced to remain on board against their will.

I have the honor, &c.

LIBRAN, October 21, 1793.

SIR: I waited on your Excellency the 19th inst. at Queluz, but was unfortunately deprived by your absence of the honor of an interview. I therefore take the liberty to address your Excellency by letter, and to solicit, in behalf of my fellow-citizens now in this port, protection and safe conduct out of the reach and danger of the Algerine corsairs now on this coast. My countrymen have been led, not less innocently than the citizens of the Hanseatic Towns, into their present embarrassment, by confiding the friendship, power, and protection of their most Faithful Majesty, who, having long kept a fleet stationed in the Mediterranean, for the purpose of confining those pirates within circumscribed limits, and to secure freedom of commerce to her friends and her own kingdom, had nourished that confidence, and of course bullied our citizens into a fatal security. This confidence, however, so far as respects the purity of her Majesty’s intentions, and the good faith of her ministers, appears still to be well founded; for this belief I have no less authority than your Excellency’s declaration to me, and it is upon this presumption that I take the liberty to request your Excellency’s mediation with her most Faithful Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to grant the same relief and protection to the citizens and ships of the United States, as her Majesty has offered to those of the Hanseatic Towns, in consideration of their being in the same predicament, and from the same cause, and that we are a nation in no view less friendly, and in every view at least equally useful and important to this kingdom at present as all of your Majesty’s subjects. I have written her Majesty a full account of our future probable consequence to these nations, who shall favor us with their friendship. Permit me to hope, sir, that these considerations will have weight, and that the justice of our claim will supersede the necessity of an absolute existing treaty between this kingdom and the United States; and the more, as your Excellency will be pleased to recollect that endeavors have not been wanting on our part, long ere this, to have convinced our interests with this nation by the strongest ties, in which, though we doubtless had a view to our own advantage, yet I am persuaded it was our equal aim to have formed the treaty upon such a basis as would have proved reciprocally advantageous, without which we were well aware that it could not be durable. I would therefore hope, that her most Faithful Majesty will not deny us the favor we ask, because we are not so closely connected with your nation as we wish, and have endeavored to be. When I had the honor of an interview with your Excellency, on the 12th instant, on the subject of your truce with Algiers, it appeared to me, by an article in the said truce, that her Majesty was restricted from affording protection to any nation at war with Algiers; but, as this restriction has been dispensed with in favor of one nation, I would humbly hope and presume that the same power will be extended towards the citizens of the United States, who, I trust, have an equal claim to her Majesty’s favor and protection.

I have chartered a second neutral ship to carry the duplicates of my despatches to America, which will be ready to sail to-morrow; but, as your Excellency’s answer to this petition will be among the most important matters which I shall have to communicate, permit me to request that favor as soon as circumstances will permit.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

EDW'D CHURCH.

His Excellency Luis Pinto de Souza, Minister, &c.

Mr. Church to the Secretary of State.

LIBRAN, Tuesday, October 3, 1793.

SIR: On Saturday, the 19th instant, the vessels belonging to the Hanseatic Towns were ordered to be in readiness to sail the 29th, under convoy of two Portuguese frigates, ordered by her Majesty to convoy them to a certain latitude. One of the articles of the truce with Algiers, which was communicated to me on the 12th instant, by Luis Pinto, the minister for foreign affairs, expressly restricted the Portuguese from affording protection (without exception) to any one nation. Nevertheless, the consul and agent for the Hanseatic Towns petitioned for a convoy, and strongly urged a right, founded on a prior treaty, of a very ancient date, existing between the two nations. This was generally understood to be the principle upon which the convoy was granted; and was so publicly declared by the agent but on strong reasons to believe that this Government not being means pleased with the conditions of the truce, or the manner in which it had been negotiated, for, and not by this nation, and that, though they did not think proper formally to disavow and reject it, yet that they would not be displeased if a plausible pretence should offer to break it. I was also convinced that a great majority, if not the whole nation, were extremely offended.

for various reasons; they conceived it intended not only to throw on them the odium of the manifest treachery in the business, but that it was also aimed at their navy, which was now an object of their particular attention, and which, for want of some employment, would again sink into neglect, which they suppose to have been one object of the English in so eagerly resorting to the hypothesis that such a measure is the better agreeable and opinion, and my knowledge that the Spanish ambassador, when on court at the 19th instant, had been treated rather more politely than all the nobility present, when he congratulated the prince on the happy event of the truce. I wrote a letter to the minister yesterday, of which I transmit you a copy per this opportunity; and, as I have been diligent in my inquiries prior to my writing, and am particularly favored and supplied with two very distinguished personnages here, who have honored me with some particular attentions, I am greatly flattered with hopes of success. If I find there is a prospect of a speedy and favorable answer, it is probable I may detain the vessel a day or two, in order to convey some intelligence, which will be so very important and acceptable to the United States.

I have taken the liberty to draw on you the 19th instant, for one hundred and fifty pounds sterling, in favor of Messrs. Jacob Dohrmann & Co. as a compensation for their chartering a ship, at a price which they had before refused, for altering her destination, agreeable to my request, and for suffering the vessel to go with only two-thirds the quantity of vessels which are usually sent, and the vessels of the said States shall enjoy, in their passage, the same protection which she has ordered to be extended to the vessels of the Hanseatic Towns, in the occupation of the ratification of the truce adjusted between her Most Faithful Majesty and the regency of Algiers. Provided, nevertheless, that the vessels of the United States which shall desire to shelter themselves under the protection of the said convoy, shall unite and assemble in sufficient numbers to merit to be convoyed; as this measure cannot be practised in favor of a few, for clear reasons, which manifest themselves.

I am, with the greatest esteem, sir, your servant,

LUIS PINTO DE SOUZA.

The Secretary of State for the United States of America.

In answer to the letter you addressed to me yesterday's date, on the protection and convoy which you solicited in favor of the vessels of the United States of America, which have to sail to their destinations, in danger from the cruisers of Algiers, I am ordered to inform you, that her Most Faithful Majesty, desirous of manifesting to the said States whatever may benefit their navigation or commerce as far as may be compatible with her own supreme justice, is very ready to give her royal orders that the vessels of the said States shall enjoy, in their passage, the same protection which she has ordered to be extended to the vessels of the Hanseatic Towns, in the conclusion of the ratification of the truce adjusted between her Most Faithful Majesty and the regency of Algiers. Provided, nevertheless, that the vessels of the United States which shall desire to shelter themselves under the protection of the said convoy, shall unite and assemble in sufficient numbers to merit to be convoyed; as this measure cannot be practised in favor of a few, for clear reasons, which manifest themselves.

I am, with the greatest esteem, sir, your servant,

EDWARD CHURCH.

Palace of Queluz, October 23, 1793.

Sir: I wrote you this morning that I had written to his Excellency Luis Pinto, minister, &c. &c. I herewith send a copy of my letter, and at the same time, have the pleasure to enclose a most favorable, friendly, and pleasing answer from his Excellency, which I have this moment received, and which you will immediately see the necessity of sending to all their vessels, that our merchants may not be exposed to the heavy risk of a supposed desperate risk. I have also the pleasure to inform you, from good authority, through a secret but direct channel, that a remonstrance was yesterday presented to the Prince, by some of the highest and most influential of the nobility, wherein they state, that the late truce has greatly dishonored this nation; that, to ratify it, would be to render the disgrace indelible; or even to accede to a peace or truce on the terms once offered by this nation, which were to withdraw their ships from the Mediterranean, but to pay nothing. They say it is now beneath the dignity of the crown to accept the offers of peace from that nation (supposing a peace admissible with those pratical infidels) upon any other terms than a full indemnification for all losses in maintaining their naval preparations for about ten years in the Mediterranean, for the protection of their commerce against the hostilities of that nation, and declare that it would be far better and more honorable for the nation to maintain eternal war against them than to sign a peace which, in the present state of this English Portuguese truce, which, from present appearances, promises no duration. It is also reported, but not confirmed, that orders are gone to the Portuguese fleet in the straits, not to suffer any vessels captured by the Algerines to be carried into Algiers, if it should appear that they were bound to or from any port belonging to the dominions of Portu-

N. B. The schooner Violet, Captain Babson, sailed for Boston the 7th instant, and has probably escaped. The brig Betsey, Captain Joshua Atkins, sailed for Boston the 9th. The bark Henry, Captain Roberteau, from Newburyport, is arrived this morning from Virginia, but last from Falmouth. Saw nothing of the Alex. EDWD. CHURCH.

LISBON, October 15, 1793.

Arrived in this port, the schooner Alice, or Elsy, of Boston, but last from North Carolina. Same day, arrived, the brigantine Betsey, of Portsmouth, but last from Virginia, and reports that thirteen vessels were ready to sail about the same time, eleven for Cadiz, and two for Lisbon. These vessels had seven weeks passage.

COMMERCIAL PRIVILEGES AND RESTRICTIONS.

Report of the Secretary of State on the Privileges and Restrictions on the Commerce of the United States in Foreign Countries.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 16, 1793.

Sir: According to the pleasure of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of February 23, 1791, I now lay before them a report on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries. In order to keep the subject within those bounds which I supposed to be under the contemplation of the House, I have restrained my statements to those countries only, with which we carry on a commerce of some importance, and to those articles also of our produce, which are of sensible weight in the scale of our exports; and even these articles are sometimes grouped together, according to the degree of favor or restriction with which they are received in each country, and that degree expressed in general terms, without detailing the exact duty levied on each article. To have gone fully into these minutiae, would have been to copy tariffs and books of rates of the different countries, and to have hidden, under a mass of detail, those general and important truths, the extraction of which, in a simple form, I conceived would best answer the inquiries of the House, by condensing material information within those limits of time and attention, which this portion of their duties may justly claim.

The plan, indeed, of minute details, would have been impracticable with some countries, for want of information. Since preparing this report, which was put into its present form in time to have been given in to the last session of Congress, alterations of the conditions of our commerce with some foreign nations have taken place—some of them independent of the war, some arising out of it. France has proposed to enter into a new treaty of commerce with us, on liberal principles; and has, in the mean time, relaxed some of the restraints mentioned in the report. Spain has, by an ordinance of June last, established New Orleans, Pensacola, and St. Augustine, into free ports, for the vessels of friendly nations having treaties of commerce with her, provided they touch for a permit at Corunbih, in Galicia, or at Alcante; and our rice is, by the same ordinance, excluded from that country. The circumstances of the war have necessarily given us freer access to the West Indian Islands, whilst they have also drawn on our navigation, vexations and depredations of the most serious nature.

To have endeavored to describe all these, would have been as impracticable as useless, since the scenes would have been shifting while under description. I therefore think it best to leave the report as it was formed, being adapted to a particular point of time, when things were in their settled order, that is to say, to the summer of 1792. I have the honor to be, &c.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred, by the House of Representatives, the report of a committee on the written message of the President of the United States, of the 14th of February, 1791, with instruction to report to Congress the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with Foreign nations, and the measures which he should think proper to be adopted for the improvement of the commerce and navigation of the same, has had the same under consideration, and thereupon makes the following report:

The countries with which the United States have their chief commercial intercourse, are Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, the United Netherlands, Denmark, and Sweden, and their American possessions; and the articles of export, which constitute the basis of that commerce, with their respective amounts, are:

Pot and Pearl Ash, 839,093
Salted Meats, 599,130
Indigo, 557,379
Horses and Mules, 539,753
Whale Oil, 282,501
Flax Seed, 236,073
Tar, Pitch and Turpentine, 217,177
Live Provisions, 157,745
Ships, 43,580
Foreign Goods, 23,576
620,374

To descend to articles of smaller value than these, would lead into a minuteness of detail neither necessary nor useful to the present object.

The proportions of our exports, which go to the nations before mentioned, and to their dominions, respectively, are as follows:

To Spain, and its dominions, $2,003,907
Portugal, and its dominions, 1,283,462
France, and its dominions, 4,606,735
Great Britain, and its dominions, 9,363,416
The United Netherlands, and their dominions, 1,963,880
Denmark, and its dominions, 224,415
Sweden, and its dominions, 47,240

Our imports from the same countries, are,
Spain, and its dominions, $355,110
Portugal, and its dominions, 395,766
France, and its dominions, 2,068,346
Great Britain, and its dominions, 15,382,438
United Netherlands, and their dominions, 1,172,692
Denmark, and its dominions, 321,364
Sweden, and its dominions, 14,925

These imports consist mostly of articles on which industry has been exhausted.

Our navigation, depending on the same commerce, will appear by the following statement of the tonnage of our own vessels, entering in our ports, from those several nations and their possessions, in one year; that is to say, from October, 1789, to September, 1790, inclusive, as follows:

Portugal, 23,576
France, 116,410
Great Britain, 43,380
United Netherlands, 58,588
Denmark, 14,655
Sweden, 750

Of our commercial objects, Spain receives, favorably, our bread-stuff, salted fish, wood, ships, tar, pitch, and turpentine. On our meals, however, as well as on those of other foreign countries, when re-exported to their colonies, they have lately imposed duties of from half a dollar to two dollars the barrel, the duties being so proportioned to the current price of their own flour, as that both together are to make the constant sum of nine dollars per barrel.

They do not discourage our rice, pot and pearl ash, salted provisions, or whale oils; but these articles, being in small demand at their markets, are carried thither but in a small degree. Their demand for rice, however, is increasing. Neither tobacco nor indigo are received there. Our commerce is permitted with their Canary islands, under the same conditions.

Themselves, and their colonies, are the actual consumers of what they receive from us.

Our navigation is free with the kingdom of Spain; foreign goods being received there in our ships on the same conditions as if carried in their own, or in the vessels of the country of which such goods are the manufacture or produce.

Portugal receives favorably our grain and bread, salted fish, and other salted provisions, wood, tar, pitch, and turpentine.

For flax seed, pot and pearl ash, though not discouraged, there is little demand.

Our ships pay 30 per cent. on being sold to their subjects, and are then free bottoms.

Foreign goods (except those of the East Indies) are received on the same footing in our vessels as in their own, or any others; that is to say, on general duties of from 30 to 38 per cent. and, consequently, our navigation is unsubordinated by them. Tobacco, rice, and meals, are prohibited.

Themselves, and their colonies, consume what they receive from us.

These regulations extend to the Azores, Madeira, and the Cape de Verd islands; except that, in these, meals and rice are received freely.

France receives favorably our bread-stuff, rice, wood, pot and pearl ashes.

A duty of 5 sous the quintal, or nearly 43 cents, is paid on our tar, pitch, and turpentine. Our whale oils pay 6 livres the quintal, and are the only foreign whale oils admitted. Our indigo pays 5 livres the quintal, their own 24; but a difference of quality, still more than a difference of duty, prevents its seeking that market.

Salted beef is received freely for re-exportation; but if for home consumption, it pays five livres the quintal. Other salted provisions pay that duty in all cases, and salted fish is made lately to pay the prohibitory one of 30 livres the quintal.

Our ships are free to carry thither all foreign goods, which may be carried in their own or any other vessels, except tobaccos, not of our own growth; and they participate with theirs, the exclusive carriage of our whale oils and toboaccoes.

During their former government, our tobacco was under a monopoly, but paid no duties; and our ships were freely sold in their ports, and converted into national bottoms. The first National Assembly took from our ships this privilege.

They emancipated tobacco from its monopoly, but, subjected it to duties of 15 sous, 15 sous, the quintal, carried in their own vessels, and twenty-five livres carried in ours; a difference more than equal to the freight of the article.

They and their colonies consume what they receive from us.

Great Britain receives our pot and pearl ashes free, whilst those of other nations pay a duty of two shillings and three pence the quintal. There is an equal distinction in favor of our bar iron; of which article, however, we do not produce enough for our own use.

Woods are free, from us, whilst they pay some small duty from other countries. Indigo and flax seed are free from all countries. Our tar and pitch pay eleven pence, stering, the barrel. From other alien countries they pay about a penny and a third more.

Our tobacco, for their own consumption, pays one shilling and thre pence, stering, the pound, custom and excise, besides heavy expenses of carriage on both sides of the seas, in time of peace, sterling, the pound; seven shillings seven pence, stering, the hundred weight; which, rendering it too dear as an article of common food, it is consequently used in very small quantity.

Our salted fish, and other salted provisions, except bacon, are prohibited. Bacon and whale oils are under prohibitory duties; as to internal consumption unless, in times of all and any of our own productions and manufactures. A subsequent act, indeed, has authorized their Executive to permit the carriage of our own productions in our own bottoms, at its sole discretion; and the permission has been given, from year to year, by proclamation, but subject every moment to be withdrawn on that single will, in which event, our vessels having anything on board, stand interdicted from the entry of all British ports. The disadvantage of a tenure which may be so suddenly discontinued, was experienced by our merchants on a late occasion, * when an official notification, that this law would be strictly enforced, gave them just apprehensions for the fate of their vessels and cargoes despatched or destined to the ports of Great Britain. The minister of that court, indeed, frankly expressed his personal conviction, that the words of the order went farther than was intended, and so he afterwards officially informed us; but the embarrassments of the moment were real and great, and the possibility of their renewal lay our commerce to that country under the same species of discouragement as to other countries, where it is regulated by a single legislator; and the distinction is too remarkable not to be noticed, that our navigation is excluded from the security of fixed laws, while that security is given to the navigation of others.

Our vessels pay, in their ports, one shilling and nine pence, stering, per ton, light and trinity dues, more than is paid by British ships, except in the little trinity commonwealth, where the weight and value of what they receive from us, is re-exported to other countries, under the useless charges of an intermediate deposite, and double voyage. From tables published in England, and composed, as is said, from the books of their custom-houses, it appears, that, of the indigo imported there in the years 1773, '4, '5, one-third was re-exported to the colonies, with like authority, we learn, that, of the rice and tobacco imported there before the war, four-fifths were re-exported. We are assured, indeed, that the quantities sent thither for re-exportation, since the war, are considerably diminished, yet less so than reason and national interest would dictate. The whole of our grain is re-exported when wheat is below fifty shillings the quarter, and other grains in proportion.

The United Netherland prohibit our pickled beef and pork, meals and bread of all sorts, and lay a prohibitory duty on spirits distilled from grain. All our other productions are received on varied duties, which may be reckoned, on a medium, at about three per cent.

They consume but a small proportion of what they receive. The residue is partly forwarded for consumption in their own societies, partly consumed and partly re-shipped to other maritime countries. On the latter portion they intercept between us and the consumer so much of the value as is absorbed by the charges attending an intermediate deposit. Foreign goods, except some East India articles, are received in vessels of any nation. Our ships may be sold and naturalized there, with exceptions of one or two privileges, which somewhat lessen their value.

Denmark lays considerable duties on our tobacco and rice, carried in their own vessels, and half as much more, if carried in ours; but the exact amount of these duties is not perfectly known here. They lay such as amount to prohibitions on our indigo and corn.

Sweden receives favorably our grains and meals, salted provisions, indigo, and whale oil.

They subject our rice to duties of sixteen mills the pound weight, carried in their own vessels, and of forty per cent. additional, on that, or twenty mills, carried in ours or any others. Being thus rendered more dear, though possibly a little cheaper than other foreign goods, the rice, exported thither, is consumed here, instead of in the other countries, where it is more valuable.

Andorra lays, in common with other countries of the same family, duties on our rice, salted fish, and other foreign productions, very heavy.

Our vessels are charged proportionately on the rice, salted fish, and other foreign productions, which is carried thither our own produce. Her vessels alone, may take it from us, and bring us in exchange, rum, molasses, sugar, coffee, cocoa nuts, ginger, and pimento. There are, indeed, some freedoms, as to the rice, in the island of Dominica, but under such circumstances, as to be little used by us. We have, however, no such advantage in the British continental colonies, and in Newfoundland, where our productions are prohibited, and our vessels forbidden to enter their ports. Their Governors, however, in times of distress, have power to permit a temporary importation of certain articles, in their own bottoms, but not in ours. Our citizens cannot reside as merchants or factors, within any of the British plantations, and are expressly prohibited to reside in any of our own.

Great Britain admits in her islands our vegetables, live provisions, horses, wood, tar, pitch, and turpentine, rice, and bread stuff, by proclamation. The Executive, limited always to the term of a year, but never renewed, are empowered to prohibit our salted fish and other salted provisions. She does not permit our vessels to carry thither our own produce. Her vessels alone, may take it from us, and bring us in exchange, rum, molasses, sugar, coffee, cocoa nuts, ginger, and pimento. There are, indeed, some freedoms, as to the rice, in the island of Dominica, but under such circumstances, as to be little used by us. We have, however, no such advantage in the British continental colonies, and in Newfoundland, where our productions are prohibited, and our vessels forbidden to enter their ports. Their Governors, however, in times of distress, have power to permit a temporary importation of certain articles, in their own bottoms, but not in ours. Our citizens cannot reside as merchants or factors, within any of the British plantations, and are expressly prohibited to reside in any of our own.

The Statute of 12 Car. 2. c. 18, commonly called the navigation act.

In the Danish American possessions, a duty of 5 per cent. is levied on our corn, corn meal, rice, tobacco, wood, salted fish, indigo, horses, mules, and live stock, and 10 per cent. on our flour, salted pork, and beef tar, pitch, and turpentine. * April 12, 1792.
COMMERCIAL PRIVILEGES AND RESTRICTIONS.

In the American islands of the United Netherlands and Sweden, our vessels and produce are received, subject to duties, not so heavy as to have been complained of; but they are heavier in the Dutch possessions on the continent.

To sum up these restrictions, so far as they are important:

Free.
In Europe—
Our bread stuff is at most times under prohibitory duties in England, and considerably dutied on re-exportation from Spanish and other colonies.
Our tobacco is heavily dutied in England, Sweden, and France, and prohibited in Spain and Portugal.
Our rice is heavily dutied in England and Sweden, and prohibited in Portugal.
Our fish and salted provisions are prohibited in England, and under prohibitory duties in France.
Our whale oils are prohibited in England and Portugal.
And our vessels are denied naturalization in England, and of late in France.

Second. In the West Indies—
All intercourse is prohibited with the possessions of Spain and Portugal.
Our salted provisions and fish are prohibited by England.
Our bread stuff (except maize) are received under temporary laws only, in the dominions of France, and our salted fish pay a small duty.

Third. In the article of navigation.
Our own carriage of our own tobacco is heavily dutied in Sweden, and lately in France.
We can carry no article, not of our own production, to the British ports in Europe. Nor even our own produce to her American possessions.

Such being the restrictions on the commerce and navigation of the United States, the question is, in what way they may best be removed, modified, or counteracted.

As to commerce, two methods occur. 1. By friendly arrangements with the several nations with whom these restrictions exist, or 2. By the separate act of our own Legislatures for countervailing their effects. In the first of these two, friendly arrangement is the most eligible. Instead of embarrasing commerce under piles of regulations, duties, and prohibitions, they are relieved from all its shackles in all parts of the world; could every country be employed in producing that which nature has best fitted it to produce, and be they free to exchange with others mutual surpluses for mutual wants, the greatest mass possible would then be produced of those things that contribute to human life and human happiness; the numbers of mankind would be increased, and their condition bettered.

Would even a single nation begin with the United States this system of free commerce, it would be advisable to effect arrangements with the nations since it is one by one only, that it can be extended to all. Where the circumstances of either party render it expedient to place upon the other a duty of importance, could the freedom of trade be modified, in that particular, by mutual and equal restrictions, measures, preserving it entire in all others.

Some nations, not yet ripe for free commerce in all its extent, might still be willing to modify its restrictions and regulations for their own advantage, to the advantages which an intercourse with us might offer. Particularly they may concur with us in reciprocating the duties to be levied on each side, or in compensating any excess of duty by equal advantages of another nature. Our commerce is certainly of a character to entitle it to favor in most countries. The commodities we offer are either necessaries of life, or materials for manufactures, or convenient subjects of revenue; and we take in return those things which we may not produce, or we have produced the last finish of art and industry, or mere luxuries. Such customers may reasonably expect welcome and friendly treatment at every market.

Customers, too, whose demands, increasing with their wealth and population, must very shortly give full employment to the whole industry of any nation whatever, in any line of supply they may get into the habit of calling for from it.

But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitory duties, and regulations, it behoves us to protect our citizens, their commerce, and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations, also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations, nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them.

Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry, it is valuable, but as a resource of defence, it is essential. Its value, as a branch of industry, is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace, it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in times of war, it is to be said, that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers, shall be at war with each other, that it is, if not itself a means of transport, at least a means of support to those of whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are the least sufficient; or it will be disarmament of its defence, its productions will lie at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of opposing them, its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce. The carriage of our own commodities, if it can be done in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we may desire. If we lose the seamen and artists whom it now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defence, and time will be required to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring to our feelings, the error of having abandoned them.

The measures for maintaining an income of share of navigation, are ours in abundance. And, as to the mode of using them, we have only to adopt the principles of those who thus put us on the defensive, or others equivalent and better fitted to their object.

The measures,一经 principles, being founded in reciprocity, appear perfectly just, and to offer no cause of complaint to any nation.

1. Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs; first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here, in competition with our own of the same kind; selecting such manufactures as we take from them in greatest quantity, and which at the same time we could the sooner furnish to ourselves, or obtain from other countries, lighter at first, but heavier and heavier afterwards, as other channels of supply open. Such duties having the effect of prohibiting to our manufacturers the possibility of manufacturing all of the same kind, may induce the manufacturer to come hither into these States, where cheaper subsistence, equal laws, and a vent of his wares, free of duty, may enable him the highest profits from his skill and industry. And here, it would be in the power of the State Governments to cooperate essentially, by opening the resources of encouragement which are under their control; extending them liberally to those particular branches of manufacture for which their soil, climate, population, and other circumstances, have matured them; and fostering the precious efforts and progress of household manufacture, by some patronage, suited to the nature of its objects, guided by the local informations they possess, and guarded against abuse by their presence and attentions. The oppressions on our agriculture, in foreign ports, would thus be made the occasion of relieving it from a dependence on the counsels and conduct of others, and of promoting arts, manufactures, and population, at home.

2. Where a nation refuses to permit our merchants and factors to reside within certain parts of their dominions, we may, if it should be thought expedient, refuse residence to theirs in any and every part of ours, or modify their transactions.

3. Where a nation refuses to receive, in our vessels, any productions but our own, we may refuse to receive, in theirs, any but their own productions. The first and second clauses of the bill reported by the committee, are well formed to effect this object.

4. Where a nation refuses to consider any vessel as ours, which has not been built within our territories, we should refuse to consider theirs, any vessel not built within their territories.

5. Where a nation refuses to our vessels, the carriage even of our own productions, to certain countries under their domination, we might refuse to theirs of every description, the carriage of the same productions to the same countries. But, as justice and goodneighborhood would dictate that those who have no part in imposing the restriction on us, should not be the victims of measures adopted to defeat its effect, it may be proper to confine the restriction to vessels owned or navigated by any subjects of the same dominant power, other than the inhabitants of the country to which the said productions are to be carried. And to prevent all inconvenience to the said inhabitants, and to our own, by too heavy a check on the means of transportation, we may continue to admit the vessels marked for future exclusion, on an advanced tonnage, and for such length of time only, as may be supposed necessary to provide against that inconvenience.

The establishment of some of these principles by Great Britain, alone, has already lost us in our commerce with that country and its possessions, between eight and nine hundred vessels of near 40,000 tons burden, according to statements from official materials, in which they have confidence. This involves a proportional loss of seamen, shipwrights, and ship-building, and is too serious a loss to admit forbearance of some effective remonstrance. But in this, as in so many other cases, we are left to choose between two evils. These inconveniences are nothing, when weighed against the loss of wealth and loss of force, which will follow our perseverance in the plan of indiscriminate trade, for once it shall be perceived that we are either in the system or in the habit of giving equal advantages to those who extinguish our commerce and navigation by duties and prohibitions, as to those who treat both with liberty and justice, liberty and justice will be converted by all, into duties and prohibitions. It is not to our one due share in the transportation of them; but to our own means of independence, and the firm will to use them. Nor do the inconveniences of discrimination merit consideration. Not one of the nations before mentioned, perhaps not a commercial nation on earth, is without them. In our case, one distinction alone will suffice: that is to say, between nations who favor our productions and navigation, and those who do not favor them. One set of moderate duties, may the present duties, for the first, and a fixed advance on these as to some articles, and prohibitions as to others, for the last.

Still, it must be repeated, that friendly arrangements are preferable with all who will come into them; and, that we should carry into such arrangements, all the liberality and spirit of accommodation which the nature of the case will admit. France has, of her own accord, proposed negotiations for improving, by a new treaty, on fair and equal principles, the commercial relations of the two countries. But her internal disturbances have hitherto prevented the prosecution of them to effect, though we have had repeated assurances of a continuance of the disposition.

Proposals of friendly arrangement have been made on our part, by the present Government, to that of Great Britain, as the message states; but, being already on as good a footing in law, and better in fact, than the most favored nation, they have not, as yet, discovered any disposition to have it meddled with.

We have no reason to conclude that friendly arrangements would be declined by the other nations, with whom we have such commercial intercourse as may render them important. In the meanwhile, it would rest with the wisdom of Congress, to determine whether, as to those nations, they will not surcease express discussions, on the reasonable presumption, that they will concur in doing whatever justice and moderation dictate should be done.

SPAIN AND THE INDIANS.

Message from the President of the United States, communicating further information in relation to Spain and the Indians.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

Since the communications which were made to you on the affairs of the United States with Spain, and on the truce between Portugal and Algiers, some other papers have been received, which, making a part of the same subjects, are now communicated for your information.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

The Secretary of State to Messrs. Varis and Javinden.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 21, 1793.

GENTLEMEN: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your favors of November 30, and December 13, which have been laid before the President, to whom every evidence of a disposition in your favor, of a social and friendly disposition. It is pleasant, and well pursued with good effects, both by Spain and us, will add to the prosperity of the Hanging Maw's, wears a complexion to meet the most entire disapprobation of the United States. It is not yet, however, so developed in all its circumstances, as to authorize me to express a definitive opinion on it. This will be done, as soon as circumstances will permit the persons charged with the fact, to say so with safety, in the meanwhile, that they will approve at no time of any act which shall be either-aggressive or unjust towards our Indian neighbors. I flatter myself that your residence among us must have convinced you that atrocities of the nature of those charged on that occasion, are not in the spirit of our Government, and must have satisfied you how groundless is the base calumny repeated by the Governor of Louisiana, of a reward of 500 dollars offered for the head of an individual by the State, if by that he means those in authority, and if he means unauthorized individuals, it would hardly seem to justify his very general investigation.

His remonstrating against the passage of our citizens along the Mississippi, even above the 31st degree, and his apprehensions of those nations of Indians inhabiting above the same limit, will not be noticed at a moment when we do not rely on the justice of your Government, and your own dispositions to inculcate it, that your agents will be inhibited from taking any part between us and the Indians, inconsistent with the friendship which we hope will ever prevail between us, and which we shall endeavor sincerely to cultivate by every act of justice and good neighborhood.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Messrs. Viar and JAUDENES.

[Translation.] J. de JAUDENES to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, December 18, 1793.

SIR: In addition to the various papers which, on different occasions, we have had the honor to put into your hands, relative to the affairs of the Indians, our neighbors and allies, we have now the pleasure to transmit you a copy of extracts concerning this object, which we have lately received from the Governor of Louisiana.

Its contents will confirm to you the reason with which we ought to complain of the conduct observed by the several agents of the United States on those frontiers.

At the same time you will observe the salutary measure which the said Governor proposes, to put an end to such atrocities and disorders as have been committed, and as is probable, will continue until an efficacious remedy be applied.

What is mentioned in the enclosed copy appears to have all the requisites of humanity, good faith, and sincere correspondence.

In this expectation we request you to be so good as to give information of the whole to the President of the United States, to the end that these may determine what they shall judge convenient: seeing how much good may be produced by the friendly convention proposed, and how much evil by the omission of it.

We repeat assurances of the most sincere good will and greatest respect, and have the honor to subscribe ourselves, sir, &c.

JOSEPH DE JAUDENES.

In the absence of Joseph de Viar.

JOSEPH DE JAUDENES, for him.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Secretary of State.

CHEROKEES, September 12, 1793.

SIR: The bearer of this is the Little Turkey, whom, without any previous acquaintance, I take the liberty to beg leave to introduce to your Excellency's civility and attention, as one of the Cherokees.

As this nation are likely to be reduced to a very distressing situation, his chief business to Pensacola is to obtain a present supply of ammunition.

Your Excellency no doubt is acquainted how the present dispute between the Indians and the Americans originated, by first murdering a number of their people, under the faith of Government assembled at the Hanging Maw's, at the earnest solicitation of Governor Blount and other agents of the United States. Since then, the whites have committed a number of outrages by killing women and children, and in fact all they could find without distinction, parties of the nation to turn out to take revenge. They are now started to the number of six or seven hundred. All this while the Cherokees have done nothing to justify such treatment. Many repeated violations instigated when the Indians came to the determination of carrying on an expedition, it was agreed in council that the traders should bring them a present supply of ammunition, which the traders agreed to do; that is, one horse load each. Some that do not go down send a horse to bring it up for them.

This, however, is only my own opinion. But I think there will not be horses sent to bring more this winter than what will bring the supply mentioned.

His Excellency Governor WHITE. Es Copia.

JAUDENES.

[Translation.]

Extract of a letter from the Governor of Louisiana, relative to the affairs of the Indians.

NEW ORLEANS, October 28, 1793.

The Cherokee nation, furious for the assassinations committed at the Hanging Maw's on several of their principal chiefs, and for the repeated hostilities of their neighbors, the Americans, have taken the field to the number of six or seven hundred warriors, to avenge themselves of such outrages as appears by the enclosed extract of a letter, which I have lately received from a principal person residing in the same nation, of whom the Americans people who value themselves so much for humanity and equity, ought, in my opinion, to be ashamed to teach men, savage indeed, but ignorant nevertheless of such morals. The pains which I have taken to tranquilize the Cheroke nation, have been rendered useless by the bad faith and the insults of their neighbors and white men. To see, or to aid them with arms and ammunition, until I shall receive information of the determination which his Majesty has taken in consequence of the petition which that nation has addressed to him, I will endeavor to satisfy by way of present, and conformably to what we have been used to practise with the other nations our allies.

In the confines of Georgia, the Americans have provoked equally the Creek nation by the burning of the towns Hotchitken and of Chatouchey, killing in both several men, and taking away women, boys, and children. The supply wanted for the present will amount only to 14 horse loads; that is, 700 pounds powder, 1400 ball. The supply therefor will not be horses sent to bring more this winter than what will bring the supply mentioned.

His Excellency Governor WHITE.
At a meeting held by the chiefs of the Upper and Lower Creeks, the 27th day of August, they determined to divide themselves into four bodies, and to pass the river Oconee at different places, and on the same day, to attack the possessions of the Georgians. However, our commissary, Captain Peter Olivier, was able to make them desist from their enterprise, by threatening to retire from the nation, and to leave them abandoned by Spain.

After the burnings before mentioned, it was impossible to restrain those Indians in their resentment, so that various parties of them went out for war; and the towns petitioned us for arms and ammunition. The commissary of Congress, Seagrove, remains at Rocklandings, from whence he is to go to the Indian town of Tokepatchey, with new propositions of peace.

From what is here related, of which you will make the proper use, it is clearly evident, that the Americans of the frontiers are those who provoke the Indians with hostilities; and that, far from excusing these against them, they owe to us the little efficacy with which hitherto they have repelled their insults. If Congress desires peace in good faith with our allies, and especially with the Creeks, the President may charge the commissary Seagrove for that purpose, who may see the King's commissary in the said nation, Peter Olivier. Treating with good harmony on all the subjects which divide the Creek nation and the Georgians, and leaving in suspense the question of limits under conference at Madrid, peace will quickly be re-established, as is equally desired by the Indians and us.

In fine, if Congress determines to send very strict and efficacious orders to put a stop to all kind of hostilities and vexations against the Cherokees, I pledge myself equally to persuade that nation that their interests require that they should live in the most perfect harmony. And I do not doubt that I shall obtain it from those Indians, whose information is much superior to that of the other savages.

I have succeeded to re-establish peace between the Creek and Chickasaw nations; but it is not just that, while we are exercising ourselves to tranquility and peace, the projects of vengeance of those Indians against the American settlements, their Governors should be endeavoring to foment war among our allies by sending arms, as was the case in the beginning of this year, by Lieutenant Clark, who landed at Margos, at the head of thirty armed gun men, with a convoy of Indian corn, 300 fuses, 4,000 lbs. ball, a great quantity of powder, salt, &c. to Paimingo, a chief of the Chickasaw nation, who has always fomented it a party adverse to the interests of the King, and desiring the continuation of the war, while, on my part, I have refused arms and ammunition to both nations. While that should continue, I have to desire that you will obtain from Congress the strictest orders to Governor Blount, Robertson, and the other officers employed in their Western establishments, that they abstain from fomenting the turbulents of the chief Principalities of sending metals and patents to the other chiefs of our nations, as we observe rigorously with respect to theirs; and finally, that they do not undertake in future to send armed troops on the Mississippi, with a visible infradiction or contempt of the territory of his Majesty, which might happen to begot hostilities on the one side or the other.

THE BARON DE CARONDELET.

COMMERCIAL LAWS OF FOREIGN NATIONS.

Message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, together with a certain decree and ordinance of the Governments of France and Spain.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit you a report by the Secretary of State, of such laws, decrees, and ordinances, or their substance, respecting commerce in the countries with which the United States have commercial intercourse, as he has received, and has not stated in his report of the 16th instant.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

The Secretary of State, to whom the President of the United States referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 24th, 1793, desiring the substance of all such laws, decrees, or ordinances, respecting commerce in any of the countries with which the United States have commercial intercourse, as he has received by the Secretary of State, and has already stated to the House in his report of the 16th instant; that he has had an official communication of a decree rendered by the National Assembly of France, on the 26th day of March last, of which the following is a translation:

"DECREE"

"Exempting from all duties, the subsistances and other objects of supply in the colonies, relatively to the United States, pronounced in the sitting of the 26th of March, 1793, second year of the French republic."

"The National Convention, willing to prevent, by precise dispositions, the difficulties that might arise relatively to the execution of its decree of the 19th February last, concerning the United States of America; to grant favors to this ally nation, and to treat it, in its commercial relations with the colonies of France, in the same manner as the vessels of the republic, decree as follows:"

"Article 1st. From the day of the publication of the present decree in the French American colonies, the vessels of the United States, of the burden of sixty tons at the least, laden only with meals and subsistances, as well as the objects of supply announced in article 2d, of the arret of 30th August, 1794, as also lard, butter, salted salmon, and candles, shall be admitted in the ports of said colonies, exempt from all duties. The same exemption shall extend to the French vessels laden with the same articles, and coming from a foreign port.

"Article 2d. The captains of vessels of the United States, who, having brought into the French American colonies the objects comprised in the above article, wish to return to the territory of the said States, may use in the said colonies, the provisions, first class, rum, sugar, coffee, and French merchandises, a quantity of coffee equivalent to the one-fifth of the tonnage of every vessel, as also, a quantity of sugar equal to the one-tenth, on conforming to the following articles:"

"Article 3d. Every captain of an American vessel, who wishes to make returns to the United States of coffee and sugar, of the French colonies, shall make it appear that his vessel entered therein with at least two-thirds of her cargo, according to article 1st; for this purpose, he shall be obliged to transmit, within twenty-four hours after his arrival, to the custom house of the place he may land at, a certificate of the marine agents, establishing the gauge of his vessel, and the effective tonnage of her cargo."

"The heads of the said custom houses shall assure themselves that the exportation of the sugars and coffee does not exceed the proportion fixed by the 2d article of the present decree."

United States, December 30th, 1793.
"ARTICLE 4th. The captains of vessels of the United States of America shall not pay, on going from the islands, as well as those of the republic, but a duty of five livres per quintal of indigo, ten livres per thousand weight of cotton, five livres per thousand weight of coffee, five livres per thousand weight of brown and clayed sugars, and fifty sous per thousand weight of raw sugar. Every other merchandise shall be exempt from duty, on going out of the colonies.

"ARTICLE 5th. The sugars and coffee which shall be laden, shall pay at the custom houses which are established in the colonies, or that shall be established, in addition to the duties above fixed, those imposed by the law of 19th March, 1791, on the sugars and coffee imported from the said colonies to France, and conformably to the same law.

"ARTICLE 6th. The captains of vessels of the United States, who wish to trade merchandise of the said colonies for the ports of France, shall furnish the custom house at the place of departure, with the bonds required of the masters of French vessels, by the 3d article of the law of 10th July, 1791, to secure the unloading of these merchandise in the ports of the republic.

"ARTICLE 7th. The vessels of the nations with whom the French republic is not at war, may carry to the French American colonies, all the objects designated by the present decree. They may also bring into the ports of the republic, only, all the productions of the said colonies, on the conditions announced in the said decree, as well as that of 19th of February."

"Copy conformable to the original."

GENET.

That he has not received officially any copy of the decree said to have been rendered by the same Assembly, on the 27th day of July last, subjecting the vessels of the United States, laden with provisions, to be carried against their will into the ports of France, and those having enemy goods on board, to have such goods taken out as legal price.

That an ordinance has been passed by the Government of Spain, on the 9th day of June last, the substance of which has been officially communicated to him in the following words, to wit:

"Extract of an ordinance for regulating provisionally the commerce of Louisiana and the Floridas, dated the 9th of June, 1793.

"The preamble states, that the inhabitants of Louisiana being deprived of their commerce with France, (on account of the war) as allowed by the ordinance of January, 1792, &c. his Majesty, considering that they and the inhabitants of the Floridas cannot subsist without the means of disposing of their productions, and of acquiring those necessary for their own consumption, for that purpose, and to increase the national commerce, the commerce of those provinces, and their agriculture, has directed the following articles to be provisionally observed:

"The inhabitants of the above mentioned provinces to be allowed to commerce freely, both in Europe and America, with all friendly nations, who have treaties of commerce with Spain; New Orleans, Pensacola, and St. Augustine, to be ports for that purpose. No exception as to the articles to be sent, or to be received. Every vessel, however, to be subjected to touch at Corcoration, in Galicia, or Alzinc, and to take a permit there, without which, the entry not to be allowed in the ports above mentioned.

"The articles of this commerce, carried on thus directly between those provinces and foreign nations, to pay a duty of 15 per cent. importation, and six per cent. exportation, except negroes, who may be imported free of duty: the produce of gold and silver exported to purchase those negroes, to pay the six per cent. exportation duty, the exportation of silver to be allowed for this purpose only.

"The commerce between Spain and those provinces to remain free. Spaniards to be allowed to observe the same rules, and to fit out from the same ports (in vessels wholly belonging to them, without connexion with foreigners) for those provinces, as for the other Spanish colonies.

"To remove all obstacles to this commerce, all sorts of merchandise destined for Louisiana and the Floridas, (even those whose admission is prohibited for other places) may be entered in the ports of Spain, and in like manner, tobacco, and all other prohibited articles, may be imported into Spain from those provinces, to be re-exported to foreign countries.

"To improve this commerce, and encourage the agriculture of those provinces, the importation of foreign rice into the ports of Spain is prohibited, and a like preference shall be given to the other productions of these provinces, when they shall suffice for the consumption of Spain.

"All articles exported from Spain to these provinces shall be free of duty on exportation; and such as being foreign, shall have paid duty on importation into Spain, shall have it restored to exporters.

"These foreign articles, thus exported, to pay duty of three per cent. on entry in those provinces those which are not foreign, to be free of duty.

"The articles exported from those provinces to Spain, to be free of duty, whether consumed in Spain, or re-exported to foreign countries.

"Those Spanish vessels which, having gone from Spain to those provinces, should desire to bring back productions from thence directly to the foreign ports of Europe, may do it on paying a duty of exportation of 3 per cent.

"All vessels, both Spanish and foreign, sailing to those provinces, to be prohibited from touching at any other port in his Majesty's American dominions.

"No vessel to be fitted out from New Orleans, Pensacola, or St. Augustine, for any of the Spanish islands, or other dominions in America, except for some urgent cause, in which case only, the respective Governors to give a permission, but without allowing any other articles to be embarked than the productions of those provinces.

"All foreign vessels purchased by his Majesty's subjects, and destined for this commerce, to be exempted from those duties to which they are at present subject, they proving that they are absolute and sole proprietors thereof."

Message from the President of the United States, communicating a translation of a letter from the Representatives of Spain.

Gentlemen of the Senate,

No. 72.

REFUGEES FROM ST. DOMINGO.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Patterson, Samuel Sterrett, and Gustavus Scott, the committees appointed by the Legislature of Maryland to draw and distribute the moneys granted by that State, for the relief of the French emigrants from the Island of St. Domingo, made the following report:

That they consider the sufferers now in Baltimore, from St. Domingo, as objects strongly recommended to the compassion of Congress, by the many distressing circumstances that attend their case. Of the extent of the calamity, or of the number of sufferers involved, (which exceed three hundred in number) the committee entertain no doubt; nor can they doubt the improbability of further support from the citizens of Baltimore, to whose unexamined exertions of kindness and charity, the nation will stand indebted. For a lack of funds, that will timely ministration never fails to stop. They consider that, if humanity be a duty to the individual, it becomes peculiarly a glory in a Legislature, when the relief extended is but a manifestation of the general sympathy of the constituent body. That the Legislature of the State of Maryland, whose local situation enabled them to gain the best information of the actual distresses of the sufferers, that they had but pursued an honorable example, set by their constituents, when they passed a resolution, on the 27th and 28th of November last, allowing to the committee of relief, for the use of the sufferers, five hundred dollars a week, from the first of December to the second of February next.

The committee beg leave to recommend the following resolution:

That the committee of relief appointed at Baltimore, by a resolution of the State of Maryland of November last, in behalf of the sufferers from St. Domingo, have power to draw on the treasury of the United States, monthly, from the second day of February next, until the — day of next — dollars, to be applied by the said committee agreeably to the rules of their body.
FRANCE.

Message from the President of the United States to Congress, communicating a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, and a copy of certain proceedings of the Legislature of South Carolina.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, as being connected with the correspondence already in your possession, between the Secretary of State, and the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, the copy of a letter from that Minister, of the 25th of December, 1793; and a copy of the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of South-Carolina.

COLUMBIA, December 7, 1793.

SIR: I have the honor of transmitting to you, the resolves of the Legislature of this State, with a number of affidavits, setting forth, that certain persons in this State, have been enlisting men for the service of the French republic, to go on an expedition against a Power not at war with the United States. The investigation of the whole business is fully expressed in the report of the committee.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM MOULTTRIE.

State of South Carolina:

In the House of Representatives, December 6, 1793.

The committee to whom was referred the business of examining into, and ascertaining the truth of a report, that an armed force is now levying within this State, by persons under a foreign authority without the permission, and contrary to the express prohibition of the Government of the United States, and of this State, report:

That they have made diligent inquiry respecting the truth of this report, and have collected such evidence relating to the facts in the case, as will satisfactorily prove that your committee are perfectly satisfied, from the information, on the oaths of divers credible persons, which they have received, that William Tate, Jacob R. Brown, William Urty, Robert Tate, Richard Speke, citizens of this State, and other persons unknown to your committee, also citizens of this State, have received and accepted military commissions from M. Genet, minister plenipotentiary from the republic of France to the United States of America, authorizing them, and instructing them, to raise, organize, train, and conduct troops, within the United States of America; that the avowed purpose for which these troops are now raising, is, to rendezvous in the State of Georgia, and from thence to proceed into the Spanish dominions, with a view to conquer or plunder, as their strength might enable, or opportunity might tempt them; that, in the event of a French fleet approaching the coasts of the Southern States, a junction and co-operation with it, is contemplated by the persons above mentioned; but that, though this was the avowed object of these troops and their leaders, among themselves, from the injunction to conceal the whole system from persons not interested, and the subordination established by M. Genet, the author of the plan, and the source of authority to the officers, it is probable that the corps, when raised, must yield to any change of destination which the judgment or inclination of M. Genet may point out to them; that several of the persons above named, received, together with their commissions, instructions by which they were to regulate their enrolments of men, during the day, night, races, clothing, plunder, and division of conquered land, to be allotted to the officers and men who should enter into this service, and marking the proportions of the acquisitions to be reserved to the republic of France; that the persons above named, in pursuance of the powers vested in them by the said commissions, and in obedience to the instructions of M. Genet, and his aids, particularly M. Mangourit, who signed some of the papers, have proceeded by themselves, and by their agents, without any authority from the United States, or from this State, to enrol numbers of the citizens of this State, whom they deluded with the hopes of plunder and the acquisition of riches, in the service of the republic of France, to be subject to the orders of M. Genet, the minister plenipotentiary of France.

That Stephen Drayton and John Hamilton, also citizens of this State, have made application to the good citizens thereof, to engage in this scheme of raising men in this State for the service of France, to act under the orders of M. Genet, and to commit acts of hostility against nations at peace with the United States of America; and have avowed that they acted by the authority of M. Genet, the minister plenipotentiary of the republic of France; that upon the whole of the information which your committee have been able to obtain, this is a daring and dangerous attempt by a foreign minister to intermeddle in the affairs of the United States, to usurp the powers of government, and to levy troops in the bosom of the Union, without the authority, and contrary to the express sense of the Government of the United States, and in violation of the laws of nations.

That the direct tendency of these measures of the foreign minister, is to disturb the internal tranquility of the United States, and to involve them in hostilities with nations with whom they are at peace, which sound policy requires should be preserved. That, in the opinion of your committee, this attempt is the more dangerous and alarming, as many citizens of the United States have been thereby seduced from their duty by insidious arts practised on their kindred affection to the French republic; and have been drawn into a scheme, in the execution of which they have assumed the functions of government, and exceeded the power of the said, which the wisdom of the constitution has vested exclusively in the Congress and President of the United States. That this committee do therefore recommend, that the Governor of this State be requested to issue his proclamation, forbidding all persons from enrolling any of the citizens of this State, and prohibiting the citizens from enlisting under any officers, or for any purpose not previously sanctioned by the Government of the United States, or of this State, and to proceed to render all unlawful assemblages of troops, unauthorized by Government; and that the Governor be requested to exert the whole public force to the utmost extent, if necessary, to ensure obedience to his proclamation.

The Hon. John Hamilton, and Richard Speke, have been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanours; and they recommend that the attorney general and solicitors be directed, forthwith, to institute, or cause to be instituted and conducted, proceedings in the proper courts of law, against the said William Tate, Jacob R. Brown, Robert Tate, Stephen Drayton, John Hamilton, and Richard Speke, for accepting, or engaging in, this fraudulently procured plan, and thereby causing, pursuant to the authority of a Power, to raise troops within the United States, and for going about within the State, levying or attempting to levy troops, and for seducing, and endeavoring to seduce, the citizens of this State to enrol themselves for foreign service, to commit acts of hostility against nations, with whom the United States are at peace, without the permission of Government, and contrary to the proclamation of the President of the United States, declaring these States to be in a state of neutrality and peace.
Resolved unanimously, That this House do concur in the said report.

Ordered, That the report and resolution be sent to the Senate for their concurrence.

By order of the House:

JOHN SANDFORD DART, C. H. R.

IN THE SENATE, December 7, 1793.

Resolved unanimously, That this House do concur with the House of Representatives in the foregoing report and resolution.

Ordered, That the report and resolutions be sent to the House of Representatives.

By order of the Senate:

FELIX WARLEY, C. S.

COLUMBIA, Dec. 9, 1793.

THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA:

By his Excellency William Moultrie, Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over the State aforesaid. A Proclamation.

Whereas information hath been given to me, that an armed force is now levying within this State, by persons under a foreign authority, without the permission, and contrary to the express prohibition of the Government of the United States, and of this State: And whereas measures of this sort, if permitted by Government, must tend to disturb the internal tranquillity of the United States, and involve them in hostilities with nations with whom they are now at peace, which sound policy requires should be preserved; and as many of the citizens of this State may be induced, by the insidious arts of the persons acting under the foreign authority aforesaid, in violation of every law, as well of the United States as that of nations, to enlist themselves, and engage in a scheme so repulsive to this country: I do, therefore, in order to put an immediate stop to such unlawful and pernicious practices, issue this my proclamation, hereby strictly forbidding any person to enlist any of the citizens of this State, and prohibiting the citizens thereof from enlisting under any officer, or other person, for any purpose not previously sanctioned by the Government of the United States, or of this State. And I do positively forbid all assemblages of troops, unauthorized by Government, under pain of suffering the penalties declared by law for such offences.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the State, in the town of Columbia, this 9th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, and of the independence of the United States of America the eighteenth.

maketh oath, that Robert Tate applied to this deponent during the sitting of the Pinckney court, November term last, and urged him to accept an appointment in a body of troops that was to be raised in this State under French commissions; which troops were to go on an expedition against the Spanish possessions, on some part of the American continent.

This deponent adds that Robert Tate expressly told him that he was then acting under a French commission from the French Government, and was determined to enlist men as soon as possible.

SOUTH CAROLINA:

Before me personally appeared ————, of Pendleton county, who being duly sworn, deposeth as follows, that is to say; that, on Sunday, the twenty-fourth of November last, he, this deponent, was in company with Mr. William Tate, and lodged in the same house with him at Cambridge; that the said William Tate showed unto this deponent, a certain paper written in French, and also in English, and under the hand and seal of citizen Genet, minister plenipotentiary of the republic of France to the United States of America, which paper was a commission, directed to the said William Tate, constituting and appointing him a Colonel, in the service of the French republic; that he also saw in the possession of the said William Tate, another paper, signed by citizen Genet, (as well as this deponent can recollect) being a plan for the formation of a military corps, ruled like a brigade return, with columns specifying the number of officers and men, the pay, the rations, and the proportion of spoil each one was to have; this deponent thinks they specified, one lieutenant colonel, a second lieutenant colonel, captains, and from thence down containing thirty-two commissioned and non-commissioned officers, and one hundred and twenty-four privates; that the number of battalions was unlimited; that the spoil was to be so distributed as to leave a certain portion thereof to the French nation viz. two parts; but into how many parts the whole was to be divided, the deponent cannot recollect. The said William Tate informed this deponent, that, if these instructions be laid out, a number of persons, to enlist men in this State, into the French service; that, if the measures taken, should be successful, blank commissions would be sent on from the northward, and each person would receive a commission, according to the number of men he should enlist. The deponent saith, that this was set forth in the instructions, that the deponent saw, that the said William Tate told this deponent, that the object of the enlistment was, to march to South America, and attack the Spanish dominions. This deponent further saith, that he saw at the same time, in the possession of the said William Tate, other papers, relative to the foregoing transactions, signed by Monsieur M. A. B. Mangourier, the particular purport whereof this deponent cannot now recollect.

Sworn the 3d day of December, 1793, before me.

A true copy, and which I attest:

COLUMBIA, Dec. 9, 1793.

SOUTH CAROLINA:

Before me personally appeared ————, who being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that on Saturday the 30th day of November last, as he was on his way to Columbia, to attend his duty in the House of Representatives, and in crossing the ferry at Grassy, he fell in company with two men, one of whom, addressing him, mentioned that he had heard that he, this deponent, was one of their party, meaning, as this deponent received the impression at the time, the party for enlisting and raising men for the French service, (for the deponent and his companion had their company filled up, and pulling a paper out of his pocket, said it was his commission, and offered to show it to this deponent; this deponent told him he would not wish to deceive him, for that he, this deponent, was a member of another party, and did not look at his commission or papers.) One of the members of this deponent, that he hoped to see him, this deponent, in the new country, and that they were to have their rendezvous in Georgia; he asked this deponent, whether he had seen Captain Tate; that he was informed Captain Tate had been at his, the deponent's house. Deponent replied, that he had not seen him, that he did not know him, and that he had not been at his house that he knew of.

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA:

Before me, personally appeared ————, who, being duly sworn, deposeth as follows: That, some time about the middle of November last, Stephen Drayton, Esq. and Major Hambleton, called at the house of this deponent, and mentioned to this deponent, as a very advantageous plan that was a-foot, to get as many men as possible to agree to assemble, by small parties, upon some of the shores near Charleston or elsewhere, and that a French fleet was to attend, for the purpose of receiving them; and that the object was to make a descent upon some of the Spanish islands, that would be a very lucrative conquest, if effected. They mentioned that Mr. Tate had gone forward on the same business to M. Genet, to obtain commissions; and this deponent understood, from the said Stephen Drayton and Major Hambleton, that they, the said Stephen Drayton and Major John Hambleton, were acting under the authority of the Minister of the French republic at the time. This deponent was thereupon applied to by the said Stephen Drayton, to be concerned in the enterprise, adding, that this deponent could be advanced to a pretty high commission. This deponent immediately refused to have any connexion, or be at all concerned in the enterprise, and thereupon suspected doubts of the legality of the undertaking, insomuch as it would be inconsistent with the proclamations of the President of the United States; adding, that it would, in all probability, be taken notice of by the Executive of this State.

Sworn the 3d day of December, 1793, before me.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 25, 1793, 2d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR: I learn by the reports of the consul of the republic at Charleston, and by the public papers, that the Legislature of South Carolina had caused to be arrested different persons, accused of having received from me commissions for the purpose of levying an armed force in that State, for the service of the republic. Conceiving that such conduct, at the time, the party for enlisting and raising men for the American people, I hasten to inform you, that this deponent, which I have not authorized, in any manner, the recruiting, the formation, or the collecting of an armed force, or of any corps in the territory of the United States; but, at the same time, I am too frank to disguise from you, that, authorized by the French nation to deliver commissions to those of your fellow-citizens who should feel themselves animated with a desire of serving the best of causes, I have granted them to several brave residents of South Carolina, whose intention appeared to me to be to extricate themselves, and to go among the independent Indian tribes, ancient and allied races of France, in order to retaliate, if they could, in concert with us, on the Spaniards and English, the injury which the Government of these two nations had the baseness, for some time, to compel your fellow-citizens, under the name of these savages, in like manner, as is lately done under that of the Algerines.

I notify you, sir, that I shall publish this declaration, in order to calm inquietudes, and to dissipate the doubts to which the denunciation made in the Legislature of Carolina might give rise.

Accept my respect.

Message from the President of the United States, communicating certain intelligence from Europe.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit for your information certain intelligence lately received from Europe, as it relates to the subject of my past communications.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

[Translation]

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the republic of France, to M. Deforges, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

SAIN-PORT, October 1, 1793.

Sir:

I have the honor to send you, herewith, the copies of two judgments rendered with regard to the American vessel the George. By the first, the tribunal, in conforming itself to the treaty of 1778, declared her unlawful prize; but, by the second, a part of the cargo is condemned as hostile property; and the tribunal has founded its decision upon the decree of the 27th July, Captain Richard Stevens, of the American vessel the Hope, also complains very bitterly of a sentence rendered lately against a part of the cargo of this vessel, which is incontestibly American property. This captain informs me, that the tribunal of St. Brieux has founded its decision upon the circumstance that, in the invoice, the owners of the vessel had added their commission to the price of the articles therein comprised—a thing in use among merchants, who, by this means, ensures the whole, they shelter from maritime danger the price of their labor, as they do that of their merchandize. I do not cite; sir; this sentence in the form of a complaint, first, because I have not yet received an authentic copy of it, and, above all, because I am persuaded that the superior tribunal, to whom an appeal must be made, will not fail to render justice.

I desire only to let you see, sir, how much discontent the execution of the decree of the 27th July must excite.

Persisted that the Convention wishes to maintain the closest connections between our two republics, I have given to my ministry the most positive assurances of it; but they will be contradicted by the injured persons, who, doubtless, will accuse the minister with supineness who does not adopt the feelings of his fellow-citizens; and my efforts will fail of their effect as soon as it can be imagined that I do not render a faithful account of the dispositions of the French republic, from the want of intelligence or exactness. I request you, sir, to pardon an observation which regards the particular interests of France. The circumstances of the moment prevent the fitting out of privateers, consequently it would cost nothing to cause the treaty to be observed with the greatest exactitude. Then, the contrast which the Americans would make between the conduct of France and that of its enemies, could not but be favorable; but, at present, on the contrary, every time we complain of the conduct of the English, they shut our mouths by this decree of 27th July. Nothing is more embarrassing for our minister at London, and nothing can be more injurious to the French republic, in the opinion of the neutral Powers. I hope, sir, that you will observe, in the freedom of the observations I have just made to you, the amicable and fraternal dispositions which have dictated them. I am sure, at least, of conforming to the views of the United States, in following my own inclination to remove every thing that might change the good harmony which exists between two nations, allied as well by the force of sentiment as by that of treaties.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

GOUV. MORRIS.

* M. Deforges, Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Morris to the Secretary of State, dated October 10, 1793.

I am very anxious that consuls and vice consuls should be appointed in all the ports. My countrymen are incessantly applying to me, from every quarter, about property taken from them. I am desired from abroad, to claim such property. I have decidedly refused to lend my name on such occasions; because I am certain that I should be thereupon represented as a party interested; and of course, my representations, against the proceedings, which are but too frequent, would be disregarded.

On the twentieth of August, a deputation of four ship captains, chosen by their brethren of Bordeaux, called on me with a representation of the injustice they experienced in being prevented from sailing with their cargoes, &c. The deputation, as is natural, had flattered themselves with immediate and ample redress. It was my duty to moderate their expectations and to explain the difficulties. Interest is often blind and seldom just. My moderation was ill suited to their wishes; and my letter to the minister, of which a copy is enclosed, seemed to them rather an abandonment of their cause, than the prosecution of the only redress which appeared to me attainable, and in the only way by which it might be effected. I had cautioned them particularly, not to ask too much; because they would thereby run the risk of not obtaining what they asked for, or, if they should obtain it, of seeing their hopes blasted in the bud, by a repeal of an indulgent decree.

A decree was obtained, and before it could be executed, was repealed. Thus it has happened that they did mischief, without any benefit to themselves.

[Translation]

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the republic of France, to M. Deforges, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, October 12, 1793.

Sir:

I have the honor to send you, herein enclosed, a copy of a letter, which has been addressed to me, by citizen Poitot, a lawyer, residing at Morlaix. It appears, that in the proceedings of which he has given an account, there are extraordinary irregularities, and I think it my duty to inform you of them, as, on the justice of tribunals, often depends the salvation, and always the prosperity of a State.

I request you, at the same time, sir, to permit me to make two general observations on the whole of this business: one of which applies to the organization, and the other to the proceedings of the commercial tribunals. The referring of questions on sea prizes to these tribunals, appears to me dangerous, since they involve the interpretation of the treaties, and the application of the law of nations; consequently, of peace and of war. Now we may be permitted to entertain some doubt as to the knowledge of the judges, and we ought besides to fear, least they may be interested, as owners of privateers, in the questions which are submitted to them.

But whatever may be the extent of the tribunal, it appears to me essential, sir, that in their proceedings, they should receive all the claims which may be made to them; that they should even invite, without waiting for the authority of the persons interested, who are often at the distance of one thousand leagues. The jurisdiction of the tribunals within whose cognizance are the questions of prize, is in rem. They take possession of the thing, and by that means render themselves responsible for it. Now, as the tribunal, with the only exception of the thing, ought not to dispossess themselves of it, without a formal authoritative act of the true proprietor, it is their duty, not only to admit, but also to seek proofs, which may establish to whom the property truly belongs. This is a double duty towards the neutral proprietor, and towards their own jurisdiction; for every government which permits its citizens to fit out privateers, must with the destructive sword of war, hands which are interested to extend its ravages, and renders itself responsible for the abuses which result from so dangerous a delegation of sovereignty. For the purpose of repressing them, the admiralty tribunals have been established throughout the different nations of Europe. In these tribunals, the government combines the means of information of the facility with which it admits merely every species of claim. It preserves, by appeals, the right of deciding in the last resort on the contests which therein arise; and it gives the necessary time to enlighten its conscience on thorny questions, before the pronouncing of a sentence, which might extend or prolong the horrors of war.

The上面 are the reasons which have induced me to give the measures dictated to me. They daily make on me a more lively impression, on account of the claims addressed to me by my countrymen, of which I have communicated to you a very small part. I always send to the tribunals the injured persons, by giving them the most positive assurances that they will there obtain complete and prompt justice.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUV. MORRIS.

[TRANSLATION.]

Extract of a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs, to Mr. Morris, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, to the Republic of France, dated Paris, October 14, 1793, 2d year of the French Republic.

The extreme rigor with which the English, and the other belligerent Powers, treat all the neutral vessels destined for France, has put the republic to the painful necessity of arresting, by way of reprisal, in such vessels, the provisions belonging to its enemies. This severe measure, clearly explained in the decree of the 9th of May, of which I enclose you a copy, is the result of the most scrupulous consideration. It is, on the one hand, the firm determination of destroying several small privateers, which employ, against us, means disapproved by the laws of humanity, and by those of war. In casting your eye on this law, you can hardly, sir, avoid the conviction, that it was necessary and just that the republic could no longer, without intention to itself, preserve tolerable decency towards its implacable and ferocious enemies, and that the same principle, on the general opinion of mankind, warranted the exercise of this means of offense.

In comparing this law with the declarations made by the British Government, at Stockholm, Copenhagen, Florence, and probably at Philadelphia, you will observe an extreme difference between our manner of thinking and that of our neighbors. You will compare the one with the other, and the firm determination of destroying several small privateers, which employ, against us, means disapproved by the laws of humanity, and by those of war. But it seems, that France, attacked on all sides, abandoned to its own strength, without allies, without foreign succor, should confine herself scrupulously to the maxims of the law of nations, so cruelly violated by her enemies. Still, in this respect, I must say, that the neutrality of several Powers would be partial; that it would operate only in favor of our enemies, whose commerce would be peaceably carried on under the shelter of a borrowed flag, whilst ours could not, under any flag whatever.

The law of the 9th of May is conditional, while the declarations of the combined Powers are positive. It is in their power to put a period to the execution of this law, by permitting neutral vessels to communicate freely with France. These observations, sir, which you are too just not to appreciate, apply to the greater part of the claims which you have, under cover of a complaint, presented to me. If you will consult with respect to them, all that depended on me, in order to obtain, in favor of your countrymen, an exception of the general measures adopted with regard to neutral nations. I have used, among others, all the means with which your letters furnished me, to have restored the ship Laurens; but I have met with insurmountable obstacles, in the established laws, and in the opinion of the commercial nations, with respect to the reason which induced me to restore the vessel which you have sent me. It has consented, among other things, to have translated 561 letters, merely to prove, in the most authentic manner, the property of the cargo. The interested have besides avowed, themselves, that they had neglected an essential formality required by the laws.

You must be satisfied, sir, with the manner in which the request, presented by the American captains from Bordeaux, has been received. This fact, and several others of the same kind, which could not escape your attention, must have convinced you, that the particular circumstances of the republic permitted the administration to favor your countrymen, it was eager to give them testimonies of the desire which it always has had, of bringing nearer and nearer the citizens and the interests of the two countries.

We hope, that the Government of the United States will attribute to their true cause, the abuses of which you complain, as well as other violations of which our cruisers may render themselves guilty, in the course of the present war. It must acquire how difficult it is, to contain, within just limits, the indignation of our marines, and, in general, of all the French patriots, against a people who speak the same language, and have the same habits, as the free Americans. The difficulty of distinguishing our allies from our enemies, has often been the cause of offences committed against our vessels, which the administration could do, is to order indemnification to those who have suffered, and to punish the guilty.

I enclose, herein, several copies of the navigation act, decreed by the Representatives of the People. I request you to make the dispositions of them known to the Government of the United States. It will there find the basis of a system, connecting more and more the interests of the two nations.

DEFORGES.

P.S. I enclose herein, sir, an arrêt of the committee of public safety, which fulfils, in part, the object proposed in your letter of the 15th of this month. I shall have the honor of communicating to you the measures which shall be taken in the sequel.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the Republic of France, to Monsieur Deforges, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, October 19, 1793.

SIR:

The attention which several pressing affairs required, made it impossible for me sooner to answer the letter which you did me the honor of writing to me on the 14th. I have examined, with respectful care, the decree of the 9th of May, emanating from the conduct of your enemies, and supported by some reasons, to which you have given their greatest justro. It is possible, sir, that the difference of our position leads us to see the same object in a different manner. But, although I cannot be of your opinion, I do not intend farther to discuss the considerations which have produced the decision of the French Government. I confine myself to the rendering of a faithful account of it to the Government of the United States, and I am persuaded, that, in considering them, liberal friendship will put in the balance the difficulties of a revolution, and of a war without example. I ought, however, to observe to you, sir, that the question does not appear to me to turn on the law of nations, but on an exception to that law, by the stipulations of a treaty. This treaty, in derogating from this law, in favor of merchandises of your enemies found in our vessels, has derogated, in like manner, from it, to the prejudice of our merchandises found in the vessels of some enemy. We have seen, at Philadelphia, the public sale of a cargo, the property of one of our citizens, taken by a French privateer, on board an English vessel. All opposition was of no avail, because, according to the constitution, our treaties are the supreme law of the land. You will agree, sir, that it is hard for my fellow-citizens not to have the advantage, either of the treaty, or of the law of nations; to lose their merchandises by the treaty, and not to be able to compensate themselves for it, under the protection of this same treaty, by the freight of enemy merchandises. In comparing the facts of the same epoch, you will be amazed on seeing what passed at Paris and at Philadelphia. Your good sense will lead you to anticipate the claims of our merchants, and the insinuations of our enemies.

FRANCE.

Message from the President of the United States, communicating the information that the conduct of the French Minister Plenipotentiary has been disapproved.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

Having already laid before you a letter of the 16th of August, 1795, from the Secretary of State, to the minister at Paris, stating the conduct, and urging the recall of the minister plenipotentiary of the republic of France, I now communicate to you, that his conduct has been unequivocally disapproved, and that the strongest assurances have been given, that his recall should be expedited without delay.

No. 76. [1st session.]

FRANCE.

Report of a Committee of the House of Representatives on the propriety of remitting the foreign tonnage on sundry French vessels which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States.

Mr. Venable, from the committee appointed to inquire into, and report, a state of facts respecting sundry French vessels, which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States, and their opinion on the propriety of remitting the foreign tonnage thereon, made the following report:

That the vessels to which this order has reference, were employed in commerce between France and the colony of St. Domingo. That, some time previously to the calamity which produced a total destruction of the town of Cape Francois, they had collected at that place, for the purpose of availing themselves of the advantage of a convoy to France; some of the ships of war, belonging to the republic, being about to sail for that purpose.

That their cargoes consisted of the productions of the colony, and were destined for France; that they were not intended to be carried immediately into any other country, with a view to make sale of them.

That, thus circumstanced, they were anchored in the road of the Cape, on the 30th of June, occupied in fitting their vessels for the voyage to Europe; a number of them being in great want of repairs. That, on the 30th, they were ordered to unmoor, and the next day made a precipitate departure; the greater part of them not having had time to make the necessary repairs to the rigging; without a sufficient stock of water or provisions to last them the voyage; and crowded with passengers, whose necessity had compelled to fly them for safety.

That some of them being able to go on shore before their departure, they were compelled to put to sea without their papers, instructions, or orders, and rolls of their crews; and, thus circumstanced, were compelled, by urgent and irresistible necessity, to direct their course to the nearest friendly ports, for the purpose of landing the passengers, refitting their vessels, and procuring a sufficiency of water and provisions to enable them to accomplish their voyage to Europe.

That, on their arrival in the American ports, the naval officer at the port where the greater number arrived, considered them as vessels in distress, and exempt by law from tonnage; but, doubts having arisen at the other ports, application was made to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General of the United States, both of whom were of opinion that the distress was not of the nature contemplated by the law, and therefore they could not be exempted.

Upon considering the before recited facts, your committee are of opinion, that, although, at the time of their departure from the Cape, they intended to enter the ports of the United States, for the purposes, and from the necessity before mentioned, yet there was no intention of altering their ultimate destination. That it remained essentially the same; and that the case may be well considered as falling within the spirit and intention of the thirty-seventh section of the law to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed, by law, on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels, also within the provision made by the nineteenth article of the treaty of amity and commerce between France and the United States.

That, as the officers whose province it was to make a decision, in this case, have not felt themselves justified in putting this construction on the law, a legislative interference is necessary; and that the tonnage duty ought to be remitted.
GREAT BRITAIN.

Message from the President of the United States, communicating extracts of further advices from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at London.

Gentlemen of the Senate
and of the House of Representatives:

I forward to you extracts from the last advices from our minister in London, as being connected with communications already made.

Extract of a letter from Thomas Pinckney to the Secretary of State.

"London, August 13, 1793.

I continue to receive assurances from him, of the desire of this Government, so to conduct the measures they think themselves justified in pursuing towards the neutral Powers, as to render them as little detrimental to our commerce as the state of warfare existing in Europe will admit; and on complaint of some irregularities committed by British privateers, he requested me to select some instances where the evidence is clear, in order for criminal prosecutions to be instituted against the offenders, in which he promised the fullest support of the law officers of the crown, and I am now endeavoring to fix upon some strong cases where our evidence may be sufficient to ensure conviction. I believe it to be the desire, both of the Government and the People in general here, to be upon good terms with us but the line of conduct pursued to the neutral Powers, in which I do not perceive any symptoms of relaxation, cannot but create dissatisfaction. From the Department of State, I generally obtain explicit answers on such subjects as they are competent to decide; but where references are made thence to other departments, which is very frequently the case, the delays are very great, especially in the business with the admiralty."

Order of the Admiralty, enclosed in the letter of August 13, 1793.

September 3, 1793.

Ordered, That freight and reasonable expenses shall be allowed to all masters of neutral carrier ships, and be a charge upon the cargoes, whether condemned or restored, or ordered for further proof of neutral property: Provided always, That no mala fides, or prevarication, shall appear, or be justly presumed, or suspected, on the part of any neutral master, and that such neutral master shall make oath that such freights are not already paid for, or engaged for to be paid by the owners of the said cargoes, in view of every event of capture, or otherwise. Demurrage shall be allowed, and considered as a reasonable expense, only in cases where the ship shall be pronounced to have been unjustly seized and brought in for adjudication, or bulk broken, and his Majesty’s instructions disobeyed, or where there has been actual and wilful damage done, and misusage of persons or property by the captor, or when the time of detention for the purpose of unliverny of the cargo, or repairing such damage, shall exceed the time specified in the charter party, or when the neutral master shall not refuse or neglect to take away his ship upon bail offered to be given by the captors for freight, and reasonable expenses. That, where the value of corn, and naval stores, sold to his Majesty, shall be decreed to be paid to any neutral claimant, the owner, in cases where such corn, provision, and other naval stores, by any treaty or particular stipulation, shall be held to be not contraband, and so not confiscable, the captor who shall have brought in such privileged ships and cargoes, in consequence of his Majesty’s orders and instructions, and whom shall have given bail to be answerable, upon unliverny of the same, for freight and reasonable expenses, in case that any shall be allowed, shall be discharged from his bail; but that the freight, and such reasonable expenses, shall be decreed to be added to the price of the cargo, and to be paid to the captor by his Majesty.

Freights and reasonable expenses, where captors and claimants cannot agree, shall be referred to be settled by the deputy registrar, and merchants appointed by the court; the report, nevertheless, shall be subject to revision by order of the court, upon objections made by either party.

"London, November 11, 1793.

"Tuscany has been obliged to abandon its neutrality. Genoa has been forcibly urged to the same measures, by the commanders of a combined Spanish and British fleet, who entered their port, and seized a French frigate, and some armed vessels lying there. A minister from that republic was received at the last levee.

"A proclamation is issued, directing our vessels from Pennsylvania, Jersey, and Delaware, to perform a quarantine of fourteen days."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 28, 1794.

SIR:—I do myself the honor of transmitting to the Senate, the translation of the French act of navigation. It has been executed by the best hand which could be procured; but it is possible, that the novelty of the subject, and certain technical phrases, may have produced inaccuracies.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

The Vice-President of the United States
and President of the Senate.

[TRANSLATION.—NATIONAL CONVENTION.]

Report upon the Navigation Act, made in the name of the Committee of Public Safety, by B. Barrère; with two Decrees, passed in the session of the 21st September, the 3d year of the French Republic, one and indivisible. Printed by order of the Convention, transmitted to the departments and to the armies, and translated into all languages.

CITIZENS:—It was on the 21st September, 1792, that the Convention proclaimed the liberty of France, or, rather, the liberty of Europe. It is on the same day, the 21st September, 1793, that the Convention should proclaim the liberty of commerce, or, rather, the liberty of the seas.

It is not sufficient for you to have founded the political republic—it remains for you to found the commercial republic. The English navigation act was formed in the midst of a monarchical revolution; it bears the impression of the despot who created it. The French navigation act will be decreed in the midst of a democratic revolution; it will bear the impression of liberty and equality, which produced it.

If the French nation had resolved to give itself a navigation act, or to destroy the treaty of commerce of 1787, England would have declared against her a terrible war.

England has put herself at the head of a coalition of tyrants, to destroy our liberty; and, from that moment, France has acquired the right of supporting, with her cannon and her bayonet, the abolition of the treaty of commerce, and the establishment of a navigation act.

These advantages are the first fruits of this war; the establishment of liberty, the prosperity of the republic, and the renunciation of commerce, will be the consequence of it.

The treaty of commerce being destroyed by a decree, will create an enormous barrier in the channel between France and Great Britain. Nothing then remains, but to knock down the intermediate obstacles created by England, between France and the other Powers.

The following are our means:

For a century and a half, a navigation act, bearing the stamp of the soul of the usurper, Cromwell, has established and secured the maritime tyranny and commercial prosperity of England.

For a century and a half, the famous British navigation act, founded without regard to the rights and interests of nations, offers a series of laws injurious and invasive of the property of every People.

The law writers of Europe had proclaimed this truth; the policy of France had not suspected it. The constitutionally, necessarily, more occupied in destroying than in creating, neither thought of the French republic, nor of the liberty of the seas. A ridiculous predilection for England, a ruinous and disgraceful commercial treaty, purchased from the ministers of Capet, had enslaved us. The political views of the cabinet of London, with regard to us, prevailed entirely in the workshops of manufacturers, and in the counting houses of merchants. In the commissions of the customs, the artists in metallurgy, the dealers in the colonial products, and the carriers of the East India stuffs—bodehl our real masters.

The corroding tide, that active school of our seamen, that second basis of our navigation, that source of riches to Holland, far from being inhibited to foreigners, as is the case in England, has been carried on by foreigners.

The navigation of the colonies, infinite in its detail, immense by the extent which it gives to our commerce—this navigation, equally interesting to the husbandman and the artist, the manufacturer and the seaman, the rich and the poor; the navigation of the colonies, which enlivens our seaports, and gives motion to all the works of industry, was participated in by foreigners, and we were calm spectators.

The national marine, which grows out of ship building and the fishery, has been destroyed by the decree regarding foreign vessels as merchandise, and allowing them to be purchased; it has been destroyed, by the discouragement of the fishery among us, and weakened for the want of succor, of premiums, and of the means which might triple our equipments for the fishery, and form of it a species of secondary agriculture, as more than 300 vessels might be employed each year, and replace the three millions of salted fish, which fraud, or foreign commerce, annually introduce into France.

Finally, foreigners, more especially the English, have made themselves masters of our navigation, with capitals known by the name of francisations simulées (operations consisting in covering with the French flag, and enriching with French premiums, the capitals and fortunes of the English) because we have neglected to establish, ourselves, the English law, which acknowledges and admits to the advantages of navigation, only vessels built and owned within the nation.

Let us, in fine, strike at the francisations simulées. We have laid an embargo on the English vessels found in our ports at the commencement of the war. Here is an embargo more just and more useful to the prosperity of France—it is the completion of the navigation act; it is the seizing of the benefit of the Republic, all vessels belonging to the English, under a French flag, that is to say, those which are purchased and built with English capitals, and with a view to deprive us of our premiums and of our duties, under the name of a French merchant, of a French owner.

Our cruisers are destined to attack the English flag on the seas, and yet our avarice lends the French flag to the navigation and commerce of England.

Despotism itself had felt this injury of our maritime commerce. It had prohibited it at several epochs; but those numerous laws were not executed, because they allowed no reward to the informer of these simulations of capitals. It is necessary to give to the informer a part of the value of the foreign capitals, employed in the francisations simulées in order to obtain success to this measure, and to carry into execution our prohibitory laws on this subject. This has been objected, as an immoral measure. No, there is no immorality in ruining those who abuse us, who ruin us, those who wish to tear from us our liberty, and to devour the fruits of our brilliant revolution.
The constituent assembly bequeathed to the first Legislature too long a project of a navigation act. This legacy could not be improved by a legislative assembly more occupied in demolishing the throne of the Capet family, than in attacking the sequestration of the property of the individual. It was time for the Legislature to have a regard to the welfare of the nation. We are, at length, at the period of being able to proclaim the liberty of the seas, after having proclaimed that of men, and of the country.

Already, on the 29th of last May, the committee of public safety, in their report, presented to you the necessity of a law punishing navigation, of reviving our commercial raging ship building, of increasing the fishery, of doubling our carrying trade, by destroying the intermediate freights, and the interference of all indirect navigation in the maritime transportation of the commodities we exchange with foreign nations.

This proposition was highly applauded. You were then sensible, that, after having formed the political constitution, and after having prepared the moral constitution, by public education, you should still form the maritime and commercial constitution by a navigation act.

The agents of the London and maritime community represented to you a project of it, through citizen Marce, the 3d of July last; it was scarcely discussed: an adjournment was the result of two discourses founded upon objections, of the frivolity of which the authors themselves have been sensible. It was feared, at that epoch, that the navigation act would injure the commercial relations with the neutral Powers, as if the time of war and of neutrality did not formerly exist; and had not, too often, by the exceptions of the one, and customs, of a sort of navigation act, by her rates of duties on merchandise imported into Sweden, in foreign vessels; as if the French act of navigation were not a new commercial army opposed to the commercial army of England, for the benefit of other navigation, especially of our enemies; and to the agitation of all nations, were the most powerful in the downfall of the Navigation act, and in the repression of the natural rights of commerce and navigation, by every People in Europe. Let us then this day proclaim a law, securing those equal rights on the seas to which the nations with whom we are at peace are entitled.

Americans, Swedes, Danes, Genoese, Venetians—all you who have had the wise and useful firmness of resisting the perfidious intimations, and the insolent threats of the English, and of our other enemies—you who have not wished to interrupt your commercial relations with a free People—receive this solemn act of French gratitude. Our enemies of Great Britain, we shall be no less firm, no less free, no less happy than you, our friends.

Here is the decree so much desired for the exclusion of intermediate navigators. This solemn navigation act is about being published in all the ports of France, and sent to the friendly or neutral Powers; and this act of commercial independence pronounced by the French republicans, shall neither be revoked nor destroyed by our posterity, if our will, in the present, next year, that consummation which has been wished on the summit of the national hall. This is saying enough on what shall be the duration of the navigation act.

Before you are presented with the rapid picture of the immense advantages of the navigation act, and its influence on the national prosperity, I shall dwell on the terrilile stroke it will give to the maritime empire usurped by Great Britain, and shall show you the terrible stroke it will give to its commerce, and the ruin of the mercantile establishments, its manufactures, at the same time that it will awaken other nations—call forth other Governments to repossess themselves of their advantages, and take again on the tempestuous element and of commerce, the incompressible rights of each genius, the compass, and their topographical situation have assigned them.

Legislators, this is not a reprisal, it is not a hostile measure, it is not an exercise of the right of war that I propose; it is a declaration of the rights of nations, it is the restitution of a natural inheritance, usurped by ambitious islanders.

Doubtless if it were necessary to have motives and considerations of a national kind to induce us to threaten against these usurpers of the seas, in order to punnish these shop-keepers of Europe, to ruin these gravers of subsoils, and to wither these dealers of Kings and royal constitutions, it would be sufficient for us to present to France, now free, the act of -our sentiments, in the solemn act which the members of the British cabinet; they are known. These are they—

Who has meditated the destruction of neutral navigation, which was always respected by the English Government?

Who has sent ambassadors to Genoa, to Venice, to Naples, to require, to command war against the French, to put a stop to all communication with her?

Who has insulted, infringed upon the flag of friendly nations, for the purpose of seizing the provisions destined for a People which they wished to starve, in order to enslave? It is the English Government.

Who has taken advantage of the smuggling of America, India, and Europe, for the purpose of treating the French, as in 1783 Lord Clive treated the East Indians, to reduce them to the most absurd tyranny?

Who has had the baseness to offer us bread with chains, subsistence with a King, the means of supporting life under a devouring constitution? It is the British Government.

Who has so wantonly and unnecessarily thrown our ports to offer provisions to the slaves who would accept the shameful condition of having a King, and who would also delase themselves so far as to receive an English, or Hanoverian King?

Who hasucht to attack Dunkirk, with all the most destructive inventions of war, in order to recall to our remembrance the English commissary, who under the dastardly monarchium prohibited us from laying one stone upon another, and for the purpose of obtaining the foot of usurpation on the continent of Europe?

Who has endeavored to sow division among the French, even among the patriots, with a cool and execrable calculation, by diffusing the ideas of contrario interests, to fill the family of the French ministers with a horrid uproar?

Who has disseminated in our cities, even in our popular societies, those political corruptors, or rather infamous agents of a still more infamous English ministry? The British Government.

Who has been in the bosom of the republic, a consuming wound, a second Vendée, a civil war nourished by secret agents, who in the midst of our departments calculated the expenses, the means, and the progress of it?

Who has set loose upon our country, plunderers, refractory priests, and emigrant traitors? Who has purchased with gold, a part of our garrisons, corrupted the citizens and the generals? Who has, by assignats and intrigues with servile foreigners, mixed up the bodies of those who repelled the invasions of English ships, and those of the scum of foreign countries, for the purpose of betraying our armed brothers, and of tarnishing if they had been able, the Parisian name, the first which has been written by the hand of liberty, in the sacred annals of the revolution?

Who has supplied the victors of the Vendée with muskets, powder, cannon on which are written the names of those mercenary tyrant, the English.

Who has bought over, and seduced the guardians of a seaport, belonging to the republic, and thrown into fanaticism the people of Toulon, in order to annihilate our marine, and to destroy the inhabitants of that beautiful city?

Who has purchased the scum, the bread of corrupteur gold, an opulent and industrious town, which they have instigated to rebellion, in order to force us to destroy with our own hands, this theatre of arts, and of the finest manufactures of Europe, and then to possess themselves of the trade of the silks of Piedmont, to ruin our industry, to invite our workmen over to them, and to rob us even of our genius for the manufacturing arts, to which Europe had become tributary?

Who have betrayed the interests of their own nation to make war on a People who would have gloried in their esteem, and a more intimate alliance with them? This crime was reserved for the British Government.

Who has, by the law of the union of France, the hatred of Kings, of the emigrants, of the nobles, and of the English, must consolidate the French constitution.

Let the spectacle of so many crimes rose Europe from her lethargy; let the Governments which are slaves to Europe, which are in need of a war, and let them at last perceive with their own eyes, the precipice, through which by that corrupting and corrupted Government, who buy and sell men, cities, and ports, as we traffic in vile cattle, who are stockholders of People, as the financiers of the Rue Vivienne are stockjobbers of paper; who sport with Governments as the negro merchant sports with the inhabitants of Guinea, and who would wish to traffic in the political constitutions of Europe, as they do in the merchandise extorted from India.
Let the nations of the North, above all, hearken to the voice of the National Convention of France.

For the sake of the secret of the English.

To annihilate the maritime Powers by the means of one another, the French navy by that of Spain, and then the Foreign navy, when cut off from the assistance of that of France; Holland belongs to them, the Dutch are the slaves of the marines. As to the marine of the North, the commercial vessels of the Northern nations, from Holland as far as

Switzerland, are those which are the means of the United States, and consequently it is of importance to England, to have ports on each side of this strait. The atrocious audacity with which she has seized vessels, belonging to the Northern Powers, must demonstrate to all nations, how much her designs augment the power of the United States, and of the commercial, the marine, and the marine, of France.

Fremchmen, Europeans, neutral Powers, Northern Nations, you have all the same interest as ourselves, in the salvation of France. Carthage agitated Italy, London agitates Europe; it is a wolf placed on the side of the contintinent to devour it; it is a political excrecence which liberty has undertaken to destroy.

But we propose to you a grand commercial union, through the channel which is between Dunkirk and the English coasts, and consequently it is of importance to Germany, to have ports on each side of this strait. The atrocious audacity with which she has seized vessels, belonging to the Northern Powers, must demonstrate to all nations, how much her designs augment the power of the Northern States, and the commercial, the marine, and the marine, of France.

Let us then take a cursory view of the advantages which call for the promulgation of the navigation act. They are to aggrandize our commercial system, less to repel the industry of England, than to substitute our own in its stead. To repel our means of navigation, to create an astonishing marine; and to tell to every nation that they should require.

The advantages of commerce, the advantage of the navigation act, would be incontestible, it is founded on the rights of each nation; it is founded in your most evident and incontestable interest; it is founded upon the most imperious duties of the National Convention, those of establishing the prosperity of France, and destroying the repub-

In 1747, the Hollanders, entrusted with supplying the military marine of France, obliged to enter their ports all the vessels from the Baltic and the North, laden with such naval stores as they had agreed with the French minister to bring us. A war took place, and the Hollanders immediately forced into their ports the raw materials essential to the maintenance of our marine and the institute of shipping. Will you, then, always depend on foreigners, on their avaricious and political speculations?

Purchasing foreign vessels, is paying an enormous impost to foreigners; is proscribing our ship yards, ruining our workmen. Let your ports be free; let the ships that produce those materials be ours; let us go for them; this would secure to us every species of naval wealth.

Behold the production of a navigation act!

To purchase foreign vessels, is exposing ourselves to have a bad marine, of little solidity, ill constructed, and of too short a duration, distressed by expenses, by attacks of our enemies. To form our marine, is to create an owner interested in its duration. This is the effect of a navigation act.

To carry on, ourselves, our carrying trade, is to concert within ourselves its advantages, is to employ national transports, to be the first formers. Behold the production of a navigation act!

To carry on ourselves, our navigation, is to acquire in itself its advantages, is to employ national vessels, to be the first purchasers. Behold the production of a navigation act!

To make a navigation act, is to favor our India commerce, is to augments that of the North, to reanimate that with the Isle of France, to augment our relations with the States of America, to prepare the means of prosperity for the south of France; a purchase of pines, is missed by us for this reason, and by treaties unheard of in the history of Frenchmen. It is to recover the commerce of the Baltic, and bring us and our natural friends together; to form the most robust and valuable seamen; to impoverish the English and Dutch navigation; to possess our own rights; to have a legitimate share in the inheritance of the world with all nations; to knock down the barriers which divide ourselves and our allies from our enemies, and guard against the enemies from their privileged situation on the seas; to prohibit them from being the vehicles and the carriers of the French republic. Every vessel which the navigation act shall produce, will be as it were a firebrand to a vessel from London. And you must consider that naval victory can equal such a kind of success! And should Turkey be for any time in the power of the sultan of Lorraine and Poland: shall our fine squadron of the Mediterranean purchased for English gold, lost or annihilated for us; in five years the act of navigation will compensate that loss. Would you have an idea of the interest which England has in her navigation act? By this the great lose Jamaica, than revoke her act of navigation.

What reason have you, therefore, in being backward with the secret authors of the infamous treaty of Plenitz? Why have you delicacy with the corruptors of your fellow citizens, the destroyers of Lyons, the persecutors of Dunkirk, the purchasers of Toulon, the perverse founders of the new anglo-machiavelism? Why have you been lukewarm to the enemies of human nature and of its rights? Their navigation act excludes you from their ports; but this is not all. The excessive duties the English receive from our vessels, interdicts our access to them; never the river Thames is aviricious and devouring only with regard to us; the light house duties absorb one portion of English vessels, and those duties, in the strict economy and the interest of their money, enable them to navigate at a less expense; we can rival them in our marine, neither at home nor abroad, otherwise than by a navigation act.

Who can hereafter arrest the destiny of the commerce and marine of France? The marine has experienced losses; they must be repaired. It has had to struggle with pride and distinction; we must liberate it from those shackles. It is still commanded by men of a caste justly proscribed; we must rescue it from these scourges of the liberty of nations; we must also dismiss all the suspected officers remaining in its bosom.

Commerce has had errors and crimes to repair; it became subservient to counter revolutionary and federal views; from interest, from ignorance, or egotism. It became anti-revolutionary and federal, because it is divested of political views, and rarely sees itself in futurity; because the revolution which it has forced, specified in, and calculated upon, did not produce, at this epoch, as much profit as it had made in the first periods of it. But commerce will at last be again a national right; it has also, in its consideration of the enemy, not been in order. Liberty is not calculated at five per cent., and that a democracy was always more favorable than a monarchical government, to commercial prosperity, to the welfare of merchants, and to the equality of all, which, till now, have been valued only by them. Commerce will perceive, that monarchies were always avaricious, insolent, proud, and mature, but that republics are equal, and always fair, and are the form of the people, and economy.

Should it be objected, that this act will be in opposition to our treaties of commerce with friendly and neutral nations—the first article of the project proposed, religiously maintains all the treaties; besides, none of the treaties and commercial acts have been inserted in the project, but they have been treated as the objections of the majority, and of those who are ignorant in political economy. Besides, those laws which rest on the faith of nations, will be always scrupulously respected by the French republic, and we do not seek, by the act of navigation, but to strengthen the ties of nations, but to restore the direct commercial intercourse with them, which the covetous English have divested us of.

What obstacle remains to be vanquished? the tyrant of the seas? But he has employed against us all his strength, and the English have cowardly fled at the approach of the French bayonets.

France, was he the corruptor of Toulon? But the conquest which is made by the agency of crimes and treason, is not of long duration. The English fleet would have been repulsed, if the fanaticism of the priests, the credulity of the people, the floods of British gold, and the traitorous conduct of Paissand, and of Trogolf, had not given up to the lastly and vile English, the key of the Mediterranean.

But, one would have supposed, that English blood and treasure would have been employed only in the progress of philosophy and of liberty; but it was difficult for this Government, which has paid, by the loss of morals, for the dangerous advantage of being the depository of the gold of the world, not to deliver itself to a magnificent project, to the astonishment of the world, by giving it the totality of its treasure. Has it not lost the seas? Has it not been deprived of the commerce which makes the marine effective, its being a necessary condition, of the resources of the colonies, and without marine? The league directed against France, by the despot, accomplices of George, is composed of territorial and maritime Powers. As to the territorial Powers, who have not the same interest as the others, let us lay aside the fear of those who put their hearts in the course of the seas, and before long, will be divided by the result of their monstrous union; let us oppose them to the law for the freedom of the seas; let us oppose the iron of our pikes to their guineas, our bayonets to their phalanxes, our gunners to their cavalry, and navigation act to navigation act. Let other nations follow our example let other nations completely repair their marine, and then they will realize a national advantage, which is more dear than a monarchical crown, that has too long usurped. The vizier of George has dared to declare, a few days ago, in dictating laws to neutral nations, and clamping to restrain the rights and forms of their neutrality: "France," said he, "is to be separated from the commercial world, and treated as though she had but a single city, but a single port, and as if that place was blocked by sea and by land."

France blocked! This spoke of Rome, before their just destruction, those men of punic faith, the ambitious and mercantile Cartaginians. France blocked! Nay, if it were possible to reduce her to the confined limit of a single port, of a single garrisoned city, the French nation would then sally out of its limits by a bridge from Calais to Dover, and landing with its liberty on the British territory, too long circumscribed by our spots, the heads of George and the heads of the Englishmen, which themselves worthy of liberty; and the English island would raise, at our side, another republic, or become a desert.

But, in order to construct this bridge, which is to establish our revolutionary communications with this modern Carthage, who, after having drained India of its treasures at her pleasure to give constitutions to Europe, let us decree a double indemnity, and the whole island will be ours.

It is always said, that the English are the masters of the sea but the Spaniards were the gods of the ocean under Philip II, as the English are the tyrants under George III.

The Spaniards overthrew with the gold of Mexico and the silver of Peru, as the English are covered with the wealth of India and the treasures of the world.

Then the Spanish flag was the only one known at sea, as that of the English is the only one now seen on the ocean. However, the invincible fleet of Philip was conquer'd; his Armada, so much celebrated, was defeated; and the Spaniards have been to the seas, and the people of Peru, are no longer any thing more than the watermen of the former, and the exploring workmen of the latter.

Let Frenchmen, so intensely engaged in the revolution, pause a moment in order to contemplate its majestic and amazing progress, and then they will be as conscious of their strength as they are of their rights. Let them be for a moment-spectators: What will they see? The genius of liberty, creating, amidst the most prodigious events, a still greater prodigy, a democracy of twenty-five millions of souls, a republic of thirty thousand square leagues, boldly establishing herself upon the wrecks of a conspirator's throne, upon the ruins of a nobility as pernicious as arrogant, upon the domains of a clergy as opulent as useless, upon the judicious corps as ruinous as impolitic, upon the feudal system as absurd as inveterate, upon the titles as ridiculous as fallacious. What will they see? A free people, establishing a republican government for themselves, and establishing it by common consent; punishing at the same time the treasons of their kings, their legislators, their generals, the emigrants, and their ministers of religion, that were to make a civil war in the bosom of the State, at the same time that they were employed in extinguishing the fire-brands cast on all sides by their domestic enemies; obliged to bombard their rebel towns, and to punish the desertion of their soldiers; obliged to re-conquer for liberty their maritime and commercial cities; to depopulate, to reduce to ashes, fanatical directories, and the scions of the castles of the courts of princes, the public population; cut off the slavish and suspected part, in order that the free and energetic may defend their fire sides; forced to supply with provisions the principal city, the seat of the representatives, as a garrison is supplied, by requisitions; a people at the same time struggling against military Europe, and against the French federalists, against the counter-revolutionary confederates and against all the learned tyrants, that prepare preparations for sieges, bombardments, and plots, calculated to add lamine to all the scourges of war; this people at the same time covering all the frontiers with cannon, and soldiers, and in a word realising the expression of Pompey: By a stroke of the foot causing the earth to fly forth armed plagues.

And such is the nation that isolated merchants too long tolerated on the side of a continent which they corrupt and oppress, have hoped to reduce to a state of submission or to royalism! Let them tremble to found the treasures of their counting houses and their workshops, when the other nations of Europe, awakened even by the clanger of their colonies, shall at last perceive that Europe was entirely free at the moment in which the influence of England shall be weakened or annihilated, her policy rendered impotent, her Indian commerce diminished, and her roll reduced to that of a factor and maritime contractor.

Now you commercial and maritime cities, as populous as populous towns which have eclipsed the renown of the so-called cities of commerce before you, before the revolutionary tribunal of the public opinion. You have falsify'd your commercial avocation, and the representatives of the people are occupied in enriching you alone, or in repairing the injuries you have done us. You have been the enemies of the republic, and the republican answers you with benefits, with a navigation act, which will amend your errors and your crimes, while in time, a decree already projected, is about opening, in all the departments, canals for interior navigation, and proscribing all gowgaws, all the miserable wants of luxury, all merchandise manufactured by our irreconcilable enemies, the English. Let us have sufficient strength of mind, of patriotism, to become ourselves, by our own consumption, the first benefactors of the national manufacturers; let us multiply, let us bring our fabrics to such perfection as to render the wants of other nations tributary to us; let us multiply them in order to diminish those of Batavia, and of Boston. Such ought to be the result of the navigation act, until that desirable epoch, when all the other European nations, having also the same principle of the rights of commerce, shall have a taste for the navigation act and for the navigation laws, and to commerce that latitude and liberty which nature, the true policy of empires and justice, assigned to them.

Let Carthage be destroyed! Thus did Cato conclude all his speeches in the Roman Senate.

Let England be ruined, annihilated! This should be the concluding article of every revolutionary decree of the National convention of France.

The following are the projects of decrees which the committee of public safety present to you.

DEGREE OF A NAVIGATION ACT.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of the committee of public safety, decree:

ARTICLE I. That the treaties of commerce and navigation existing between France and the Powers with whom she is at peace, shall be executed according to their form and tenor, without derogating therefrom by the present decree.

ARTICLE II. That, after the first of January, 1794, no vessel shall be reputed French, nor have a right to the privileges of a French vessel, unless she shall have been constructed in France, or in the colonies and other possessions of France, or to the colonies and possessions of France, except directly by French vessels, or vessels belonging to the inhabitants of the country of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture, or of the ordinary ports of sale and first exportation; the officers and three-fourths of the crews of such foreign vessels being of the country under whose flag the vessel is registered, and the officers and two-thirds of the crews of such foreign vessels, in the third and fourths, jointly and severally, against the owners, consignees, and agents, of the vessel and cargo, captain and lieutenant.

ARTICLE IV. That foreign vessels shall not transport, from one French port to another French port, any commodities, productions, or merchandise, of the growth, production, or manufacture, of France, the colonies or possessions of France, or of any of the islands of the West Indies, to the effect of the vessel is registered, and the officers and two-thirds of the crews of such foreign vessels, in the third and fourths, jointly and severally, against the owners, consignees, and agents, of the vessel and cargo, captain and lieutenant.

ARTICLE V. That the tariff of the national custom houses shall be reformed and combined with the act of navigation, and the decree which abolishes the duties between France and the colonies.

The sea is a level plain, and without delimitation in all the ports and commercial cities of the republic, and notified by the minister of foreign affairs to the nations with whom the French nation is at peace.
FRANCE.

DECREES RELATIVE TO THE LICENCES OF VESSELS UNDER THE FRENCH FLAG.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of the committee of public security, decree:

ARTICLE I. That the licences of vessels under the French flag shall be, in three days, reckoning from the publication of the present decree, for those which shall be in the ports, and in eight days from the arrival of those which shall be shipped or registered in the port of the foreign country they shall be going to or from, suspended, unless the engagement of the master of the vessel that no foreigner is interested therein, directly or indirectly; and that her last cargo, arrived from the colonies or French settlements, or her present outward bound cargo for the colonies or French settlements, is not an armament on commission, nor foreign property.

If, as is too often the case, the name of the vessel, if the owner does not reside in the port in which the vessel lies, the consignee and the captain shall give security conjointly and individually, to report, as soon as may be, the proofs of ownership, and a declaration attested and signed by the true proprietor of the vessel and cargo.

ARTICLE III. That, if the property of the vessel, and also that of the cargo, which is reserved for the commerce between France, her colonies, or her French settlements, is not proved to be French by title and under oath, the vessel and cargo shall be seized, confiscated, and sold, and one half of the produce given to the informer.

Report on a project of an act of navigation of the French republic, presented to the National Convention the 3d of July, 1793, in the name of the Committees of Marine, of Commerce, and of Public Safety, by Peter Marce, Deputy from Finistère, printed by order of the National Convention.

Crimeans, and Bosphorus.

You have referred to your diplomatic committees of marine and commerce united, the proposition made in your body, the 20th of May fast, to present to you, without delay, a project of an act of navigation.

This object, so worthy of the meditation of a republicean legislator, has not been overlooked by your committee of public security. In the report they made on the 29th of May, they agree with the states general, that the advantage which would result to her from a measure, which has been adopted by England a century and a half ago, has been the most fruitful source of the prosperity of that rival power. But in a question of this nature, general considerations and observations hastily made, are insufficient to impel a nation to action on every subject.

Your marine committee has been employed in collecting such ideas and elements as might completely enlighten you on the importance of a navigation act, and finally determine you to establish, at the side of the political constitution of the empire, this first basis of her commercial constitution. They could not unite, according to your views, with these common counsels in all which has been said since the suppression of the committee of general defense; but they have concurred with those of commerce and public safety, and it is in the name of these three committees that I come to present to you the result of their deliberations.

The principal end of the navigation act which we propose, is to destroy the interposition of all indirect navigation, in the maritime transportation of our articles of exchange with foreign nations, and in fine to put a stop to that intermediate carrying trade, so prejudicial to our commerce and marine, which hitherto has rendered us benevolent tributaries of all the maritime Powers of Europe. This act has also for its object, to reserve to the national vessels the exclusive privilege of transporting the same articles of exchange from one port of the republic to another.

This double prohibition is doubtless contrary to the principles of an indefinite commercial freedom; but such freedom, perhaps, would not agree with the system of an universal republic; and it is conceived that the republic of the human race will still more difficult to realize than that of Plato. It is then our wisdom not to allow ourselves to be dazzled by the brilliant imaginations of political writers, and who warp the light of reason and experience in their specious arguments and pompous theories. It is from the example of the great nations who surround us, from that nation especially, who first knew how to apply to her navigation prohibitory regulations; it is from that source we ought to derive that conduct, if we have at heart the true prosperity of our country.

France, taken in a commercial point of view, is the richest entrepot of the universe; she is also the market which offers the most consumers and vent for the industry of other nations. Whence does it happen that, with so many resources of territory, of commerce, of productions, and of manufactures, with the habit of consuming such great quantities of the commodities, productions, and manufactures of foreigners, her navigation has hitherto been so languishing, her commercial marine so pitiful, so altogether destitute of the advantages which are its inherent right? Whence does it happen that the flag of her most formidable enemies has almost exclusively enclosed, with the exception of a few merce of navigation, the colonies, the stamps, and other productions, of triumphant and frivolous policy, knew not how to produce, or did not dare to borrow, from a great nation, proud of its wealth and of its credit, this valuable system, which has contributed more to the power of that nation, than all the victories of its arms.

In a word, it is time that the French nation should know all her advantages, and how to profit of them. It is time for her to repair all the injury she has sustained, in this respect, through the ignorance or criminal indifference of an oppressive Government, more careful of preserving, at any price, its despotic authority, more occupied in directing the intrigues or fiscal operations, more intent on maintaining the false splendor of a throne at the expense of the true interests of the people, than attentive to render productive, by every means in its power, their agriculture, their commerce, and their industry.

Doubtless there never was a more favorable occasion for procuring to our country the benefit of a navigation act. Numerous republican armies, familiarized with victory, being now fighting for her independence and her liberty, against the very Powers who are most interested in preventing us from enjoying such an act. Before the war, it might have been sufficient for us to have made such an act merely with regard to England; such was the effect on Holland, when Oliver Cromwell, in 1651, had a decree passed by the British Parliament.

At that epoch, according to the inquiries of one of our countrymen, the best informed of the present day, in the knowledge of our true commercial and political interests, (citizen Ducher*) the maritime commerce of the English did not consist of more than 60,000,000 de thalers; in 1789, it rose more than 800,000,000.

Again, at that epoch, according to the interesting report presented to the constituent assembly, on this subject, by citizen D'Albret,  one half of the navigation of England was carried on by foreigners. England has imperceptibly relaunched her rights; towards the year of 1700, foreigners possessed no more than the fifth part of this navigation; in 1725, the less than the ninth, in 1759, a little more than a tenth, and in 1791, they possessed only the fourteenth part of it.

Our navigation, a year ago, was, in regard to foreign nations, still more unfavorable than the English navigation of 1791. But we, in a considerable measure, by exacting calculations which were laid before you on this subject, in the month of December last, by the ex-minister of the home department, in the table containing the amount of the exterior commerce of the republic of France.

*If the Convention pass the present project of a navigation act into a decree, the country will be under obligations to citizen Ducher, who, for upwards of two years past, has endeavored to obtain the adoption of this plan with indefatigable perseverance, as well in committees of the National Assembly, as by the publication of his writings. This is an act of justice which it affords me pleasure publicly to render to that excellent citizen.—Note by M. Marce.

41  VOL. I.
The maritime transaction of our exchange, with the Europeans, the Levant, the Barbary States, and the Anglo-Americans, estimating on a mean year, from 1787 to 1789, inclusive, has employed in the whole, 16,325 vessels, measuring 1,184,170 tons, which, taking one with another, at 36 lives the ton, would produce 42,030,120 lives of freight.

There have been employed in this transportation, during the same period, only 3,763 French vessels, measuring, in the whole, 293,221 tons, making, at the same rate, 10,988,516 lives of freight.

In the three years, French flag has appeared to come in for only a little more than two-tenths, whilst the English flag has participated therein to the amount of four-tenths, and that of other nations in the remaining four-tenths.

In the first six months of 1795, in near six thousand vessels, measuring 500,000 tons, which have been, in the navigation, in commerce, and exportation to the Levant and Constantinople, and exporting goods to the amount of six-tenths of the total mass, whilst the vessels of England and Holland, and the Hanseatic Towns, had four-tenths, and the vessels of other nations the remaining three-tenths.

The view of navigation under another aspect, that of our direct relations with each of the European States, of the Levant, Barbary, or North America, therein will be seen, that, during the same time, (taking the mean year of 1787 and 1789 inclusively) there have been mixed in the maritime transaction of our exchanges; with Spain, one hundred and ninety-nine vessels other than French or Spanish, deduction being made of the foreign vessels who might also have been engaged in this carrier, and engaged on ships under the flag of other nations, the remaining three-tenths.

With the republic of Genoa, 261 similar vessels. With Holland, 353 similar vessels. In a word, with all the States of which I have spoken, 3,568 vessels, employed in indirect commerce, and whose tonnage amounts to 230,500 tons which, valued at thirty-six lives per ton of freight, one with another, amount to 8,301,500 lives, carried off with impunity, in one year, from our carrying trade, merely from the want of a navigation act in France, without counting upon the considerable advantages which would otherwise result from it, for her industry and commerce, for ship building in her ports, and for the employment of the whole, or even the half of these 3,568 intermediate vessels.

It must then appear plainly to the conviction of every person, that nothing would contribute more to the prosperity of our navigation, and consequently to every branch of our commerce and industry, than the adoption of an act, which, by severely excluding all foreigners who hitherto have forcibly taken from our fellow-citizens the richest portion of our commerce, would expel, of their patrimony, would in the same proportion increase the amount of their direct relations with foreign nations.

Let us hasten, then, citizens, to restore to our country all her rights, by adopting, in this respect, a grand system, which has been well done for by our ancestors.

If, at the epoch at which I now speak, our navigation is proportionally more languishing than that of England, when the genius of Cromwell gave her that so renowned act, let us hope that, by consecrating it in our maritime legislation, our navigation will in a short time acquire the same degree of splendor as that of our rivals.

With more than half a hundred leagues of land and sea, and the oceans that separate the independent nations of the Mediterranean, with ports as secure, as extensive, and commodious, with an infinite number of havens, of dock yards, of manufactures of every kind, with an immense number, as enterprise as industrious, with incalculable territorial riches, and a mass of colonies, as superior to all of them the Powers of Europe united, and absolute, with a free and republican constitution, let us hope that France, freed from the yoke of the feudal system, and that of the fiscal, inseparably connected with it; delivered from her kings, her nobles, her priests gave rise to the happy condition of depending on those laws only, which are made by herself, and not obliged to receive them from any Power whatever. I say, with the system, in such a state of things, France, with an act of navigation, would behold the rapid evolvement of all the seeds of public and private prosperity which she contains in her bosom. Let us also hope that the decree you are about to pass will prove more efficacious for your obtaining a peace with the hitherto enemies of France, than if they were to lose one hundred of their best vessels; and as to those, who at this moment preserve a circumspect neutrality towards you, be persuaded that the inevitable effect of your navigation act will be the attaching of them to you by indissoluble ties. All will be eager to seek an alliance with that European Power, from whom you will derive most benefit, by the suppression of indirect navigation, and the immensity of its consumers. Every one, from the moment of the promulgation of your decree, will pray, and perhaps make use of secret efforts for procuring you an advantageous peace, which, doubtless, at present, they have some interest in preventing; and besides, your independence, your political liberty, the establishment of your republican constitution, will be to them, as much as to yourselves, a subject of triumph and general victory.

The navigation act, as I have already said, is the basis of the commercial constitution of the republic; or rather, it is in this respect, a true constitutional act. All the other laws upon maritime navigation, should only be viewed as corollaries of this act, provisions as to the manner of its execution; in a word, merely regulating laws.

The act being in my opinion the most absolutely necessary to be enjoined upon you by your constituents, in order to the tonnage of vessels, upon the means of multiplying ship building, and of bringing them to more perfection; upon the forms of licences and passports; upon the means of discovering and preventing francisations, simulacres &c. and above all, upon a better tariff of rates of navigation, without which, the constitutional act, in this respect, cannot have the effect which was intended to be expected from it.

Your committee will now confine itself to laying before you the project of that act. By prohibiting all intermediate navigation between you and each foreign nation, it extends this prohibition, not only to the transportation of the commodities, merchandise, or productions imported, of their growth, production, or manufactures, but also to the transportation of those imported from the ordinary ports of sale, and of the first exportation. It is necessary that such a prohibition should be as extensive as it could be made, without which an act of navigation would become a null or illusory measure. The English, from whom we borrow this system, have given it that extension; and, indeed, they are so appalled for it.

The necessity of determining the requisite qualities for enjoying the privileges of a French vessel, is, that, for the exclusive admission to carry on our direct navigation, in concurrence with the vessels of the people, from whose country the respective goods are brought, there be the condition of all indirect navigation. The project of the act regulates these qualities; it also determines the only evidence by which we could know the vessels of the nation with whom we may trade; and it is easily perceived, that, if we did not impose, in this respect, those conditions which are most conformable to our interest, every ship, called a vessel, would be a vessel; and the means for abolishing indirect navigation. Besides, these conditions have a tendency to favor the direct navigation and commerce of such nation. By them it is put in the happy necessity, of multiplying, by every means, its ship building, nautics, and maritime population; and if, in the meanwhile, its own vessels and mariners are insufficient for the exportation of its commodities and merchandizes, then it belongs to us alone to supply that deficiency, and our navigation would then receive a further increase from this source, and our commerce an additional degree of prosperity.

In the first place, concours, citizens, to induce you to adopt the project of this navigation act, which would be calculated to present to the nation a thing, who are about to enjoy a constitution, that is the only way to have solemnly recognized the sacred rights of man and of citizen, and founded the freest constitution under the globe.

If all nations ought to recognise the equality, the liberty of nature, and the safety of the community, in the possession of all external dependence, to recognize the maritime rights of property in the dispositions of our navigation act. Would to heaven that all had the courage or the wisdom to follow our example. Then there would be no exclusive privilege between one nation and another; and were the act of navigation adopted, the maritime rights of nature, and the rights of the commonwealth would be recognized by the maritime nations of the globe; it would in some degree realize the whole of the commerce of the world, and without doubt is the first element of commerce, which at present in particular, is not suitable to the interests of any commercial nation.
With so many powerful inducements to decree an act of navigation, you doubtless will not, in the existing circumstances, be withheld by the apprehension that such a disposition would injure the obtaining of supplies for the republic which they are obliged to draw forth from foreigners. It is an acknowledged principle with the English themselves, and constantly practised among them, that, in time of war, neutral vessels are excepted, of right, from the dispositions of the navigation act. This act, therefore, will not add to those restrictions which the maritime war at present imposes on the maritime transportation of our exchanges or of our supplies; and neutral vessels will continue to bring us every thing which we dare not confide to our own.

Neither will you be deterred by an apprehension of injuring the personal interests of some hundreds of cosmopolite capitalists, of selfish commissioners, for whom the want of a navigation act in France, has been the principal, the most fruitful source of their colonial fortunes. The general interest of the country, that of her laborers, of her manufacturers, of her artists, of her seamen, her merchants, and all her sons culpable, to whom you will assure employment and bread—these reasons should determine you; these reasons should influence you exclusively in your deliberations. All will bless you; all will look upon the act of navigation as one of the most precious gifts you could bestow on your countrymen, next to the constitutional charter which you have just digested. When Oliver Cromwell had, through the medium of his parliament, established a navigation act, all the ports of England, manifested, by illuminations, the joy which that memorable act gave them; and the English people forgot for a moment, that they received this gift from the hand of a tyrant. How great, then, ought the transports of our fellow citizens to be, when they receive your decree from the same hands which have given them the declaration of rights and the French constitution!

May France be enabled, in the end, therefore, to boast also of having a navigation act; may it henceforward be the basis of her policy, as it is about being that of her commerce. May she soon become more rich, more flourishing, more happy, than she has been under the most brilliant reign of her despot, and never treat with foreign Powers, without her constitution in one land, and her navigation act in the other; and astonished Europe will doubtless see her merchants become, one day, her only ambassadors, like those of London and Amsterdam formerly, negotiating at foreign courts the most important interests of their country; and, after having weighed the destinies of the two worlds, and secured the prosperity and glory of their country, reassuming the peaceable pursuits of commerce.

The following is the project of the decree.

ACT OF NAVIGATION OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of their committees of marine, of commerce, and of public safety, considering that the French nation has the incontestable right of securing, by every method, the prosperity of her agriculture, commerce, and industry; that nothing has a more direct tendency to this end, than a navigation act; and that, in the solemn declaration of this act, she only makes use of the same right which she acknowledges to belong to all other nations, decrees as follows:

ART. I. That no foreign commodities, productions, or merchandises, shall be imported but directly by French vessels, or those belonging to the inhabitants of the country of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture, or to the inhabitants of the country of the ordinary ports of sale and first exportation; the officers and three-fourths of the crew of a foreign vessel, being of the country whose flag the vessel bears; the whole, on pain of confiscation of the vessel and cargo, and a fine of three thousand livres, jointly and severally against the owners, consignees, and agents, of the vessel and cargo, the captain and lieutenant of the vessel.

ART. II. That foreign vessels shall not transport, from one French port to another French port, any commodities, productions, or merchandises, of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of France, the colonies or possessions of France, under the penalties declared in article 1st.

ART. III. That, after the 10th of August next, no vessel shall be reputed French, nor enjoy the privileges of a French vessel, unless such vessel shall have been built in the colonies or possessions of France, or declared a good prize taken from an enemy, or confiscated for contravention of the laws of France, and unless the officers and three-fourths of the crew are Frenchmen.

3d Congress. No. 79. [1st Session.

FRANCE.

Message from the President of the United States, communicating certain letters from the Minister Plenipotentiary from the French republic.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you certain letters from the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic to the Secretary of State, enclosing dispatches from the general and extraordinary commission of Guadeloupe.

GÉO. WASHINGTON.

Le Ministre Plénipotentiaire de la republique Française, à Monsieur Randolph, Secrétaire d'Etat des Etats Unis.

Philadelphie, le 11° du 5° mois,

Nécès l'aus second de la republique Française, une et indivisible.

Monsieur:

La commission générale et extraordinaire de la Guadeloupe, m'a invité à remettre au Gouvernement Federal la dépêche ci jointe, dont elle m'a envoyé copie, je m'empresse de vous la faire parvenir.

J'y joint une copie de la dépêche que ce même corps colonial m'a écrite. Vous verrez, monsieur, dans l'une et dans l'autre, l'expression de l'amitié et de l'amour, dont je vous ai toujours donné les assurances les plus vraies, au nom de la totalité de la nation Française; vous y verrez aussi ce que l'on attendait des Etats Unis dans cette isle.

Je m'étais décidé, depuis l'assemblée du corps législatif, à attender dans le silence le dénouement de toutes les questions que j'ai eu l'occasion de discuter avec monsieur votre prédécesseur; cependant les événements ne l'ont pas surpris dans ce moment sans vous y prêter de remettre sous les yeux de monsieur le Président des Etats Unis, la situation critique ou sont les îles du Vent, les seules ressources aujourd'hui du commerce de notre république, à la veille d'une attaque de l'Angleterre, et manquant de munitions de guerre et de bouche. Un incident m'a mis entre les mains quelques moyens de remplir sur le champ les besoins de la plus grande, urgence, est sans cet incident, monsieur, nos colonies allaient manquer de tout. Ces moyens sont bornés; et bienfôt les embarras renaîtront si le Congrès ne décide pas finalement sur le mode de remboursement que je suis chargé de proposer aux Etats Unis.

Agréz mon respect.

PHILADELPHIA, the 11th of the 5th month, November, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR: The General and Extraordinary Commission of Guadaloupe having requested me to transmit to the Federal Government the enclosed despatch, of which they have sent me a copy, I hasten to communicate it to you.

I also enclose a copy of the despatch which this same colonial body wrote to me. You will see, sir, in both, the expression of friendship and union of which I have always given you the truest assurances, in the name of the whole French nation; you will likewise see therein what is expected of the United States in that island.

I had determined, since the meeting of the legislative body, to wait in silence the unravelling of all the questions which I have had occasion to discuss with your predecessor. However, I shall not let this moment escape without requesting you to lay before the President of the United States the present critical situation of the Windward Islands, now the only resources of the commerce of our republic, on the point of being attacked by England, and without warlike stores and provisions. Accident has put in their power some means of supplying immediately their most urgent wants; and had it not been for this, sir, our colonies would have been destitute of every thing. These means are limited; and the embarrassments will return, if Congress do not decide definitively on the mode of reimbursement which I am instructed to propose to the United States.

BASSETERRE, le 6 Brutaire, 1793, l'an 2e de la république Française.

CITIZEN: La colonie de la Guadeloupe déclarée depuis six mois de ses tyrans, est restée presque seule au milieu des Antilles, à l'abri des grands malheurs irréparables des révolutions et des attaques ouvertes des ennemis du dehors. Vous savez combien cette ile fertile doit être précieuse pour la métropole dans l'heureuse situation où elle se trouve encore; mais l'orage grande autour d'elle, et la gloire de la sauver semble vous être réservée. Ami de la révolution, et ministre de la république auprès d'un peuple magnanime dont la liberté fut cimentée du sang Français, nous devons tout attendre de votre influence sur les magistrats des Etats Unis. Lein de nous l'île de les entraîner audelà de la ligne de leur bonheur. Nous ne voulons pas acheter sûreté au dépens du repos de nos frères d'Amérique. Nous ne réclamons que les droits que nous croyons avoir à leur reconnaissance, et les secours qu'ils pourront nous donner sans nuire à leurs propres intérêts. Puissait il s'accorder avec les vœux de nos cœurs, sentir qu'il n'en est que de plus grand, que de resserrer plus que jamais les liens qui unissent la Nouvelle Angleterre à la France. Pour nous, nous ne cesserons jamais de les regarder comme les vrais alliés de notre nation, et ils trouveront toujours dans les colons de l'Amérique des frères, prêts à voler à leur secours, si jamais ils avaient encore besoin de nous.

Salut Citoyen.

The General and Extraordinary Commission of Guadeloupe to the Minister of the republic to the United States.

CITIZEN: The colony of Guadaloupe, relieved for six months past from its tyrants, remains almost the only one in the midst of the Antilles which has been protected from the irreparable misfortunes of revolutions, and the open attack of enemies from without. You perceive how precious this fertile island ought to be to the metropolis, from its present happy situation. But the storm lowers upon it, and the glory of saving it seems to be reserved to you. From you, who are a friend of the revolution, and the minister of the republic to a magnanimous People, whose liberty has been cemented by French blood, we may expect every thing, through your influence on the magistrates of the United States. Far be it from us to draw them beyond the line of their happiness. We would not purchase safety at the expense of the repose of our American brethren. We claim nothing but the rights which we believe we have upon their gratitude, and the succors which they can afford us, without injuring their own interests. May they, uniting in the wishes of our hearts, feel the strongest zeal to draw closer than ever the bands which connect New England to France. As for ourselves, we shall never cease to regard them as the true allies of our nation; and they will always find the colonists of America to be their brothers, and ready to fly to their aid, if they should stand in need of us. Health to you, citizen.

MONSIEUR:
Vous trouverez sous ce pli la copie que vous desirez de la lettre que la commission générale et extraor- dinaire de la Guadeloupe m'a proposée de faire paraître aux représentants du peuple Américain.

Je me suis prêté avec plaisir à cette démarche, parcequ'il m'a semblé que, dans les circonstances présentes, tout ce qui pouvait convaincre les Etats Unis de l'attachement indéfavorable et des attentes motivées de toutes les parties de la république indivisibles des Français, ne pouvait qu'être utile aux intérêts respectifs de nos deux peuples. Les circonstances d'ailleurs ne justifient que trop les demandes pressantes que la Guadeloupe s'est permis de faire par mon entremise au corps fédéral. Cette colonie a eu connaissance des ordres qui m'ont été donnés par le conseil exécutif relativement aux approvisionnements des Antilles; je l'ai informée des obstacles qui m'avaient empêché de les exécuter, et alarmée du danger que ce contre-tens faisait courir à une source de richesse aussi précieuse pour la France que pour les Etats Unis. Elle s'est fait un devoir de vous présenter sa situation sous les couleurs les plus vives, les plus patriotiques et les plus propres, à refuter tous les absurdes mensonges que répandent dans votre con- tinent des hommes malveillants qui n'ayant point eu la sagesse d'attendre à l'exemple de la grande majorité des habitants des îles du Ventoux le parfait exemple que cette colonie, qui fait écho à l'aveu d'un esprit si généreux et si volonta- tion, ont aggravé eux mêmes leurs maux par une résistance criminelle aux lois, et se sont précipités dans un abyme profond, plutôt que de faire quelques lègers sacrifices aux préjugés et à l'orgueil.

Agréez mon respect.

PHILADELPHIA, the 15th day of Ventose, of the 2d year of the republic of France, one and indivisible. February 4, 1794, (O. S.)

SIR:
You will find under this envelope, the copy which you desire of the letter of the General and Extraordi- nary Commission of Guadeloupe, proposed to me to have transmitted to the representatives of the American People.

I have pleaded with complaisance with this method, because it seemed to me, that, in the present circumstances, every thing which might convince the United States of the unshaken attachment, and of the expectations discovered by all parts of the indivisible republic of France, could not but be beneficial to the respective interests of our two na- tions. Besides, circumstances too must justify the pressing demands which Guadeloupe has permitted itself to make through me to the legislative body. That colony has had formation of the orders which have been given by me to the executive council, relative to the supplies for the Antilles. I have informed them of the obstacles which I prevented me from executing them; and, alarmed at the danger in which this disappointment placed a source of riches, as precious to France as to the United States, they have conceived it a duty to present to your situ- ation in colors the most lively, the most patriotic, and the most proper to refute all the absurd falsehoods spread through your country by malevolent who, not having had the wisdom to wait for the example of the great majority of the inhabitants of the Windward Islands, whom the torch of experience had enlightened with the philoso- phical spirit which pervaded over our revolution, have themselves aggravated their misfortunes by a criminal resist- ance to the laws, and precipitated themselves into a profound abyss, rather than make some trifling sacrifices to pre- judge and pride.

Accept my respect.

BASSETTERRE, le 6 9ème 1793, Pan second de la republic Françoise.

CITIZENS REPRESENTED:

Une immense conjuration s'est formée contre la république Françoise. L'honneur et le droit des gens ont été mis à l'écart. Les neutres mêmes ne sont pas respectés. Votre pavillon surtout long d'être une sauve- garde assurante, n'est plus que le jouet de la cupidité et de la hureur de nos ennemis; et comme la guerre, ce ne sont plus les vieillesquerelles des cours qui ont mis les armes à la main; elles ont tout oublié, tout sacrifié pour se réunir en étouffant dans sa naissance la liberté d'un grand peuple qui est au centre de ce continent, et qui fait incroyable à leur ambition; et c'est l'Angleterre, qui dans la noble politique, dont elle s'honore, a préparé, depuis long temps, et aachevé ce plan de destruction; tant est factve et faux l'esprit de liberté, dont ce Gouvernement cause le peuple Anglais.

Aussi en avez-vous été forc de secourer le joug; et l'essuis vous fait si le Gouvernement élit justé?

Cependant les Français vous ont secourus dont cette importante occasion, quelque soit le motif que ait pu déterminer alors une cour rivale de la puissance Anglaise.

Le bien que l'intérêt établit alors, la franchise et l'amitié l'ont resserré dans le nouveau Gouvernement des Français. Ils ont donc donné des instructions à la commission de la république et qui ont donné lieu à une affinité qui a été le desir des Francais et qu'on ne peut pas faire, un jour l'on sentira le prix de l'amitié du peuple Francais, et ceux qui y auront les premiers droits, seront sans doute ceux qui auront aidé dans l'adversité, et dans le grand acte de sa régeneratio. En vain tous les efforts des puissances conjurées minent au dedans et au dehors les fondements de son nouveau Gouvernement. La France veut être libre et république; elle le sera, et ces puissances éprouveront elles même la ruine et la destruction qu'elles appréciént à la France.

Américains du nord: Vous n'en etez pas à faire ces reflexions. La politique d'un peuple vraiment libre n'est pas fasichée; les combats qu'ils ont eus dans des droits des nations unies. Déjà la France n'a pas attendu les effets de votre assistance pour vous trairer en frères et amis. L'adresse qu'elle vous a fait a resiprée que la loyauté en le désinteressement elle offre tout a votre avantage, et elle n'a il en vire aucun compens; elle vous présente une pacte et une communauté de commerce. De décret que la convention a rendu pour vous affranchir des droits de commerce, vous vous assumer des droits de la mer, c'est le gage de sa sincérité. La France a donc indiqué l'intérêt que vous avez à ses colonies. Vous devez donc à titre, d'allié, et à titre d'associé, garanti ces possessions précieuses de la cupidité de nos ennemis et de vôtres.

Depuis la désignation, nous avons adressé au ministre de France pays des Etats Unis la demande des divers secours qui nous étaient nécessaires; le ministre de marine y avait autorisé. Cependant rien ne nous est parvenu. Nous sollicitons des secours en vivres, en munitions, et en hommes même. Quoi? Lorsque l'Angleterre, voyant que vous vous défendez ainsi, frotter le pavillon de la République française de ses vaisseaux, et désavouer les colonies Francaises au nom d'une hypothèse, la France ne se fait pas de la peine de porter contre une indigne trahison, au nom d'un republique maitresse d'un territoire et d'une population immense. Nous n'avons donc pas crû, dans une hypothèse semblable, déroger au droit des nations et à notre fidélité Francaise en invoquant des secours en hommes. La foi des représentants nous suffit.
Quant aux secours en munitions de toute espèce, c'est une dette à liquider, et le ministre de la marine l'indiquait dans sa lettre du 2 Février, adressée à St. Lucia. Nous avons écrit de concert avec le Général Callot au délégué de France près de vous. Nous ferons aujourd'hui une démarche plus directe et plus franche, en partant immédiatement au Congrès; c'est pour appuyer la demande faite au ministre et dont il doit notifier les articles. Nous pensons que cette preuve de confiance et de loyauté, égale dans les Français de la métropole et des colonies, agira efficacement auprès des États-Unis, et que si les liens de la fraternité attachent à jamais nos deux nations, de même les rapports précieux du commerce ne manqueront pas d'une même esprit et un même intérêt entre les républicains de l'Amérique du nord et ceux de l'Amérique du sud.

The General and Extraordinary Commission of Guadeloupe to the Congress of the United States of America.

CITIZEN REPRESENTATIVES:

An immense conspiracy is formed against the republic of France. Honor, and the law of nations, have been put out of the question. Even neutral Powers have not been respected. Your flag, especially, far from being a sufficient safeguard, is no longer more than the sport of the capidity and fury of our enemies. This is the system of war: they are no longer the old quarrels of courts, which lead them to take up arms; they have forgotten all, sacrificed all, in order to league together, and to stifle in its birth the liberty of a great People, who are in the centre of the continent, and who give unbrave to their ambition. And it is England, who, in the noble policy with which she honors herself, has for some time prepared and accomplished this plan of destruction; so factitious and false is the spirit of liberty with which that Government amuses the English people.

You have also been forced to shake off the yoke; and would you have done so, if the Government were just? However the French succeeded you on this important occasion; whatever might have been the motives of determining at that time, a court which was a rival of the English power; the connexion then formed, from interested motives, sincerity and friendship have bound more closely in the new French Government. They have already given you testimonies of that affinity which ought to unite two republican Governments; and whatever may be done, the value of the friendship of the French people will one day be experienced, and those who shall have the first right to it will, doubtless, be those who have added them in adversity, and in the grand act of regeneration. In vain are all the efforts of the conspirators to injure within and without the foundation of their new Government. France wishes to be free, and to be a republic; she shall be so; and those Powers will themselves experience the ruin and dismemberment which they prepared for France.

Americans of the North! You are not to apply these reflections to yourselves. The policy of a people truly free, is not to be fascinated by combinations of cabinets; it is ostensible and open; it consists in the rights of nations united.

Hitherto France has not waited the effect of your assistance as an inducement to treat you as brothers and friends. The address which she sent to you requires nothing but loyalty and disinterestedness; she offers every thing to your advantage, and has no reward in view. She presents to you a compact and commercial community. The decree which the convention has passed to enfranchise to you the rights of domain, and to assimilate you to the people of her own nation, is the pledge of her sincerity. The convention then indicated to you the interest which you have in her colonies. You therefore owe to justice, to allies, and to the title of associates, the guaranty of these precious possessions from the capidity of our and your enemies.

Since the declaration of war, we have addressed to the minister of France with the United States, the demand of divers succours necessary for us. The minister of marine had authorized them. However, nothing has come to our hands. We now solicit succours of provision, ammunition, and even men. What! when England, seeing, for the first time, the white flag waving among her vessels, came to take possession of the French colonies, in the name of a king without dominions; and North America, witness to that political perfidy, not able to lend a helping hand against an unworthy treachery, in the name of a republican mistress of an immense territory and population! We have not, therefore, in such an hypothesis, conceived that we derogated from the law of nations, and our French fidelity, by invoking succor in men. The faith of republicans to us is sufficient.

As to the succours of ammunition of every kind, there is a debt to be liquidated, and the minister of marine pointed it out in his letter of 2d February, addressed to St. Lucia. We have written, in concert with General Collot, to the French minister residing with you. We now take a more direct and free method, by speaking immediately to Congress, in support of the requisition made to the minister, and of which he will notify the articles to you. We think that this proof of confidence and loyalty, the same in the Frenchmen of the metropolis as in the colonies, will operate efficaciously with the United States; and that, if fraternal connexions forever attach our two nations to each other, so also will our commercial relations no longer manifest but the same spirit, and the same interest, between the republicans of North, and those of South America. We greet you citizen representatives.

BAISSETTERRE, November 6, 1793, 2d year of the French republic.
Message from the President of the United States, communicating information in relation to our affairs with Great Britain and Spain.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The extracts which I now lay before you from a letter of our minister at London, are supplementary to some of my past communications; and will appear to be of a confidential nature.

I also transmit to you copies of a letter from the Secretary of State to the minister plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, and of the answer thereto, upon the subject of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, together with the copy of a letter from Messrs. Carmichael and Short, relative to our affairs with Spain, which letter is connected with a former confidential message.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Mr. Pinckney to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, November 23, 1793.

Dear Sir:

My last letters to you were of the 9th and 11th of the present month, since which I have received yours of the 7th, which I have written on the相同的 paper, and from which it appears that the former having been forwarded to me only a week ago. The bill sent to me by the cashier of the bank, drawn on Messrs. Bird, Savage, and Bird, was inSpecified, the other, on Messrs. T. and F. Baring & Co. is noted for non-acceptance, of which circumstances, I have apprized our bankers at Amsterdam.

You will have received, long before this reaches you, my account of the issuing of the additional instructions; of the arrangements which were made on the subject, with the reasons urged by this administration for the same, which I am particularly instructed on that point, I shall reiterate a formal representation in writing; but having reason to believe the measure which the particular answer will be, I will not defer, on that account, giving you the substance of a conference I lately had with Lord Grenville. Having received authentic intelligence that the truce between the Algerines and Portuguœuse (of which I forwarded to you the first information I had received) has been negotiated by the British counsel at Algiers, without the knowledge of the court of Portugal, and learning at the same time that the negotiation for peace with the Northwestern Indians had failed, I thought it my duty to obtain explanations on these subjects. (a.) I therefore turned the conversation to them, on Lord Grenville's expressing his satisfaction at hearing that the epidemic disorder in Philadelphia had nearly ceased, by expressing my gratitude for the interest he took in our welfare, and for his general professions of friendship to our country, and assured him of our earnest desire, that this friendship should be continued and augmented, and that our interests were identical. But I observed it was unfortunate that the circumstances which occasioned any material diminution of the prosperity of the United States, so far as they affected the measures of this country; that I had a well grounded hope, that it was not the intention of administration to do us injury; that I was certainly it was not their interest so to do; but that people who felt grievances, who imagined they knew the parties from whom those grievances originated, and that those parties had it in their power to remove, could scarcely view, with that eye of cordiality we mutually wished to promote, those who were the willing causes of their misfortunes: that the circumstances which were now particularly calamitous to the United States were, first, the Indian war, which I attributed to the detection of the posts; the second was, the letting loose the Algerines upon us, which I attributed to their counsel, Mr. Logie; the third was, the interruption to our commerce and neutral rights, which I placed to the account of the measures of this country. I elongated several on these subjects in such arguments as suggested themselves to me, and concluded, by expressing a reliance that this administration would not hesitate to relieve us from the inconveniences we felt in consequence of their measures. On the subject of the detention of our vessels with provisions bound to France, I mentioned, that as I was particulalrly instructed, I should offer a written representation; to which Lord Grenville said he would give an answer in writing. His Lordship, in reference to what I had advanced, stated, that, with respect to the truce between the Poruguœuses and Algerines, this country had not the least intention or a thought of injuring us thereby; that they had been applied to by their friend and ally, the court of Portugal, to procure a peace for them with the Algerines, and that certain arrangements had been instructed to effect this purpose; that he, finding the arrangements for a peace could not immediately take place, had concluded the truce; that in this the Algerines received they had done no more than their friendship for a good ally required of them; but that the measure was also particularly advantageous to themselves, as they wanted the co-operation of the Portuguese fleet to act against their common enemy, which was at liberty to do when no longer employed in blocking up the Algerine fleet. As I had stated that the court of Portugal had promised a convey to the American vessels then in their harbors, he assured me they were proceeding in another place, in which we were both of opinion, for obvious reasons, that it was convenient to continue it; that this negotiation was not terminated; and he assured me that he continued to receive pressing applications from the commercial subjects of his Majesty, on account of the non-execution of the treaty on our part. He further said, that if the measure of relieving the posts were to take place, their settlements would be exposed to the attacks of themselves and the expense and disadvantages which I had described to be at present the case with us; for these reasons, he thought administration would not be justified in relinquishing the posts at once; but expressed his regret, that Mr. Hammond had not been permitted by us, to enter into a negotiation for some arrangements relating particularly to the posts, and (as I apprehended him) Indian affairs, which, he had no doubt, would have terminated in our common advantage and neutral satisfactions; but that, when Mr. Hammond wished to subject that business, he was given to understand (though in the most civil terms) that the less that was said on that subject the better. (b.)

The newspapers will convey to you all the public intelligence. The affairs of France appear to me to be conducted with great energy; but of that you will undoubtedly receive more accurate information than I can offer. The little republic of Genoa appears to have displayed more of the dignity of an independent State, and greater respect for her own and the neutral rights, than have been expected from her position.

I remain, &c.

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

Mr. Le Colonel, a friend and aid-de-camp of M. Lafayette, who served in America, and has considerable arrear of interest due to him, applied to Mr. Morris, about a month ago to purchase some arms from Paris. I wrote to Mr. Le Colonel, in great distress; I therefore have drawn upon our bankers for £100 for him, from the contingent fund, to be replaced from Mr. Le Colonel's demand on the public. I shall be obliged to you for your direction, in similar circumstances, should they occur. (c.)
foreign relations.

Elucidation of the ciphers in Mr. Pinckney's letter of November 25, 1793.

(b.) He was then proceeding to another point, but being unwilling that the extraordinary hint contained in what he had last said, should remain merely as a hint, I begged him to detain a little longer on that subject, and asked him explicitly, whether, in case we should comply with what they conceived to be the full execution of the treaty on our part, they would relinquish the posts to us? He answered, that in case any treaty had deferred the accomplishment of their part of the obligation for nine years, whereby the complete execution could not afterwards be had, neither reason nor the law of nations would exact a strict compliance from the other party.

You will see by their last treaties, that they cannot now retract their instrucutions concerning the detaining of corn; neither do they appear to have the inclination. On the contrary, I am informed they meditate fresh embarrassments to our trade.

(c.) He produced to me a letter from Lafayette, desiring me to furnish him with money from the thousand pounds sent for him by the President.

The Secretary of State.

Mr. E. Randolph to the British Plenipotentiary.

Philadelphia, February 21, 1794.

Sir: From a review of your letter to my predecessor, on the 29th day of November, 1793, it appears that you had not then received such definitive instructions relative to his communication of the 29th of May, 1792, as would enable you immediately to renew the discussions upon the subject of it.

Suspended as this negotiation has been for so long a time, I have it in charge from the President of the United States, to repeat the inquiry, whether any instructions have been yet received by you, for pursuing such discussions? Permit me to hope for the honor of a reply at as early a moment as may be convenient.

I have the honor, &c. &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

P. S. I thank you for the communication of his Britannic Majesty's declaration which I have just received.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain.

Mr. Hammond to the Secretary of State.

Philadelphia, February 21, 1794.

Sir: In answer to the inquiry contained in your letter of this date, I have the honor of informing you, that I have not yet received the definitive instructions that, as I have before assured you, I expect to obtain, on the subject of the discussions to which you allude.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEO. HAMMOND.

The Secretary of State.

Messrs. Carmichael and Short to the Secretary of State.

St. Lorenzo, October 22, 1793.

Sir: Immediately on receiving your letters by Mr. Blake, we did ourselves the honor of informing you of it by post on the 29th ult., and sent four copies of our letter via Cadiz and Lisbon. The Algerine cruisers having since passed the straits, the American vessels in those ports, by which the several copies of that letter would have been forwarded, will probably not put to sea. This suggests to us the idea of writing at present by the packet to Falmouth, to repeat to you the information of Mr. Blake's arrival here, although it is not in our power to add any of importance as to the subject of the letters received by him.

It was our intention that he should have left this place for Cadiz about this time, even if we received no written answer to our written communications on that subject made by our letter to M. de Gardouqui the 1st of this month. We were, according to custom, constantly assured that we should have it daily; but we did not think it would be proper, after your letter of the 12th of July, to keep him longer, as we knew, from the invariable form and constant usage in doing business here, that it might be delayed beyond all kind of calculation. Our determination in this respect has been changed by the Algerine cruisers. He would not consent, and indeed we could not expect it of him, to embark on board of an American vessel sailing from Cadiz or Lisbon, even if any should sail, whilst the Algerines are on that coast. We know of no other there destined for the United States, and therefore think it would be improper he should proceed to either of those ports on that contingency. We have written to Cadiz, Lisbon, and Bilboa, to obtain information on that subject; and shall decide according to what we may learn from thence. This will unavoidably delay his departure. We think it indispensable that you should be informed thereof, and shall, therefore, send different copies of this letter.

* The mode of conveying this letter prevents our going into detail even by cipher. We think it, however, proper to mention to you, that, on our communicating to Gardouqui the subject of your despatches, he gave us the strongest verbal assurance, that it was not the intention of Spain to interfere, if we should take place between the United States and the Indians. He promised an immediate answer to that effect, to our letter of the first of this month to him. After delaying this in his way, from day to day, under the various pretences of our letter being to be translated to present to the King, &c. he informed us, on the 19th instant, that at the moment he should have answered it, the Duke de la Alcudia had determined that it belonged to his [136] and had, therefore, taken into his hands our letter, and the other papers, in order to give the answer, for which we were to [136] to him. This we accordingly did by our letter of the 20th instant, and are now expecting the answer. From experience we do not think the verbal assurances of Gardouqui sufficient to assure you what a written answer will be; it will be the same, however, from the Duke that it would have been from him. In the conversations which Mr. Carmichael has had with him, he has always found his sentiments consonant to the professions made by Gardouqui.

We shall do ourselves the honor of writing to you again, without delay, and in the mean time beg you, &c.

WM. CARMICHAEL,

W. SHORT.

The Secretary of State for the United States, Philadelphia.

* Note. The part comprised within brackets was written in cipher.
Gentlemen of the Senate:

I have caused the correspondence, which is the subject of your resolution of the 34th day of January last, to be laid before me. After an examination of it, I directed copies and translations to be made, except in those particulars which, in my judgment, for public considerations, ought not to be communicated.

These copies and translations are now transmitted to the Senate, but the nature of them manifests the propriety of their being received as confidential.

G. Washington.

Correspondence between the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at the republic of France, and the Secretary of State, in the years 1789, 1793.

No. 1.

Paris, June 10, 1790.

Dear Sir:

I have the honor to acknowledge your favors of the 10th of March and 28th of April. My last was of the 25th of April. As Mr. Short remained here until the 4th instant, and was better acquainted with the current transactions, I relied on him for the communication of them. He informed you that we obtained an interview with M. Dumouriez on the 15th of May. In this interview, he told me that he thought it was best that I should be presented to the King immediately, but yet my first audience did not take place until the third of this month. He apologized for this delay as proceeding from the state of public affairs, which kept him continually occupied and agitated. I shall have occasion, if I may so say, to refer to you in detail on this subject. In this conversation, as a fair opportunity presented itself, I made use of it to tell him that, during my residence here in a private character, I had as well, from my attachment to the cause of liberty, in general, as to the interests of France, in particular, endeavored to effectuate some changes in the constitution, which appeared to me essential to its existence, than being not in a public character, I thought it my duty to avoid all interference in their affairs, of which, from henceforth, I should be a mere spectator. I will not trouble you with repeating what passed at my reception by the King and Queen.

On the next day, I dined with M. Dumouriez, and delivered the letter from the President to the King, on his acceptance of the commission; and especially made a friendly mention of the missions of their agents, which are not uncommon. By the by, several members of the corps diplomatique have spoken to me on the subject of this letter, which has given them a high idea of the President's wisdom. I took occasion, according to your instructions, to mention the obnoxious acts of the late Assembly, which was the first topic our interview, and the efforts made to legitimize, with that no respect, everything, which, in modern days, has been publicly avowed. This hope has hitherto proved fallacious, and, indeed, as far as can be judged from the temper and character of the Flemish people, and from the information I have been able to collect, it seems to be a vain hope, that, however they may feel an aversion to the late Assembly, they will never be disposed to that of France. There is, therefore, no probability of any capital division in that quarter, and the chance of it is daily decreasing, from two natural causes: First, that the French troops are extremely undisciplined, and, secondly, that the force of their enemies will soon receive very considerable additions. On the first of these heads, I need not particularize, since you will receive, from various quarters, the sufficient evidences. In respect to the latter, having combined all the intelligence which can be relied on, it results that, about the middle of next month, the allied armies will be one hundred and eighty thousand strong, exclusive of the French emigrants. It is doubtful whether these last will be permitted to act, and for the following reasons: First, it is not to be supposed that twenty thousand gentle and volunteers, serving in their own affairs, can be well disciplined; consequently, it is to be apprehended that they will be more injurious to their friends than to their enemies. Secondly, it is next to impossible that, in such a number, all irritated by injuries either real or supposed, there should not be some who will act more from motives of private vengeance than regard to public good; and it is certain that acts of cruelty and injustice will rather tend to prolong than terminate the contest, at least to give it that termination which they wish for. Thirdly, it is notorious that the great mass of the French nation is less solicitous to preserve the present order of things, than to prevent the return of the ancient oppressions, and, of course, would more readily submit to a pure despotism, than to the degradations of monarchy whose only limits were found in those noble, legal, and clerical powers, by which the people were alternately oppressed and insulted. And this observation leads naturally to the object of the combined powers, which I conceive to be the establishment of a military Government on the ruins of that anarchic system which now prevails, and in the continuation of which neither Power but England has any interest. The others, seeing that, without a counterpoise in the marine scale, Britain must possess the empire of the ocean, (which, in the present commercial state of the country, is a kind of universal empire) cannot but wish to re-establish this kingdom. But a great question occurs—What kind of Government shall be established? The envoys hope for their daring ariests, that some plan may be so admirably be supposed that Kings will exert themselves sufficiently to destroy at home, and more especially, as the French Revolution having been begun by the nobles, the example will be so much the more striking, if they become the victims of it. But, if the allied monarchs have an interest in destroying the aristocracy, they have a much stronger one in maintaining a free and well preserved system, by which all must inevitably extend itself, and force the neighboring Powers to relax from their tyranny. If the court of Berlin could have been insensible to this truth, in which it is so deeply interested, the zealous reformers here would not have permitted the Prussian ministers to slumber over their rights; nor have they remained content with the expectations of the people, which might have been only political, has become personal, and I have good reason to believe, notwithstanding the profound secrecy which is preserved respecting the designs of the grand alliance, that it is in contemplation to put all power into the hands of the King. Things have been prepared for that event by the inconsiderate partisans of liberty in their enmity to abolish ancient institutions, they forget that a monarchical, without intermediate ranks, is but another name for anarchy or despoticism. The first, unhappily, exists to a degree scarcely to be paralleled.

* The paragraphs which were omitted, in the papers communicated to the Senate, are now supplied.

And such is the horror and apprehension which licentious societies have universally inspired, that there is some reason to believe the great mass of French population would consider even despotism as a blessing, if accompanied with self-denial, and go out of their way to render it acceptable, in order to avoid it.

Another great means of establishing despotism here, is to be found in that national bankruptcy which seems to be inevitable. The expense of the last month exceeded the income by about ten millions of dollars. This expense continues to increase, and the resources to decrease, as the People's confidence in the Government is shaken by every event. The country people have hitherto been actuated in a great measure by the hope of gain. The abolition of tithes, of feudal rights, and burdensome taxes, was so pleasant that a cold examination of consequences could not be admitted; still less an inquiry into the strict measure of justice.

The abolition came on those philosophical and mathematical arrangements of theфик, which are very beautiful and satisfactory; and to which there lies but one objection of any consequence, which is, that they are inexpedient. Now I have frequently observed, that, when men are brought to abandon the paths of justice, it is not easy to turn them back on their progress above the abyss of corruption and the despotic system. The nation has been induced to adopt it, and, if once established in the non-payment of taxes, the question will be decided without much difficulty, if once the Legislature get out of this city.

They are already preparing for a march, and it is intended to take the King with them, to effect a decree has been drawn and not read, such as is expected to start some serious opposition. As it was signed, it is not printed in the Gazettes, which are printed on an issue of the 20th of June, and I suppose it is in the Assembly now.

An opposition will be made by the Parisian militia to the latter decree, because they begin to perceive the object; and as it seems to be a pretty general opinion among them, that no capital opposition will be made to the Austrian and Prussian troops, they consider the person of Louis the Sixteenth as forming the most solid reliance they have to protect them from plunder and outrage. This decree may therefore occasion either a schism between the militia and the Assembly, or among the inhabitants of Paris, or both.

Already there exists a serious breach between the members of the present administration, and a part of them much concerned about the reason that makes the King so readily believe that the forces of those who have passed them within a few days. There exists also, a mortal enmity between different parties in the Assembly. At the head of the Jacobin faction is the Deputation of Bordeaux, and that city is, as you know, particularly indisposed to our commercial interests. It is this state of universal hostility, or rather confusion, to which Dumouriez alluded when he said, in addressing my colleague, that he feared the King would not be such as the Constitution should have been at the dissolution of the Legislative Assembly for not permitting any well-grounded expectations.

At present the two armies are in march to form a junction, when the whole will be commanded by Monsieur Luckner. It is expected that he will head the body of sixty thousand picked troops, and the Austrians cannot well oppose above thirty-five. It is said he is to march to Marseilles, but I have pretty good reason to believe that the stroke will be about the twentieth to the twenty-fifth.

M. Dumouriez told me that he was perfectly easy in respect to Russia, whose only object was to get the House of Austria fairly engaged, and then to take advantage of its embarrassments. I told him that he must of course be well informed of that subject, but that since the evacuation of Warsaw, his mind could not be so justly inclined to the latter. Peremptorily refused—the situation of their respective armies not permitting any well-grounded expectations.

Whether this movement be in concert with the Austrian and Prussian Cabinets or not, is doubtful. I cannot as yet make up any tolerable judgment on the subject, but I believe in that case it may be a pretext to good effects, and I mean to keep that in view.

The details I have entered into, and the information which you will collect from the public prints, will show that, in the present moment, it will be very difficult to excite attention to other objects than those by which we are so strongly agitated. The best picture I can give of the French nation is that of cattle before a thunder storm. As long as they cannot see that the object is in the distance, and the deputation is for himself, they will notesta. The obstacles to success form but excitements to the attempt. It must, however, be made with caution, because any sudden change of affairs may bring forward persons who would oppose a measure merely because their predecessors had approved of it.

You desire me, among other things, to send you the Moniteur, but the editor of that paper does not give so faithful a report of what passes in the Assembly as you will find in the Logographe. If there be any one of the Gazetters who is impartial it is the author, or rather transcriber, of this. I send you of course the Gazette of France, which says, you know, whatever the ministers may tell you to say. The Patriote Francais, written by M. Brissot, may give you the republican side of the question, as the Gazette Universelle does that of the kind of monarchy proposed by the constitution. The paper called the Indicateur is written by a party who wish to make a very vigorous executive, although strange to tell, that party consists of the persons who, in the beginning of the late Assembly, did every thing in their power to bring the kingdom into the situation now experienced. The Journal of the Jacobins, will give you what passes in that society. The Gazette of Leyden, which I transmit according to your request, will convey a kind of digest of all these different sentiments and opinions. Thus, sir, if you have the patience to look over these several papers you will perceive very well that our situation is done out of much of the same kind.

For the present I take my leave, with the assurances of that sincere respect and esteem, with which I am, yours;

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

No. 8.

PARIS, June 17, 1792.

My DEAR SIR:

I had the honor to write to you (No. 1) on the 10th instant. The ministry is changed rather sooner than I expected, that is to say as to the totality. Messieurs Servan, Roland, and Claviere, were dismissed by M. Dumouriez, only to bring in those of his party who were the friends of his predecessor. This would certainly bring on very serious quarrels, it was supposed that he had prepared himself, before hand, for all consequences. It would seem, however, that he was less firmly fixed than he imagined; for, as the reason for sending them away was, that they insisted on the royal sanction to the two obnoxious and unconstitutional decrees, it was in the natural order of things that they should be immediately sent back to the Assembly. Instead of that, it is said that M. Dumouriez, insisted on passing both, and, in case of refusal, threatened resignation. To his surprise the King accepted the resignation, and, in consequence, his friends newly appointed go out with him. As the present set have not all his friends, as I will deliver collector to the late minister, the not at the foot of my letter the names and places of such as may finally be fixed on. The Jacobins were busy all last night to excite a tumult in the city, but the precautions taken to prevent it have as yet proved successful. I am told that M.
Lucas and M. de Lafayette still persist in their determination not to risk an action. If so, the present state of anarchy may continue for some time. If they fight, and gain a victory, it is not improbable that we may witness some outrages of the most flagitious kind. If, on the contrary, there is any capital defeat, the jacobin faction will be a little moderated. On the whole, sir, we stand on a vast volcano; we feel it tremble, and we hear it roar; but low, and when, and where, it will burst, and who may be destroyed by its eruptions, it is beyond the ken of mortal foresight and discretion.

While I am writing I learn the following to be the arrangement for the new ministry: of the old set two remain, M. Duranton, and M. Lacoste; the former is said to be a pretty honest man, but rather too much attached to the faction; the latter is looked upon as the last one considered as an honest man, well acquainted with the business of the Marine. M. Lajaran is appointed to the Department of War; he is a creature of M. de Lafayette: his ability doubtful, but his principles sound. M. Chaumonot is appointed to the office of Foreign Affairs; he is un homme d'esprit, but one monotonous in his deportment, and a very insipid and didactic informer, and he is said to be a man of integrity. M. Moustier, a very worthy man, is named to the Department of the Interior, but his acceptance is very doubtful. The minister of Impostions is not yet fixed on; he will be a cipher, for two or three such have been applied to. The plan is mangled; it will be purged (at any rate) of some of its members, but one great doubt exists whether it will not be driven off by the jacobin faction. It is in contemplation to make a serious effort against that faction, in favor of the constitution, and M. de Lafayette will begin the attack. I own to you that I am not sanguine as to the success.

Very much is to be done, and there is very little time to do it, for the foreign enemy will soon be greatly superior. The impression given is one of weakness and impotence, and is frequently interrupted. Thus, while a great part of the nation is desires of overturning the present Government, in order to restore the ancient form, and while another part, still more dangerous from position and numbers, are desirous of introducing the form of a federal republic, the moderate men, attacked on all sides, have to contend, alone, against an immense force.

I cannot go on with the picture of my heart when I reflect that the finest opportunity which ever presented itself, for establishing the rights of man throughout the civilized world, is perhaps lost, and for ever.

I write on as events arise, and shall continue to do so, until the opportunity to send my letter shall present itself.

I am, very truly, your sincere and humble servant,

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

No. 3.

PARIS, July 1, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

According to your orders, I sit down to render this day a state of my account,* which will be but short, because I shall charge, at present, no contingencies. There are some such which will come in my next account, and which would be stated this day; but as I have not yet got into the house which I hired immediately after my arrival, and which I have daily been in the hope of entering, my papers and books remain in the state in which they were.

Add to this that the amount is not great, and that I am very much occupied, and frequently interrupted.

I left London on the last day of April, wherefore my salary to the last day of June, being for two months, was fifteen hundred dollars. My outfit is nine thousand, making, together, ten thousand five hundred dollars, which I have drawn for on the bankers of the United States at Amsterdam.

I have heard up the several newspapers to this day, and shall send them to Havre. My Secretary's salary will now commence.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient and humble servant,

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

No. 4.

PARIS, July 10, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

I had the honor to write to you (No. 3) on the first instant. On the seventeenth of the last month, I mentioned the plans then in contemplation, and gave a short view of the existent state of things. I did not communicate those events which have since taken place, because you will find the most ample details in the several gazettes. On Saturday the seventh, a force was acted in the Assembly, in which the principal performers played well their parts, and the King was doped according to custom. Things are now verging fast to the catastrophe of the play. For some weeks the adverse parties, I mean court and jacobins, have been laboring each to cast on the other the odium of violating entirely the constitution, and commencing the civil war. The party which calls itself independent, and which in fact is the fearful party, begs hard for peace, and seizes eagerly whatever bears the appearance of the Moderate. The word terms will mean whatever power may choose to explain them to mean. The King and Queen believe that the actors were in earnest, and knowing that their lives had been at stake, were overjoyed; and their timid counsellors, trembling under the tyrannous powers of the Assembly, seized with eagerness the bait of reconciliation which had been thrown out, without any hope that they would swallow it. One of them, whom I have already mentioned as a very worthy man, saw in the rest of the Assembly the signs of deception, and opposed the opinion of the other, but in vain. Events in justifying him have fixed his predominance. This day the King will commence a new career, and if he goes through, I think he will succeed. I have every reason to believe that this letter will go safely, but yet I cannot justify paying more on the subject, because otherwise the confidence reposed in me might, in the course of events, prove fatal to my informant.

The present intention of the King is to secure the liberty of France; but whether he will preserve the steady purpose by those varying events, which must soon take place, to me appears uncertain. Indeed I doubt whether he will be sufficiently master of his own counsel. The idea of purging such purpose, even if it be not changed. Whether he will live through the storm is also uncertain: it will blow hard.

The exterior enemy hovers over his prey; and only seems to wait the moment which he has fixed to himself for his own stroke. New parties to the grand alliance daily show themselves. The Parliament has declared: Holland sees on the point of adhering; and doubts in regard to England begin to appear. The forces which France is to oppose to her numerous assailants does not exceed one hundred and eighty thousand undisciplined men; some of whom wait but the opportunity to desert. Against her are collected two hundred and fifty thousand of the best troops in Europe, besides the most noted general in this hemisphere. The intention was not to go before the harvest, in order that subsistence might be easily procured. Whether this plan will be changed, in consequence of what is like to happen here, I cannot say; I rather think it will. I understand that the manifesto which precedes attack, will destroy the constitution, and claim for the King (what it calls) his rights; for the clergy its possessions: the nobles their immunities; of the royal family; that the grenades nationales will be considered as armed peasants, meddling with business not their own, and therefore not under the protection of the laws of war. The allied monarchs are to declare themselves in arms not against France, but against the révoltes. You will easily see that the suspicion is false and fond.

I have repeatedly pressed the Minister of Foreign Affairs to come to a settlement of accounts, which he has promised to do; and I think I shall accomplish my purpose; because the marine department is to treat with me for supplies to St. Domingo. I mean to be generous in the terms of exchange for this supply, obtaining, at the same time, a benefit. But I will observe, sir, that the whole account on this head is to be balanced against the cotton. Two reasons operate with me on this occasion: First, I think that we ought to encourage our own agriculture and arts, and secondly, I think that what is paid here goes into a gulf of unbottomed profusion, and can but little advance the real interests of the nation.

* Not in the office, but probably in the Treasury Department.
I have also repeatedly called the minister's attention to the obnoxious acts of the late Assembly, and to their proposition for a new commercial treaty. He has replied, very candidly, that, for himself, he should be glad to settle every thing to my satisfaction, but that his ministerial existence is too precarious to undertake any extensive plan; that the attention of the Assembly (towards itself) is a present moment to think of its exterior interests; and that the Assembly, at open war with the Executive, would certainly reject whatever is to be presented to them. These are truths which I knew before, and therefore I thought it best not to urge too strongly for a decision, in the unpromising moment. The apparent reconciliation of Saturday seemed to give a better prospect. The court, on Sunday, had an air less embarrassed, and therefore (although the dictate of my judgment was different from that of others) I thought it my duty to make a formal application, which I did yesterday in a letter, a copy of which shall be transmitted. My intelligence of this morning justifies the opinion I had formed, and proves that the matter must be yet, for some time, suspended.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esqr. Secretary of State.

Copy of a letter from Gouverneur Morris to Monsieur Chambonias.

PARIS, 7th July, 1792.

SIR: I have already had the honor of communicating to you the good dispositions of the United States towards France, and of which they sincerely desire to multiply the proofs. I have had that of informing you at the same time, that, in the last session of Congress, although wines arriving from other countries had been highly duties, nothing has been added to the duties yours paid, which is, in effect, granting a premium on them: whence a considerable vent for them must be the result. It is thus, sir, that the American Government, who occupies one of the means of paying off its pecuniary debt, endeavors, at the same time, to acquit that of gratitude. You may reckon upon its punctuality, and give assurances of it to the King.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

GOUV. MORRIS.
The communication of it has been made to the President of the United States by the minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty, but hitherto, this project has been stationary. I am instructed to assure you, sir, that the United States will, with true satisfaction, attend to all the overtures which shall be made to them on this subject, and that they desire to found that treaty upon a basis just, solid, and lasting. I hope, and I am confident that it will be in the power of any body to appreciate the advantages of it; and I venture to certify to you beforehand, that, if he is instructed by the King, for this negotiation, he will experience, on our part, the most amicable dispositions. You will give me much pleasure, sir, when you shall be pleased to authorize me to write that the commission for the purpose has been given to him.

[TRANSLATION.]

From Monsieur Chambon to Governor Morris.

Paris, 3rd July, 1799, 4th year of Liberty.

I have received, sir, the letter which you have done me the honor to write to me on the 9th of this month, and I have read with all the attention the importance of its contents merits. I shall not fail to communicate to the King and to the National Assembly the new proofs of friendship and interest which the United States have recently shown; and I shall also lay before them the desire testified by the American Government of cementing the union of the two people by a new treaty of commerce, and I shall immediately take the King's orders for opening this important negotiation. I have no doubt of its being soon brought to a happy conclusion, since the two Governments are equally desirous of founding the new treaty on a basis of the strictest justice, and consequently to the reciprocal advantage of the two nations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 6.

FRANCE.

Paris, 15th August, 1799.

DEAR SIR:

My last was of the first instant, (No. 5.) Since that period another revolution has been effected in this city—it was bloody. Success, which always makes friends, gives to the present order an air of greater unanimity than really exists. A very considerable party is deeply interested to overturn it, but what may be their conduct is uncertain. Whether they will confine themselves to idle vows and empty wishes, or whether they will break out into action, is doubtful. Some of them are men of enterprise, but it is rather small than great enterprise. As you know well this kingdom, it may, perhaps, be sufficient to mention the kind of persons which compose this party. They are those who called themselves the moderate, or middle men, and who hoped to balance the two extremes, and govern the kingdom by playing off one set against the other. This, in quiet times, requires great talent as well as great energy. But when the forefathers of the former, who play this game should have a considerable armed force, because neither argument nor persuasion can then avail. It remains to be proved by the fact whether they possess such force. If they do, it must be in the hands of M. de Lafayette; and, as all must know and exercise, I forget that the government may, perhaps, be necessary that those who play this game should have a considerable armed force, because neither argument nor persuasion can then avail. I have long been convinced that this middle party, who, by the by, were the prime movers of the revolution, must fall to the ground, and that those who compose it must join one of the great factions. The aristocratic faction is still split into two or more. Some are for absolute monarchy; some for the ancien régime, but who is the devotee of the old French constitution, and who is the advocate of this last ground, but the idea of an hereditary Senate stuck in their throats. The King, who has an uncommon firmness in suffering, but who has not the talents for action, and who, besides, is a very religious man, found himself fettered by his oaths to the constitution, which he, in his conscience, believed to be a bad one, and about which, indeed, there is now but one opinion in this country; because experience, that great parent of wisdom, has brought it already to trial and condemnation. The King, from the causes just mentioned, would not step forward, and, of course, there was no standard to which the adherents of the two chambers could repair. The republicans had the good sense to march boldly and openly to their object, and as they took care not to mince matters nor embarrass themselves by legal or constitutional niceties, they had the advantage of union, concert, and design, against the disinclined members of a body without a head. If, under these circumstances, the foreign force were out of question, I should have no doubt that the republican form would take place quietly enough, and continue as long as the morale of the country would permit. You know the state of minds and sentiments of the nation: (If I may be necessary) form the calculation for yourself. The circumstance of foreign force is, however, on the present occasion, a preponderating object, and I think its effect will depend on its activity. Should the Duke of Brunswick advance rapidly, he will be joined by great numbers, even of the armies opposed to him, because the late change will furnish to some a reason to consider their situation. If he can do little, as they say, to the old friends of the Constitution, he may be cautious and slow, it is probable that those who are now silent from fear, will habilitate themselves by degrees to speak favorably of the present Government, in order to null suspicion; and that thus a public opinion will appear, which, when once pronounced, governs the generality of mankind. If, by this means, the new republic takes little root, foreign Powers will, I believe, find it a difficult matter to shake it to the ground; for the French nation is an immense mass, which it is not easy either to move or to oppose.

You will observe, sir, that matters are now brought to a simple question between an absolute monarchy and a republic; for middle terms are done away. This question, also, must be decided by force; because, on one side, it is in the hands of the people, who cannot treat for themselves, and who will not permit others to treat for them in respect to the important interests which are now at stake. If, as in former times, some factitious nobles were at the head of a party, they would, as formerly, take the first opportunity to stipulate for themselves the advantage of their party; but, without entering here into a question of relative integrity, I do not think that the people are so attached to any particular man as to have what may be called leaders; and those who appear as such, are, in my opinion, rather instruments than agents.

I am, dear sir, in the history of things, nor trouble you with a recapitulation of events. I enclose, and shall send by the present opportunity, the gazettes since my last, which will communicate all particulars which you may desire to know. Since the operations of the tenth, the Logographe, Gazette Universelle, and Indicateur are suppressed, as indeed are all those who were guilty of feuillettismes that is, adherence to the club des feuillets voisin.

I must, therefore, you know what I mean for what you find in the other gazettes, written not only in the spirit of a party, but under the eye of a party. The first must influence the most honest printer in the coloring of some facts, and the second will restrain the boldest printer in the publishing of other facts. If it were not as it were, and they had, I should communicate all the particulars which came to my knowledge; but this individual task would answer no good end, and, long before my letters would reach you, changes must inevitably take place.

Of particular, however, it is becoming to note. You will find that the Assembly immediately superseded the appointment of Monsieur Bonne Carrère as minister to the United States. This man's character is such as would be, and stained by infamous villains. By what influence he was introduced into the office of foreign affairs, I know not; for I was then in England; but I have reason to believe that it was the poor expedient of the feuillette to watch and check, and, perhaps, to betray the Jacobin ministry. While the King was pressing Monsieur de St. Croix (an eight day minister) to accept the Department of Foreign Affairs, this last declared that he would not serve; Bonne Carrère was retained; and, to get rid of him, they invented the expedient of sending him to America. I considered this step as a kind of insult, and transmitted my sentiments on the subject to the King, who, thereupon, told Monsieur de St. Croix that I was angry at that appointment, and he must arrange the matter with me. That he wished
I would prevent his being received. The minister apologised for himself by saying the nomination had taken place before he came into office, and that he had renounced against it. He apologised for the thing as well as he could, admitting, always, that it was wrong, and added that his embarkation should be delayed, and I was at liberty to prevent his being received. To this I replied that he might not embark at all, but be removed; and that would have been done, for, when he presented the Don for his appointment, the minister refused to sign it.

In the mean time the new revolution took place, and the history of M. Bonne Carrère's ministry is at an end. It may perhaps be misrepresented, and, therefore, having stated the facts, I think it right to add, that it proceeded from downright weakness. He was supposed to have been trusted so far that he knew too much. This was the case with some others, not better than him as to essentials, though not so much abused.

I shall send, herewith, a packet containing my correspondence with the commissioners of the treasury relative to our debt, and, in the same packet, you will find a letter from Mr. Cathalan to you, relative to a riot at Marseilles, and his conduct therein. He has written two long letters to me on that subject, and I have replied by one, of the thirteenth instant, which you will also find enclosed with his letter to you.

I have made the best use I could to fill up the gap that I did not myself authorized to go into the settlement of the account, finally, with the commissioners of the treasury. This is obvious. I must again, in this place, repeat, and add that, notwithstanding my utmost efforts, I have not been able to bring the Minister of Foreign Affairs to consider, for a moment, the question referred to me respecting the sums paid and paying in America. What is still more surprising, they have not asked for the explanation of the treasury of St. Domingo, has done nothing in that affair.

Two ministers have occupied that place since the decree. Each has given me various rendezvous, but neither has appeared at the time and place, because circumstances of the moment have obliged them to attend to something else. Indeed, the Executive of the late constitution has been at the last agony for these three months, and, of course, has thought more of saving its life than of doing its business.

The present Executive is just born, and may perhaps be stifled in the cradle. If a general arrangement could have been made with the late government for paying the whole of our debt, at some fixed exchange, so as to do justice, and fulfill the obligations of the United States, I should have been pleased, and all properly authorized, should probably have taken on me to make the needed engagements; and, in so doing, I should have made a great sacrifice to the public, because I wish, of all things, to be free from any pecuniary transactions: for I, by experience, that the utmost possible purity will not prevent malicious insinuations, which, however unfounded, may be highly injurious, to be in debt in the hands of a minister, we may experience some considerable losses on exchange, not to mention the dead charges, which are considerable too. It has therefore appeared to me most advisable to make one general statement and settlement of the whole; and if it shall appear that we have gained, and that they have lost, by the modes of payment, then to give a good round sum as a compensation, and as it were a grant, we have the reputation of the good we do, and the sacrifice we make, and because, otherwise, the agents of this Government might attribute to their address an advantage gained, instead of giving credit to our generosity for a compensation granted. And it seems important to establish the latter idea, because it cannot fail to extend our credit throughout the world, and consequently to facilitate all pecuniary operations which hereafter we may have occasion to make.

Before I conclude this letter, permit me, my dear sir, to request the orders of the President respecting my line of conduct in the circumstances about to arise. Perhaps these orders may not reach me until the circumstances are past; but, even then, they may serve as a guide to reason, in the circumstances which shall. If they arrive in season, they will relieve my mind from a great weight. At present, I feel myself in a state of contingent responsibility of the most delicate kind. I am far from wishing to find any fair and reasonable risk, and I rely on the justice of Government, at the same time, to mark out as exactly as possible the conduct to be pursued, as well as its goodness to judge favorably of cases under necessity.

I am, with sincere esteem and regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

GOUV. MORRIS.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

[Accompanying the foregoing despatch.]

PARIS, July 3, 1792.

"Two days ago I saw M. Le Corentin, who told me that his friend had made application to the Spanish court to obtain an assignment on the debt from the United States, for the discharge of a debt due to him, and that Mr. Gardou said the United States owed Spain above a million of dollars, being in part for advances made in America. This assertion struck me, and, as I had formerly some knowledge of the state of our finances, I ruminated on the subject, and have thereby brought back to my recollection the objects which I suppose he contemplated. They are twofold: first, advances for the United States, and, secondly, for the State of Virginia. These advances have been regularly charged against the States and the United States by the persons to whom they were made; and to these persons, I believe, full payment, but I am pretty sure that at least partial payments, have been made. It seems, therefore, most advisable to leave the settlement of the American account to be made in America. As to the advances made to us by the court in Europe, I suppose it will be right to adjust them in America."

PARIS, August 13, 1792.

Dear Sir:

I have received your two favors of the third instant. I am very sorry to find that your city has been so much disturbed, and I hope that the peace which you say was re-established may be of long duration. The moment is critical, and you must be guided in circumstances, such as you mention, by your own discretion. In general, however, you will observe, that, as consul of the United States, you should take part as little as possible in revolutions or counter revolutions. I think however, that despite contributions to you by the people of this city, we had duty in not giving them that liberty to which the title of citizens, which we should undoubtedly take part with those who wish to establish a free government.

Mons. S. CATHALAN, Jr. Consul at Marseilles.

No. 7.

PARIS, August 17, 1792.

Dear Sir:

If I have not hitherto mentioned the applications made to me by the foreign officers who have certificates whereof the interest is payable in this city, it has not been for want of sufficient cause, but because I did daily hope to have the satisfaction of informing you on the subject. Many have spoken to me, written to me, and have given to all the general assurances that justice would be done, that I would transmit their claims, and the like. I now enclose a letter from the Polish envoy, relative to the claims of Brigadier General Kœsikowski, and I have told the Count de Cramon that I should daily expect despatches from you on this subject. I did this because General Dupont told me that he has information from Colonel Terriant that these claims are all honorably provided for.

In the uncertainty as to what may have been done, I feel it my duty to bring the matter to your recollection, persuaded that you will do every thing which may be proper on the occasion.
I enclose in like manner, a letter I have received from Mr. Francis Coffyn of Dunkirk, respecting the consular office in that city. I tell him in answer to it, that I shall inquire of M. de la Motte as to the appointment he complains of, and will forward this letter to you, and take your orders. These you will, I trust, be so kind as to give me, I know not Mr. Coffyn, and consequently, can say nothing either for or against him.

I am, with esteem and regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

[Letters referred to in despatch No. 7.]

SIR:

I here state the business concerning General Kosciusko, about which I spoke to Mr. Short, Chargé des Affaires of America, upwards of a year before your arrival, which he assured me he had communicated to the Government, and of which I had understood to speak to you at the house of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, when you requested it in writing, the better to bear it in memory.

The said General Kosciusko, a native of Poland, who has served in America, to whom you yourself have rendered the justice of saying that he is a man of distinguished talents, has a promise from the treasury of the United States for a sum of $66,314 18s. 9d. which is equal to $12,290 4½ of the current money in America.

I enclose the copy of the promise.

It is of the interest that such sum annually, and he has, in fact, received it for one year from Mr. Grand, banker of Paris; but for some years past he has received neither interest nor principal.

He desires that a banker may be directed to pay him regularly the interest, together with the arrearages, or, if more convenient, that he may receive the whole sum. This, sir, is what I have the honor to recommend to you, requesting you to do it.

I am obliged to absent myself from business with which I am charged, but shall return in two months, and then await your answer.

I have the honor to be, &c.

L. ANC. D’ORACZEWSKI,
Ambassador and Minister Plenipotentiary of Poland.

DUNKIRKE, July 36, 1792.

HONORED SIR:

I have the honor to inform your excellency that, since the year 1775, I have been entrusted by your predecessors, the honorable commissioners, ambassadors, plenipotentiary ministers of Congress at the court of France, with all matters concerning the United States at this port, as appears by my correspondence with Mr. Deane, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Jay, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Jefferson; in 1778, I was entrusted with the forwarding of two cargoes of gunpowder, and other warlike stores, from this port to Philadelphia. During the whole course of the war, I supplied, by order of said commissioners, all the American prisoners which had been brought from England, with money to defray their expenses to the different ports of France, where they shipped for America, and in these occasions amounted to a considerable sum. In 1781, being then at Passy, and consulted by Dr. Franklin, I penned the plan for the cruise of the American squadron, under the command of Captain Paul Jones, in which he took the English frigates Seraph and Countess of Scarborough, and other prizes, some of which were brought to this port, and others carried to Norway; and I was afterwards commissioned by Congress to claim the prizes taken by said squadron, detained at Bergen, in Norway, by a requisition of the British consul there. In 1783, being at Paris, at the request of Dr. Franklin, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Barclay, I was appointed arbitrator to settle the accounts between Mr. Beaumarchais and Congress, for the stores he sent to America during the war, and, by my award, reduced his demands of a considerable sum. On the first of January, 1782, Thos. Barclay, Esq. consul general for the United States, at L’Orient, appointed consuls of the other ports of this kingdom being then made sent me a commission, (of which I enclose a copy) to empower me to act as agent for the United States at this port, in consequence of which, I have ever since acted in that capacity, and rendered numberless services to the American captains, and other subjects who frequented this port, for all which services, I never received, nor demanded, any reward, commission, interest, or recompence whatever, except a thankfull acknowledgment from said commissioners, and their full approbation to all the transactions they entrusted me with.

Since your excellency’s appointment as ambassador for the United States, at the court of France, nothing material occurred at this port which merited your excellency’s attention, and thereby I have been deprived of an opportunity of making a direct application concerning the objects entrusted to me by your predecessors. But, having been informed that a certain M. de la Motte, concerned in the house of Messrs. Le Mesurier & Co. at Havre, who styles himself vice consul for the United States of America, has given a commission in his name to a Mr. Watson, an Englishman, late clerk in the said house at Havre, and lately established in the commercial line in this town, that I have corresponded with, and in which he has become interested in the business of the United States, I enclose you a copy of a letter which I have received which was sent to Mr. Watson, in the idea that no person was appointed at Dunkirk to act in the capacity of agent for the United States, in which I was invested by the power transmitted to me by Mr. Barclay, and by the approbation of your predecessors. I take the liberty to inform your excellency of these circumstances, and rely to you on your excellency’s justice, to appreohend that my zeal and my activity, and a perfect disinterestedness, your excellency would suffer me to be excluded from the appointment, and the preference given to a young Englishman, lately established in the commercial line, at this port, to whom the necessary experience cannot, with any judgment, beallowed. The inconsideracy of the interest of an Englishman in matters which may occur, concerning the common interest of the United States and this kingdom, is too striking to escape your excellency’s attention. If the administering of the proofs of the zeal, activity, and disinterestedness, which I have manifested in the different occasions where my interference between the American commissioners and the ministers of this country, has been found necessary, and which are consigned in the great number of letters which I received from your excellency’s predecessors, I am ready to give your excellency all the satisfaction that may be wished for, and convince your excellency that I am as ambitious to obtain your excellency’s confidence, as I have been to merit that of your predecessors.

I have the honor to remain, with great respect, honored sir,

Your excellency’s most obedient and most humble servant,

To his Excellency M. Morris,
Minister Plenipotentiary for the United States of America at the Court of France, at Paris.

L’Orient, January 1, 1792.

SIR:

The arrangements in the consular department not being yet entirely formed, I shall probably, at some future time, address you more particularly on the subject than I now do; and, in the mean time, you will please to consider yourself as appointed by me, agent for the United States of America, at the Port of Dunkirk; and act in that capacity, until some future consul, or myself, inform you, that the power I give you is expired. The business that will require your immediate care is that of attending to the wants of any of the American vessels whose commanders or supercargoes apply to you for advice and assistance to claim all American seamen, who may be detained contrary to their inclinations on board vessels belonging to any Power whatever, except their own country;
THOS. BARCLAY.

Mr. FRANCIS COFFYN, Dunkirk.

I hereby certify, that the above copy is conform to the original, reposing in my hands.

F. COFFYN.

No. 8.

PARIS, 22d August, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

My last (No. 7) was of the 17th instant. In No. 6, of the 16th, I mentioned the revolution of the 16th. I suggested my idea that the force commanded by Mousique de Lafayette would not be brought to immediate action, and that, in such case, he and his friends had nothing to hope for. He, as you will learn, encamped at Sedan, and official accounts of last night inform us that he has taken refuge with the enemy. Thus his circle is completed. He has spent his fortune on a revolution, and is now crushed by the wheel which he put in motion. He lasted longer than I expected. Some other officers tried to influence their troops in favor of the late constitution, but without effect. They are, it seems, yet to learn, that an officer has not complete possession of his soldiers, till rigid discipline has led them by the hand over fields of glory, in which he has shared their danger, and pointed them the path which he wants to tread. I hope therefore that you can be present when the President of Britain offers for peace to the King, what you are to consider as the last effort, and plans, they must hereafter take place. In the mean time, much suspicion, much jealousy, and many victims, are all in the natural order of things. I do not find that the Prince of Brunswick has made those rapid movements which the existent state of things required, and he loses much by the delay. He probably understands too well the business of war, and his hands are too heavy on the board where he is placed. His people are, however, full of national talent. I cannot, for a moment, suppose a possibility of beating him with the French army, if army it may be called, where there is no discipline; but, if he will not commit himself a little to fortune, it appears to me a very easy matter to defeat him within the time till winter shuts the theatre. We are now far advanced in August, and he has at most three mouths before him.

The day before yesterday, the British ambassador received a despatch from his court, which he immediately transmitted to the present Minister of Foreign Affairs, and, at the same time, asked for passports. This despatch has not yet been communicated to the Assembly, nor his carriage examined and searched. This violation of the rights of ambassadors could not fail (as you may suppose) to make impression. It has been broadly hinted to me, that the honor of my country, and my own, require that I should go away. But I am of a different opinion, and rather think that those who give such hints are somewhat influenced by fear. It is true that the position is not without danger; but I presume and respect as visionary the notion which Mr. Short had some time ago, and which I think is reasonable and right. The great object, however, was to get the money, and Congress was to fix the exchange. I told them to hear and adjust any disputes that may arise between officers and seamen to see that the subjects of the United States receive that protection to which they are entitled; and to transmit to the American minister at this court, and from me, to time from time, every thing of consequence that occurs relative to America; and every information which may be thought necessary. Your own judgment will inform you that something may occur to make your writing as complete as is possible, and that this will be, when any matter of importance arises necessary to be immediately communicated, and that an opportunity of transmitting it offers from your port, or from your neighborhood, by which loss of time will be prevented.

It is reported that Mr. Trenchard has made such arrangements for France as America may be, there being no fund that I know of to discharge such engagements, and the application for supplies of that nature ought not at present to be made to me.

I shall occasionally transmit to you such information as will be necessary, and should any difficulty arise in the execution of your office, let me know, and I will endeavor to remove it, and give you all the advice and assistance in my power. At the same time, accept you a name of the agents which are such as are appointed.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most humble servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

No. 9.

PARIS, 30th August, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

My last (No. 8) was of the 22d instant. In No. 6, I mentioned to you that I had not been able to adjust, with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the rate of exchange which should govern the payments made and making in America, on account of our debt to France. And that I had not been able to see the Minister of Marine, to act with him the same which the Assembly had determined to apply, out of that debt, to the use of St. Domingo. You will have seen, by my correspondence with the commissioners of that trust, that the payment of six millions will nearly balance the account, according even to their statement of it, over and above the four hundred thousand dollars which are to be paid at Philadelphia, during the current year.

A few days since, Mr. Monge, the present Minister of the Marine, desired an interview, and, at our meeting, presented me a regular contract for payment of eight hundred thousand dollars, as being equivalent to the four millions of livres which I had already paid and as much more. I will not trouble you with the conversation, because it ended with a request, on his part, to meet Mr. Le Brun, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Claviere, the Minister of Public Contributions. This meeting took place yesterday, by their appointment. The same form of agreement was again produced, and Mr. Claviere, who was principal spokesman, mentioned my signing it as a thing of course. I told him that I had been authorized to settle with the late government the exchange of one-half of that sum, already paid and paying on this very account. He spoke of such settlement as the easiest thing in the world, and advanced, on the subject, exactly those principles which Mr. Short had refused to be governed by, and which I think is reasonable and right. The great object, however, was to get the money, and Congress was to fix the exchange. I told them...
Dear Sir,

My last (No. 9) was of the thirteenth ultimo. The object of this is merely to transmit a letter forwarded to me by Mr. Cathalan, who desires me to communicate the scarcity to my friends, and at the same time mentions, that last evening, between ten and eleven, he received a visit from some commissaires de section, who came to punish me for not having sent my bills due in the course of the last four months. I had no bills due, and had no idea of them, as I did not have a penny to my name. I was told, however, that the man who had promissory notes in my possession had been seized, and I would appear to be suspended, for the present at least, but as there is no real executive authority, the order may very easily be revoked, should it suit the views of those who enjoy the confidence of that part of the people who are now active.

I am very dear sir, very sincerely yours,

GOUV. MORRIS.

No. 10.

PARIS, 16th September, 1792.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq.

My dear sir,

I have just received a letter from Mr. Pinckney, to which I shall enclose this, to be forwarded to you.

Last evening, between ten and eleven, I received a visit from some commissaires de section, who came to punish me for not having sent my bills due in the course of the last four months. I had no bills due, and had no idea of them, as I did not have a penny to my name. I was told, however, that the man who had promissory notes in my possession had been seized, and I would appear to be suspended, for the present at least, but as there is no real executive authority, the order may very easily be revoked, should it suit the views of those who enjoy the confidence of that part of the people who are now active.

I am very dear sir, very sincerely yours,

GOUV. MORRIS.
special agents; and I think that your appearance in a public capacity would probably induce the husbandman to enhance the price of his productions, and keep them back from the market. Your letter to Mr. Jefferson shall be forwarded by the first opportunity, and I think it most proper to convey the intelligence it contains in that public way, than to give private intimations which might enable the parties receiving them to make extraordinary advantages, where all ought to be on an equal footing.

S. Cathalan, Consul at Marseilles.

Paris, 19th September, 1792.

Dear Sir,

My last was of the 10th instant. I shall confine myself, on the present occasion, to transmitting copies of my correspondence with the ministry, on the subject of the conference mentioned to you in mine (No. 9) of the 30th of last month. I transmit, however, copy of what I wrote on the 20th of August, because the answer of the 8th of this month would not be otherwise intelligible. I will not, at present, make any comments on this correspondence, and I do not know whether I shall ever mention it again. I send you, also, as the best means of communicating the state of this city and kingdom, the short but lively picture drawn of them in the Assembly, by Mons. Masuyer, on Saturday last, the 15th instant, and the report made on Sunday morning, by Mons. Rolaud, Minister of the Interior. I wish it were in my power to communicate a more flattering prospect than is held out by these extracts. It gives me pain to think of it, and will, I am sure, give you pain to read, the distressing state of the country for which we have both a sincere regard. All which I can do, under present circumstances, is to be silent. Bad news have a flight so rapid that I will not add to their wings.

I am, my dear sir, very truly yours,

GOUY. MORRIS.

Thomas Jefferson, Esq.

Enclosure 1.

Paris, 30th August, 1792.

Sir:

I have the honor to send, herein enclosed, a letter which I have just received. The seal which is affixed to it indicates, in a manner not to be doubted, that it has been opened by authority of the Government. Such a proceeding, sir, discloses suspicions neither honorable to him who is the object of them, nor to those who are susceptible of them. I request you, therefore, sir, to put a stop to such violations.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

GOUY. MORRIS.

To M. Le Brun, Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Enclosure 2.

Paris, 30th August, 1792—4th year of Liberty.

Sir:

I now bring to your recollection the essential point on which we conferred together yesterday, only to convince you of the necessity of preventing the great inconveniences which would result from the pretended insufficiency of your powers. Upon the principle that you are not authorized by your instructions to treat with the new Government of France, your functions would be null at this present moment, and our colonies, whose urgent wants of supplies require our present solicitude, our activity, and zeal, would be at the point of being destroyed. I have the honor to observe to you, sir, that we have too high an idea of the sentiments of friendship and attachment of the United States for France, to believe that their representative could or should hesitate, under any pretext whatever, to contribute to the success of an arrangement begun by Mr. Short, the continuation of which has been confided to your care.

The suspension of the King, of his functions, should not change, sir, the dispositions of a nation with which we have connections of friendship and interest, and whose independence is our work. They know all the efforts and sacrifices we have made to procure it for them. We do not mention the matter to excite your acknowledgment, but your good will. I believe, sir, that you owed it to the French nation before it really took place; and if you should manifest it at the present moment, you would certainly fulfill the vows of your constituents.

But to return, sir: I ought to observe that the King is only suspended; besides, the Government being immovable, you do, or ought to abstain, no representative can, without an express order from his court or congress, agree to treat directly with it. Since the establishment of the new Government, you have not received from your constituents any order which can divert that measure; you might, then, sir, cause to be fulfilled the engagement entered into by Mr. Short, relatively to the eight hundred thousand dollars, which shall be held at our disposition in North America, for the purchase of necessary supplies for our colonies. If the facts I have just detailed do not lead you to alter the determination which you made known to us yesterday, I request you to be so obliging as to assign the reasons for your refusal in the answer which I shall expect from you, and which will serve me as a direction.

Mr. MORRIS.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs.

LE BRUN.

Enclosure 3.

Paris, 1st September, 1792.

Sir:

Your letter, of the 30th August, was not delivered to me till yesterday at four o’clock. I am going to answer it at once, and you do me the honor to say that you have left the engagement entered into by Mr. Short, relatively to the eight hundred thousand dollars, which shall be held in North America at your disposal, for the purchase of necessary supplies for your colonies. I have already observed to you, sir, and I now repeat to you, that the care of making the payments of our debt to France has been confided to Mr. Short, and that I have never been authorized to meddle in it. I venture to add, sir, that you have in your own offices the proofs of what I have just advanced. Your predecessors have told me that they had received from the Minister of France, at Philadelphia, the copy of a letter which Mr. Hamilton, our Minister of Finances, had written to them on the 5th of March. You will see, sir, that Mr. Hamilton therein says: "From the instructions which have been given to Mr. Short, from the known progress of his operations, and by some passages of one of his letters, of the 15th November last, I conclude, with certainty, that he has paid all the arrears of interest and reimbursements of capital, due to the end of the year 1791." He adds, (with regard to the four hundred thousand dollars agreed to be paid during the year 1792) "that there are no engagements, and that there is not a due". Here I think it my duty to observe to you, sir, that all the engagements entered into by Mr. Short will be fulfilled by the United States with the greatest exactness.

I must also, sir, request you to fix your attention to another very important fact which I have had the honor of mentioning to you. Mr. Short had left in the hands of our bankers at Amsterdam very large sums, for several months, in constant expectation of definitive arrangements with regard to the payments—arrangements which did not take place during his mission. On the 30th of July last, I mentioned to the commissioners of the national treasury, the impossibility in which I found myself of concluding any thing in that respect, until I had received the orders of my court. At this time, Mr. Short, on his part, pressed me to cause the commissioners of the treasury to receive the money which was at his disposal; and the commissioners, also, pressed me to make payment of it. Therefore, having agreed with them the exchange by which it was to be regulated for the moment, (and excepting always the decisive arrangements to be made with the person who should be authorized for that purpose by the United States,) I requested Mr. Short, by a letter of the 6th of August last, to give orders to our bankers to pay to Mr. Hoguer, Grand & Co. bankers, designated by the commissioners of the treasury, the sum of one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, of the bank, which, at the said exchange, amounted to six millions, money of France.

You had the goodness to observe, sir, that, according to the account of the commissioners, there was due to France, on the 1st of July last, the sum of six millions and a half; that in that sum is comprised that of three millions one hundred and fifty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight pounds, which was not in the calculation of Mr. Hamilton, and of which a part at least is yet to be verified. You will also be pleased to observe, in the same account, the payments actually made in America are not comprised, which will make an additional sum of more than two millions. Hence it results that, in every statement of the case, the reimbursements to be made to the present time, are all acquitted. I further observe to you, sir, that I am in nowise authorized to dispose of the sums which were or may be in the hands of our bankers at Amsterdam, and that all that I have done or that I have been able to do, has been to address myself to Mr. Short, who, alone, still has the management of it.

There yet remains, sir, to be brought to your recollection another important fact, and which is found to be proved in that same letter of Mr. Hamilton, which is, that, on account of the extraordinary expenses occasioned by our war against the savages, it was impossible for him to promise the payment of the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, at earlier periods than those agreed on, and of which the last is on the 1st of December, 1792.

You can judge, sir, from what I have just mentioned, whether it is possible for me to go further than the offer I have made you, of using the most lively solicitations to importune for the purpose of engaging it to grant the relief you require of me; an offer which you have refused to accept.

As to the suspension of the King, sir, you certainly must be sensible, as well as myself, that a minister has a right to express no sentiment whatever, without the previous orders of his nation. And, when I spoke to you on the subject, I did not wish to express to you any thing concerning it, but only, when you insisted, to lead you to perceive, that, if it were possible for me to have ventured to compromize myself, by consenting to the pecuniary arrangements which you desired, and which have not been confided to me by my court, you could not claim from it the execution of my engagements; because, that, in acknowledging your authority, it might reply to you that you should have waited for new letters of credence.

In the letter which I have had the honor to write to you, the 21st August, I informed you, sir, that my intention was to remain at Paris, but the style of years of the 30th August, imposes on me the necessity of requesting a passport from you, that I may leave France. I shall travel with my horses a short journey, and shall take the route for England, by way of Calais. I leave here my house, my secretary, and part of my equipage, till I receive orders from the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

M. LE BRUN.

Enclosure 4.

PARIS, 8th SEPTEMBER, 1792;

4th year of Liberty and 1st of Equality.

SIR,

I have received the letter which you have done me the honor to write to me, and I have obtained the opening of a letter, the superscription of which is addressed to you, at Paris, and stamped Spa. I immediately communicated your complaint to the majority, and you may be assured that attention will be paid to it.

I have been satisfied that you have had credit, and that you may have a further letter than the one you mention, from the personal correspondence such an event would not have been committed, and I believe you are too just, sir, to view the opening of your letter in any other light. I shall add, that there has not been the slightest intention of derogating from your person, and the character with which you are clothed. Besides, you represent a nation, to whom we are united as much by the ties of friendship as by commercial connexions, and a sameness of principles.

We are also, sir, too much led by inclination to maintain the good harmony which subsists between the two people, not to observe, exactly, every thing that tends to a reciprocity of friendly proceedings. I request you to be convinced, in like manner, of the sincere attachment with which I have the honor to be,

Sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

M. LE BRUN.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs.

GOUV. MORRIS.

PARIS, 16th SEPTEMBER, 1792.

4th year of Liberty.

SIR,

I have, in the answer which you have given to the letter I had the honor to write to you on the 30th of August last, that you have not taken the true sense of certain expressions which it contained, relative to the existing circumstances. My object in speaking to you of the present Government was to prove to you that, in France, it never can be dissolved, nor lose any part of its gravity, as long as the nation shall exist. From this just andcontestable principle, I thought that you might reside at Paris, and there wait for new letters of credence, and new instructions from your constituents; in a word, to continue to treat, without interruption or delay, of the affairs which interest the two nations.

You ought to be persuaded, sir, that you had found us very ready to give you satisfaction on all the points which might have been made in justice and reason. And as, without doubt, you never had presented others, the result of your correspondence of you and me, might have been followed with the success you had desired.

As to the idea you appear to have, of quitting the present Government, it is not a fact, in support of the principle I have cited to you above. It is this. When the inhabitants of North America resolved to separate from England, and to obtain their liberty, they sent to France representatives to negotiate with the Government, which made no difficulty in entering into, speaking of, and even concluding with them a treaty of amity and commerce, as well as a treaty of alliance. Sarecly had the United Provinces appointed a Commission, when Dr. Franklin was acknowledged by us in his quality of minister plenipotentiary. He was admitted, with all the respects due to him, the audiences of the court, and of the minister. France sent and accredited, also, on her part, a minister to Congress.

Neverthelesse, sir, you know that, at that epoch, fixed measures had not yet been taken for the establishment of a Government in America, and it could not have any solid existence, while the war continued there for the cause of independence. All the powers of the government of that of your country, at that time, are, then, very different: of which you will be convinced by the following fact:

Before your Revolution, we had a Government which has always subsisted since. It is true, it has assumed another form; but liberty, the salvation of the country, has thus determined its creation. Besides, you, sir, who are born in the midst of the most politic and most famous people of the world, and who have a knowledge that of all the foreign ministers residing at Paris. We support the same cause as that of your country: then our principles and yours should be the same, and, by a series of natural consequences, no reason can be opposed to your residence at Paris.

I wish, sir, that this relation of facts, with which you are as well acquainted as I am, may engage you to reflect again on the matter, and determine you to change your resolution.

Whatever it may be, Sir, I have caused to be expedited the passport which you have requested; it is now with the municipality for the fulfilment of the formalities. I am authorized to bid you farewell.

You will see, Sir, by the enclosed extract of the reply of the minister of public communications, that you have almost an entire satisfaction on all the points contained in your letter of the 21st of August last. I have the honor to observe to you, that the little personal accidents which you have experienced relative to your effects, your wines, and so forth, are in the consequence, as you know, of the agitation inseparable from a great revolution.

I have the honor to be, with a sincere attachment, Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

The Minister for Foreign Affairs,

LE BRUN.

Mr. Morris.

Enclosure 6.

PARIS, 17th September, 1792.

Sir,

I have had the honor to receive your letters of the 8th and 16th. From the explanations contained in the latter, I shall pay no more attention to that of the 30th August, and, as it was that which had determined me to quit France, I have concluded to remain here, and to wait the orders of my court. As to my personal opinions, Sir, they are unimportant in an affair so serious, but you may be persuaded that I have never doubted the right which every people have of forming, to the best of their judgment, as they pleased, the system of society that was most consonant with the sentiments which France might enjoy full liberty, and all possible happiness; and I am sure of fulfilling the intentions of the United States, in assuring you that all my countrymen participate in them.

I have the honor to renew to you, Sir, my request for the interposition of the country. By proving my situation, it will secure me against the interruptions which might be experienced in the present moment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUV. MORRIS.

Monsieur LE BRUN.

Enclosure 7.

PARIS, 17th September, 1792.

Sir,

I have received your letters of the 9th and 16th. From the explanations contained in the latter, I shall pay no more attention to that of the 30th August, and, as it was that which had determined me to quit France, I have concluded to remain here, and to wait the orders of my court. As to my personal opinions, Sir, they are unimportant in an affair so serious, but you may be persuaded that I have never doubted the right which every people have of forming, to the best of their judgment, as they pleased, the system of society that was most consonant with the sentiments which France might enjoy full liberty, and all possible happiness; and I am sure of fulfilling the intentions of the United States, in assuring you that all my countrymen participate in them.

I have the honor to renew to you, Sir, my request for the interposition of the country. By proving my situation, it will secure me against the interruptions which might be experienced in the present moment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUV. MORRIS.

Mr. Roland, Minister of the Interior, spoke nearly in the following words: Charged, with the place which is confided to me, with a general superintendence of the police of the kingdom, I have thought it my duty to trace the cause of the disorders of Paris. This matter, gentlemen, merits all your attention, because it brings into question the support of liberty. It is reported in Paris, that, since the 4th of this month, four or five hundred persons have been arrested, and that the prisons are as full as they were before the 5th September. I have had these facts verified; they are true. But the prison book has not been found. I have demanded who the persons were who gave orders for these arrests; nothing being required that the orders should be presented to me, and I did it with authority; and I have seen and discovered that it was, at one time, the municipality, then the sections, then individuals, then the people, without designating what citizens, what part of the people. Some of these orders show the reasons; the greater part of them do not show any. I judge neither persons nor things, but I have conceived it a duty to bring these matters to the National Assembly; and I deposite them in the office.

No. 12.

PARIS, 16th September, 1792.

Mr. Morris.

Sir,

My last (No. 11) was of the 19th: I therein transmitted copies of my correspondence with the minister, respecting the subject of the conversation mentioned in mine of the 30th of last month, of which, as well as those of the 17th and 22d, copies are here enclosed. I think it proper to mention to you now, a circumstance relating to that conversation, because it may explain transactions concerning which I have been accused. It appears that private speculation was at the bottom of the proposals made to me, and the extreme urgency which was exhibited by one of the conferees, who had been designated to me as concerned therein, tended, not a little, to confirm the information I had received. The wrath excited by the unwillingness on my part to jump over all the hedges of my powers and instructions, did by no means lessen, but came in support of what I had foreseen. Since that period, I have been asked, by a person who said he was offered a bill drawn by the Government here on the treasury of the United States, whether such bill would be paid. I expressed my surprise therein, and was told that this bill would be for the sum decreed by the Assembly, to be employed in purchasing supplies for the colony of St. Domingo. I observed therein, that it seemed a strange procedure, either to sell or buy such a bill; because the vendor could only employ the money in America, and, of course, need not risk a draft, and the purchaser, who must make the expenditure thereof, could not, I supposed, find his account in the transaction. This led to an explanation. The bill was to be paid, they said, at par, six or nine months hence, and its proceeds have more than covered the purchasing manufactures, suitable to the colony, in this country. I told the person who applied to me, that I did not think this should be considered, in America, as falling within the decree, and that no good reason could be assigned for paying, under great disadvantages, in the colonies, what could, with advantage, be expended in the United States, but in France. At length, the true object of this application to me came out. I discovered that it was merely a scheme of speculation, to be carried into effect if I could be induced to recommend the payment, under what was known to be a favorite idea with me, viz: the expediting in America what we owe to France, and for the support of the colony of St. Domingo. As my concurrence could not be hoped for, I believe that the plan is abandoned, but perhaps it is only abandoned in appearance.

I also take the liberty to enclose the extract of a letter from Mr. Short, respecting Monseur de Lafayette, with my answer thereto. I understand that he was forwarded from Luxembourg, (possibly) on the route to Vienna, and had got as far as Brisgov several days ago. I presume that his treatment will depend very much on the success of the military operations. If the allied monarchs, finding themselves disappointed in their expectations from the present campaign, are obliged to look forward to more extensive and more permanent efforts, they will, probably, endeavor to gain one of the greatest parties of the grand army. To prevent their attempt, as far as possible, they will employ their ingenuity, or feititions, they will naturally consider Monseur de Lafayette as the most fitting instrument to be employed; and he will, as naturally, desire to aid in the establishment of the party and the principles which he considers as true support of his rights and his country. For you will observe, Sir, that several of our parties considered the Assembly in 1789 as an usurper, the leaders of that assembly affixed to the Jacobins the same charge of usurpation; and now, the leaders of the last revolution are charged by some of their brethren with feititionism. You will see, by the gazettes, that there is the same enmity between the present chiefs, which prevailed heretofore against those whom they considered as either of the present parties should get the better, they would, probably, remain divide; for party, like water, is divisible ad infinitum, because that which is divided is dissolved. If human opinion can never be tried by any common standard, it is not to be avoided that there should be differences among different men, but it is even uncommon to find, in the same man, the same sentiments for a continued length of time, though upon the same subject: for either the circumstances change or else themselves.

You will see that the King of Prussia has made some overtures for treaty, which were not listened to. I consider the offer as a mere military manoeuvre, because it is not possible that treaty should succeed in the present moment, and because preparations are making for more vigorous efforts the ensuing campaign. I am told that both Sweden and France will attack at the same point in the army of Great Britain, should that be come necessary. On this last subject much may be said. Of the King’s personal opinions there can be no doubt, and I have some little reason to believe, that not only his ministers, but the great mass of property and interest in that kingdom would readily embark in a contest to crush opinions which are considered as fatal to the peace and honour of the nation. Nevertheless in consequence it is right to suppose that the events which ought to be expected are not well founded. On the other hand, there is a party in England, not insconsiderable as to numbers, and very important from the activity of its members, who, joining to high notions of civil liberty some mixture of the��

The crop in Sicily was short, that of the southern provinces (always insufficient) is much less usual. The supplies usually drawn from the coast of Barbary (I am told) will be totally cut off by those Powers, who, in consequence of the affair of the 10th of August, mean to break with this country. The commerce of the whole of the Mediterranean north and east, if not possessed by the enemy, will be totally exhausted by the two armies; and Poland, whose grain I hear is shut up till next spring, will be engrossed by the enemy to furnish his own magazines. I consider it therefore as next to certain that the want here will be very great during the ensuing year; and as this must, by the end of December, become apparent to everybody, most other resources will then be shut by the hand of my master’s speculation. Hence it would seem that our merchants would act wisely in sending hither cargoes of flour, and I have but one apprehension in recommending it, which is, that (from the laxity of Government) property of that sort may become precarious. Since the power has got so high as to oppress the poor and yet it must rise, or else the merchant will suffer, because the exchange cuts off a great proportion of what he receives.

I submit, my dear sir, to your better judgment, all these ideas, persuaded that you will turn them to the best account, and I pray you to believe in that sincere regard with

I am, yours,

Extract of a letter from Mr. Short to Mr. Morris, enclosed in the preceding number.

THE HAGUE, September 7, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

I have now to communicate one to you of a very different nature and altogether I have not confided of itself of what can be done in it by us with any hope of success, yet I lose no time in informing you of it, as I have been engaged to do, in order to concert with you and Mr. Pinckney, conformably likewise to request, the measures to be pursued.

You are no doubt informed of the circumstances of M. de Lafayette’s arrestation and confinement. He and his companions have been hitherto delivered to the best body of his friends and those most acquainted with the dispositions of the Government there, and the best informed here) that they would be released immediately on an answer’s being received from Vienna. On the contrary, before that answer could have been received, orders were given for sending M. de Lafayette and the three members of the former assembly accompanying him, to Luxemburg, for detaining the others at Nivelles, and releasing such as had been imprisoned the day after M. de Lafayette, and who had also been brought to Nivelles. Under these circumstances, which would seem to indicate no intention in the Government to release those whom they now detain, manifestly in contravention to the principle existing of allowing the peaceable and unarmed citizen, to pass as travellers through the two countries, I have been pressed to concert with Mr. Pinckney, and that of Mr. Lafayette, in the name of the United States, as a citizen thereof. I am urged to this by some officers, his friends and former companions, who arrived here, and by a letter from himself, which is short, but pressing in the extreme.

Whatever should be done in this affair, however numerous reasons and whatever is possible in a case of this kind will no doubt be considered as proper. I therefore submit it to you, as I shall do to Mr. Pinckney, under the urging request above mentioned. I am persuaded you will both weigh the matter as it ought to be, and suggest some means of acting with propriety and efficacy if there be any. I shall be anxious to hear from you, and to prevent delay, imagine you will find it proper to communicate directly with Mr. Pinckney on the subject. I can add nothing to the considerations which will naturally occur to you on this distressing occasion, and which the companions of M. de Lafayette, who are here, represent as dangerous to him.

Trust, however, on their efforts are exerted by the interest they take in what concerns him, and cannot help flattering myself that the Austrian Government, from a regard to their own character, will not extend this violation of the most sacred principles of right and justice further than to a mere detention of those gentlemen, who fled from their country because they would not partake of the atrocities which the same Government have held up as the motive for their flight. But these violations which have been committed, and the persons now detained prisoners notoriously combatt, and are exiles for their having so done. In this exile and proscription they abandoned their arms, and asking only a peaceable passage through the country whose Government has treated with such severity and such wrong, it is a proper and protect them. I understand they are receiving this passage to which every right entitled them, were arrested, imprisoned, and are still detained. History and posterity, the supreme tribunals of sovereigns, will know no doubt avenge such a violation of the solemn promise made by the allied sovereigns, and by those who proclaimed it in their name. Being persuaded myself, however, of the en masse, as they have done the Emperor at his request, I shall not undertake to believe that the passage to neutral territory, which was asked by these gentlemen, after having quitted their arms, and passed the frontier, could have been refused them. Yet, if I should have mistaken the character of the Imperial Government, I join my request to that already made, that you will weigh well this matter, and communicate to Mr. Pinckney and myself your sentiments.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Extract of the answer of Mr. Morris to Mr. Short.

PARIS, September 12, 1792.

DEAR SIR: I proceed to the next object of your letter. The situation of M. de Lafayette I have long lamented, and since these last disasters I feel more than ever a desire to alleviate his distress. I had already meditated on the circumstances in which he might be placed, and his imprisonment was among those events which appeared not improbable. But when the news of the prisoners came abroad, and particularly M. de Lafayette, I offered in his behalf to intercede with the Emperor, in the person of a friend of mine, the Marquis de Moustier, a person of much influence in court circles; and the Marquis, after some hesitations, as I believed, on the Emperor's part, has given him leave to intercede. The Marquis has been with the Emperor, and I have reason to believe that M. de Lafayette, in the person of his father, is now in the Emperor's study, and it is probable that he will be released. We have no means of knowing, except the Emperor himself, what influence M. de Moustier is likely to have, or what in his relief he can expect from the fact of his being a prisoner of war; it is certain, howev-er, that the Emperor is of the opinion that the suffers of the war, as well as the Emperor himself, are squadled by the presence of these great men who have been abandoned; and it is probable that he will take the advantage of the present state of things to relieve them. In the meantime, I believe, the Emperor will not be bound to pay them for having attacked a neutral power, or else by the very act of acquitting him declare war against those who had taken him? Can the United States interfere in an affair of this sort without making themselves parties in the quarrel? But M. de Lafayette is a Frenchman, and it is as a Frenchman that he is taken and is to be treated. Again, supposing the right as clear as it is questionable, I presume that before the United States made such demand they would determine to go all lengths to establish their right, in case it should be refused; for otherwise, by advancing the claim and then receding, they would sit down quietly under an insult. Consequently they would consider well before they placed themselves in a situation to be disdained, or else drawn into a war. These are points of such magnitude that I do not feel myself competent to decide on them in behalf of my country, and therefore, if I were minister to his Imperial Majesty, I should (l think) confine myself to prayer and solicitation, until I received express orders from the President of the United States. But as I am not minister to the Emperor, and the President of the United States cannot be acquainted with the secret affairs of the French Empire, I cannot ask him to send them to me; and it is, I think, better for the President of the United States and myself to do nothing; but cases often arise in which to do nothing is taking a part. I need not state the many situations of that sort which I have. I had it in contemplation to leave Paris and visit Bordeaux and Marseilles; but I found it necessary to continue here for the sake of such of my countrymen as were in this city, and who might, in the madness of their condition, be led by their feelings to take part with the enemies of my country. I myself, as an Englishman, who remained after Lord Gower went away, found it so difficult to obtain passports, though possessed of such letters as I have said, many, after waiting for weeks in fruitless attendance, went off at all hazards without them.

I informed you, in my last, that I believed the plan for speculative on the sum appropriated to the use of Mr. Domingo was abandoned; but a further attempt was made by the minister, who pressed me again on the subject, and I, of course, again declined, referring him to Mr. Short, who, in fact, is alone empowered in that respect. What they may have since done I know not. The intercourse with Holland is much interrupted just now, and a letter which Mr. Pinckney forwarded for me, by Colonel Smith, from Mr. Short, and which was put into the post office at Dieppe, has not yet come to hand. I suppose that it relates to Monsieur de Lafayette, who is, I am told, at Wesel, and, of course, in the power of his Prussian Majesty. The gazettes will inform you of the case of the Prussian army. I have been told, on good authority, that the cannonade of the twentieth of September was only to amuse; that, during its continuance, the Duke of Brunswick made a masterly movement by which he opened to himself the roads to Rheims and to Chalons. That the French army has so much in its power that he might either have driven them away and dissected them with dis disadvantage, they would risk an action, that he would have cut them to pieces. And why didn't he? To this natural question two answers are given. It is said that the plan fixed for the campaign was, that the King of Prussia, at the head of his army, should form on a wedge, of which two columns of Austrian troops should form the wings, and the French troops in the center, to penetrate the Austrian lines on the Hohenlohe, to penetrate, after making Thionville and Metz, to Chalons. That, by this means, the magazines, sick, and wounded, of the three armies, would have been completely covered, and the police of the country been maintained. It was upon this plan that the Emperor formed his army; the French were to do nothing, at the same time, to make a powerful diversion, or to penetrate, as circumstances might permit or direct, from the Brisgaw. You will observe that all which depended on the Austrians, in the plan above supposed, did completely fail, and that, in consequence, if the King of Prussia had advanced any further, the French would have closed in upon his rear, and, of course, his sick, his wounded, and his magazines, would have been sacrificed; perhaps his retreat cut off. It is said that the three days consumed in treaty were to give time to the columns in question to advance, and, by their demonstrations, to drive off the corps which infested one of his flanks and menaced the other, and to show, in the meantime, that he had not advanced, by stipulating that the army which nature opposed to his march had disentangled himself from the Ardennes, and was complete in force, and in view of the two great plains of Champagne, the one leading by Rheims, and the other by Chalons, to his object. It is said that, without the aid of the columns in question, his further progress would have been useless because he could not detach to the right and left so as to cut off the communication between this city and the southern and western parts of the empire. To this, it is added, that a season, of which there is no parallel in the memory of man, and diseases, beyond all reasonable expectation, had almost crippled the Duke's army before he could extricate himself from the defiles, and drive off the parties which were in possession of them. This is one solution of the events which took place subsequent to the 20th. Another is of a different nature: it is said that Monseigneur Dumouriez, convinced that an opposition to the combined forces must prove unwarranting, and supposing that the rivalry of Austria and Prussia must fail in producing any decided effect by being only a dissipation of energy, would have the French army be the editor of the event; that the French government would pursue its own separate interests, when occasion should offer, without much regard to previous stipulations, and would, in fact, rather sacrifice somewhat even of its particular interest, than aggravize, in any degree, a rival, sure from ancient causes to be the Prince of Prussia; and thus prompt the King of Prussia to continue the war with the King of Prussia. That at length he succeeded so far as to show that Prince that the present was a favorable moment for giving a final blow to the House of Austria, and that France and Prussia would find immense advantage in an union by which he might take up again the business he had abandoned in Pirna and Upper Lorraine. Austria, which was almost starved every day by her expenses, and which, more certain, would be found in a subsidy of two hundred millions of livres, and that he must see the danger of the war in its present situation, and might thence the more easily estimate the advantage of abandoning it. These reasons are said to have had the desired effect, and that a kind of treaty was actually suspected, either a general article of war, or a definitive peace, but the thing is to be considered as unimportant. I have been told further, that the French Executive Council here will not confirm that part of the bargain which relates to the subsidy and the royal family, saying, which is true enough, that they are, in this respect, without authority.

But now we come to the movement upon the Rhine, where it is possible that it may be well founded. A lady, I think Madame de Guise, but certainly the daughter of Madame de Polignac, is said to have made an impression on his Majesty, who, it is seen, very susceptible of violent, though not of lasting, affection. This young lady is said to have been ill treated by her mother and others who are among the principal aids of the King; and, I have already communicated to you the state of things here in what regards subsistence. The country, late the seat of war, is totally consumed; never abundant, it is now so bare that the inhabitants will be reduced to the utmost straits; and although the northern frontier is not yet in the same state, it will be reduced to subsistence, at least to a state of the most partial subsistence. This army is now very numerous, and, from the want of discipline, consumes much more than is usually allotted to one of equal number. It is, furthermore, very sickly, and of course the followers will be greatly increased. If he can penetrate into Flanders and Brabant he not only saves the provinces, which would have been sacrificed to the exigencies of the revolution, but he has the opportunity of forming the most advantageous of combinations, which may be effected by a very small number of the people, while supported by a victorious army, he oblige the Emperor to confine his efforts to a single side of France, namely, that defended by the Ardennes in part, and in part by the Rhine. And on this side it will be difficult to name which of these combinations may continue in their present mind. These objects justify some risk by M. Dumouriez, and he is better able to calculate the extent of that risk than any mere spectator, because he has long had intelligence in that country. The undertaking is not, however, without considerable difficulty. There are not, indeed, any strong towns in his way, but there are three strong positions, of which the first is near Mons, the second, still stronger, on a hill, about six miles to the north, to the best of my recollection, between Mons and Brussels, and the third not far from Brussels itself. The military face of that country is, you know, understood by all military men with perfect exactness, having been the theater of war for a century and a half. The Emperor cannot cause the disciplined armies will be made use of by those who are to defend it. Add to this that we approach the end of October, and the weather is now just flattened with fine weather, it is not to be expected that those who go due north will meet with warm nights and long days in November. A failure, therefore, must be fatal to many, but this is little thought of here now, because they think they can replace them in the next year. Fortune, however, has so arranged that the French arms in a manner unexpected to themselves, and it may, perhaps, continue to do so. Much of this is, in my opinion, owing to the folly of their opponents, who seem to have fostered the determination to reduce them under a military despotism. The Divine justice will never, I hope, permit such impositions to succeed; and I always consider princes and generals and statesmen as mere instruments, and generally held instruments, in the hands of the Almighty, to work out his ends by ways which are, for the most part, inscrutable to us. I do not say anything about the incursions into Savoy and Germany, both brilliant, and the former of which bids fair to extend the French revolution, and the latter appears to have been more detailed and since discovered by the Convention.

As to the domestic affairs here they are by no means quiet. The great majority of the Convention is united, in opposition to a few members, who are joined to some chiefs in this city, and meditate further revolutions. They aver that those whom they call the Brissotines had no wish to overturn the monarchy, but only to get the levies and their resources, and perhaps, to give some credit to the 10th of August. They resolved, therefore, to be the champions of the people; but contrary to their wish; that having happened, they did, indeed, take advantage of it to obtain the executive power for their particular friends; but that, even then, they would not consolidate the revolution by destroying its enemy, and that on the 20th of September, they were defeated on the second of September and the following days, and which those, who now solely enjoy the fruits of it, pretend to blame. The Brissotines, on the other hand, contend that the true, the alone are the true friends of republican government, for which they have incessantly labored ever since the second Assembly met. That the attachment they professed to the late constitution was only simulated, and was necessary to prevent their attack up and have their infamous decrees, they convey kept in view the advantage to be gained by obliging the King either to sanction what, though agreeable to the popular wish, was contrary to the constitution, in which case the constitution would have become a dead letter, and have left the field of contest open between the King and the Legislature; or else, if the King withheld his sanction, it turned the voice of the people against him, and left it, in consequence, exposed to a successful resistance. It was now, therefore, present. That it was, in short, who brought forward the plan of an army of twenty thousand republicans under the walls of Paris, and who took private and effectual measures to bring that army into the field, if, as was anticipated, the Convention should be defeated. That it was at this time that Dufurt, the author of the massacre of Marsiellois, and other Federes, were on the spot to execute the plans of the tenth of August, &c. These are the outlines of the arguments made use of on either side to convince the public that each is exclusively the author of a republic which the people find themselves possessed of by a kind of magic, or, at least, a slight of hand, and which, nevertheless, they are as fond of as if it were their own offspring. To these main arguments are added a number of subordinate ones, with all the little accessories of time, place, and circumstance. The majority of the Convention, however, deficient of the people of this city, and apprehensive that they may take it in their heads to make another revolution, have judged it was of the greatest importance to have called (private) town meetings from the different departments. This now forms the bone of contention, on which will settle the arguments. I think it is a false stroke in politics, though, as a peaceable citizen of Paris, and interested in the preservation of that city, I am personally agreeable to me. On the ground of argument it is clearly a feature not republican, and contrary to the constitution of France: a distribution of things which was not sanctioned by the Constitution, and hence it follows again that either the interests of the capital and the provinces are different, or else that the measures in contemplation are contrary to the inclinations of both. But it is not, I think, on the ground of theoretic arguments that the opposition has any determination to make a guard of this sort. A guard of this sort evidently draws a strong bond of line of separation between the city and the Convention. It gives means for operating on the people to those who are opposed to the Convention. It is among the things to be calculated on that the guard, after it has been here some time, should catch the spirit of the city, be that what it may. In such cases, instead of protectors, they will find enemies in their guard, but admitting that this should not happen, if the guard be feeble, it will be overawed; if strong, those who can influence the guard, will command the Convention, who, in this case, will only have changed masters. If any little check should happen on the frontiers
Dear Sir:

I have received your favors of the 12th of July, and fifteenth of October; the last reached me yesterday, by express, from Belle-Isle. I am astonished to find that, so late as the 15th of October, you have not received one of my letters. I am convinced that every part of the case, except the single one involving absolute pecuniary rights, but there is no reason for the negligence of those one is obliged to employ in the ports. I shall transmit you, herewith, copies of Nos. 1, 2, and 3, although the time which has elapsed will have reduced them to the value of waste paper, excepting the last. I have written to M. Merlino, but have received no answer, and really now where to find him; I shall, however, keep a look out.

When I mentioned supplies to St. Domingo, I certainly meant that such supplies should be purchased by French agents in the United States, and that the money should be advanced by us in diminution of our debt, upon such terms as should be fixed in the treaty of amity and commerce. In the meantime, I could not, of course, agree to an advantage of expending such large sums in the purchase of objects, the growth, produce, and manufacture, of our country, and of its industrious inhabitants. As to specific supplies I had declared, in pointed terms, that the American Government would, by no means, enter into stipulations of any kind, with relation thereto. I am happy to find that on this occasion, my sentiments have so fully coincided with yours.

I give you also great relief to be informed that, until further orders, the payments are suspended. You will have seen, on that point, I have been hard run and I do assure you, if fear or interest would have induced me to act otherwise, you would have been receiving supplies of duty on a scale unexampled. There would have been no particular, and you may rely that I shall not communicate your present instruction respecting our debt, unless I shall be of opinion that it will become serviceable to the honor or interest of the United States.

With concern, I am, Sir,

it will be too unpopular to keep a considerable body of men for parade who might be useful in camp; and, as soon as they go, the people rise at once to resent the insult offered to them. It seems probable, therefore, that this guard will be among the reasons why the convention may leave this city, and that would give a very serious shock, in many ways. It is to be noted also, that, when they take up the report on a form of government, the opposition will have the opportunity to point out those defects, lest those may not. To these leading points I might add a thousand little things, but you would be tired of such particularities.

With respect to the present temper of the people of this country, I am clearly of opinion that the great decided effective majority is now for the republic. What may be the temper and opinion, six months hence, no prudent agent can foretell. Much will depend on the result of the elections which are to be presented by the Convention. If vigorous, it is very problematical whether the departments will adopt it, compel it by a sense of impending exterior danger. If feeble, it is, humanly speaking, impossible that it can control the effect of the people in the present instance. This will be sufficiently by the fate of the late constitution. Whether they will be able to strike out that happy mean which secures all the liberty which circumstances will admit of, combined with all the energy which the same circumstances require; whether they can establish an authority which does not exist, as a substitute (and always a dangerous substitute) for that respect which cannot be restored after so much is lost; whether, in the event of this, they will be able to resist the tottering and uncertain base of metaphysic philosophy, to establish a solid edifice of morals; these are questions which must solve.

I am, ever truly, yours, and the French party, or that those were desirous of levelling the nobles, and above all the church, which possesses, as you know, the greatest part of the Flemish territory. On the return of imperial authority, after the revolt under Vandemoort and Van Eupen, the second party above mentioned naturally enough fell in with the Government, as they had already experienced no little tyranny from the priests and monks, and were less likely to dread the prevalence of French ideas. But these persons, who having long enjoyed their charter, and probably were some of the adherents of the Emperor, would not be likely to yield to the wishes of his friends, who were still open. They hoped that the war (whose avowed object on the part of France was to drive out the house of Austria) would induce the Emperor to cede the points in controversy. The cabinet of Vienna (on the other hand) believed that the French, if once engaged, rather than withdrawing would press on four fronts; for his affairs had materially changed, it was too late to retract, since the concession of weakness neither connotes affection, nor commands respect. The agents of the different parties, who had preserved a connexion more or less direct with Dumouzin, were urgent with him to go into Flanders, as soon as the Russian army began to retreat, and he advanced. His private desire was soon understood at Flanders, and there was nothing to be done at home, where the Emperor believed that all things topsy-turvy, and who, being happily secure against the possibility of loss, because they have nothing to lose, are always the ready instruments of mischief to those who can bring themselves to use them for destructive purposes. He, therefore, published a proclamation, which may in few words be translated into an order to be free, according to his ideas of justice. As in wars of conquest, by advancing with three armies, the least of which was equal to all the force which the enemy could muster, and the centre (which he commanded) was double to what was spread over the different parts of that level country. At the affair of Jemappes, he commanded eighty-six thousand men, and in the summer, eighty thousand men; he therefore hoped for success.

In the mean time, the Emperor, who had already committed himself to the French, and had exhibited the least respect, had been flattered by the Emperor, and expected a less energetic and less generous reception than he had given to the Austrians, but this was as much a subject which I must treat separately, and, therefore, merely mention it in this place. The other circumstance was, that the ministers and agents they had employed in London, assured them that, although the declaration respecting the Schelond had occasioned much alarm, and irritated at the same time the British cabinet, yet they might rest assured that all was well. The Dutch, in fact, did not return from their auxiliary campaign, but only the French, and were partly employed in the Low Countries, and partly on the frontier of Germany; the Emperor was determined to abandon his design upon the Netherlands, and turn his arms to another quarter.

This he refused to obey; but, being reiterated, and things here being a little different from what he hoped, he has within these few days submitted; and I shall come to this part of the history presently, and here I will conclude as to Holland, by adding that the Emperor has not yet been able to gather the troops, it is not hard to conceive that the Emperor would have told that the time is not favorable; that they will certainly march that way by and by; but at that, present, they have not sufficient force nor supplies. You will observe that Mr. Le Brun declares to the Assembly, that they are guiltless of the attack, and have not been unjustly treated, so that the Emperor believes that the British ministry are exactly informed of the contrary; but, be that as it may, they rely on what I relate to you. In respect to the Flemish, before I leave them, I must tell you that their ancient hatred to the French is all revived, and (is possible) more violent than ever. Several reasons for this appear from what I have already said; but there is one cause affecting equally all the neighbors of France, and which it may be well in this place to mention. It would seem, at first sight, somewhat strange, that the people in the world the most amiable at home, should be the most disagreeable abroad; but this is strictly true. The morals, or rather the want of morals, in this country, places every one at a loss. The French are virtuous if he pleases, but there are not many either to be, or to appear so consequently, both good men and bad men enjoy the society of Paris. But when the French go abroad, they desire to introduce among other people the same free and easy principles, which do by no means suit the taste of those who consider a chaste and orderly deportment essential to the peace and happiness of civil society. I have already said, that the French people are the most open and most free of all nations; the most free and open of all nations, and the most free and open of all nations, this is a foreigner, and this is a man, and this is a style of conversation which runs on the insulting comparison between their own usages and those of the people with whom they live. In this, they naturally, and I believe justly, give a preference to their own, but this preference becomes irkson to others, especially, in the expression of it, that there should be mingled some little contempt, and some contemptuousness; and those customs of which they have infested, and had accumulated on their own heads the antipathies which had been previously extended to all their country. Nay, from this hatred to them sprang up a kind of left-handed love for the Jacobins, it being natural to like those who war on the persons whom we dislike. But no sooner do the French armies enter into a country, than the scene changes. The emigrants do not indeed find favor, but the original sentiments of the people return in regard to the French nation. These sentiments are universally unfavorable, as I observed (with sorrow and surprise) in a journey I made two years ago through Flanders, and a part of Germany, viz. that which is the seat of the war. The French, however, whether engaged in frontier warfare, or in foraging, were worse treated than in the low countries. Mayence was surrendered rather to the assigns than to the arms of France, it is believed. Frankfurt naturally fell as being a neutral city. Contributions were raised in both, and you will see, with astonishment, that in the Low Countries, and particularly in Brabant, the memory of the French never was so strongly impressed when their city was retaken by the Prussian and Hessian forces. This re-capture was attended with strong circumstances to show that hatred of the French which I have above mentioned. Custine's advance into Germany was certainly hazarded beyond the rules of prudence, and it will be well if he escapes with no further loss than what he has already suffered. The situation is certainly critical, since the council have their eyes proper order on Dumouzin to his relief. And here, by the way, it may be well to remind you, that the distance from Valenciennes to Ligny is about one half the distance from Ligny to Mayence, and that the former is a level open country, the latter a country of defiles, at least for a considerable part of the distance. Add to this the season which is already severe in that quarter, and must, in all probability, become more so, or any day, and you will easily see why Dumouriez, in agreeing (at last) to obey his orders, has declared that he will by no means be responsible for the success. You will recollect, also, the diminution of the French armies, which it is proper now to state more particularly.

Dumouriez spread through France, after the affair of the tenth of August; the call to defend their country—a call which must ever be efficacious as long as men are endued with the feelings of men; the belligerent spirit of the nation, and the strenuous exertions of those against whom the Duke of Brunswick had denounced an inexpiable war; had called into the field six hundred thousand men. In the present quarter of France, the army is composed of two divisions, and the Duke of Brunswick, by bringing down, with an irresistible impetuosity, every obstacle. Her enemies, who had never brought against her, in the whole, above one hundred and fifty thousand, and who were much reduced by sickness and fatigue, found themselves obliged to retire, and had no resource but to impede a progress which they could not prevent, and which orders of Government, and orders of military councils, were not of such a kind and of such hard, and feeling (in spite of delusive appearances) that a paper system of finance must at length sink under the enormous weight of their expenses, thought it wise to push to the utmost their successes, and were little solicitous about a loss of men which they could supply more easily than the French. It is, to the physical powers of the French, a moral and a political question if they can stand it. Excessive fatigue, want of necessaries, and the most severe and irremediable modulations, had carried many to the grave. Not a few have fallen in action. At the present moment there are, in the different military hospitals, seventy-five thousand sick beds, and at Liege the hospital stores are so greatly deficient that the sick soldiers lie on the straw.

The extent of country which they occupy, and the projected changes in government, will have a correspondence to the wish of the majority of the people, render it necessary to keep up garrisons by force, which they are placed on the communications. A great proportion of the volunteers, who had turned out at first to defend their country, who had at others been worn out by a national spirit of resistance to the neighboring States, and who, from the same spirit and temper, pursued as long as their limbs would support them, sinking at last under fatigue, have stopped, and from that moment it is in their nature to return—such of them, at least, as are able; of consequence, the troops in camp, by them, if the leaders who have hitherto united the armies of France have frequently been strenuous, but it is not of such a kind as to be, as it must be, and in this respect, and on this subject, is surely not to be wondered at. Lorrain is so completely eaten up (as I am credibly informed) above one hundred thousand of its inhabitants had left it, before the present month, from the want of food. Thus, the army has lost several thousand men by the departure of its sick, and it is in great part, to Coblenz, and that, having been the theatre of war (almost) since the beginning of August, it will be impossible to find any thing in it and that, confined by the Ardennes on one side, and the Rhine on the other, nothing can be brought to it but a land transportation of at least fifty leagues. I fear that, even had Dumouriez quarreled his troops, he would not be able to do what is desired, and that the decision must be made, not by the armies, but specially for his cavalry.

What must it be when he gets to the neighborhood of Bonn! Beurnonville, you will see, is, pushing with an army of thirty thousand men towards Coblenz, by the way of Treves—a rugged country of lastness, defended by intrenched positions and Austrian troops are opposed to him. Consequently, his less slow and strong men, and by his convoys will be exposed to parties from the garrison of Luxembourg. Thus you see, for the King is warning, at present, against nature herself, as it were, and sanguine men hope for success. If it be obtained the enemy will open the next campaign under manifest disadvantages. But we must not yet enter into the question.

You will have seen that the jacobin club is as much at war with the present Government as it was with the preceding. Victory or death is the word with both parties. Hitherto the majority of the Convention has had rather the advantage, although they frequently decree what they do not wish. The ministers, possessing vastly more patronage than the club, are, therefore, in a situation to influence the people. They have the influence of the great men, and the jacobins, though backed by the Parisian populace, have been several times within an inch of ruin. Luckily for them, their adversaries are many of them timid, while the jacobin leaders are daring and determined. It is not conceivable that the present French army, with Dumouriez or with Carnot at the head, can be defeated. What will be the sequel? It was then understood that, if Dumouriez threw up his commission in disgust, his army would presently retreat back to Valetinieres; and this, it was supposed, would justify a coup de main in this city, and extend the influence of it through all France. Ever since this embassy of Bonne Carre, France have been ripening fast on both sides. At present, there is a Ultras in the ministry, and Parke, the minister of war, throws his weight into the scale of opposition. Dumouriez has (I am told) acceded, notwithstanding the adulations and concessions of the other party, and the coalition now nearly balance their opponents. A late circumstance brought forward a show of forces, and though it is rather anything against the enthusiasm of the subject, I must state it here. Dumouriez, at the head of a large body of troops (without reason) that this might be a signal for their own destruction, determined on a measure not a little hazardous, but decisive. This was the expulsion of the Bourbons—a blow principally levelled at the Duke of Orleans. The motions of the Convention have been so ordered that the Gallier has been struck down and that the claim of the Orleans has been remitted. The suspension was pronounced under the influence of the tribunes evidently. Many members have talked of leaving Paris; but the same fear which controls them while in this city will prevent them from quitting it. At least such is my opinion.

The thing is indeed serious, and the circumstances connected therewith. To a person less intimately acquainted than you are with the history of human affairs it would seem strange that the mildest monarch who ever filled the French throne; one who is precipitated from it precisely because he would not adopt the harsh measures of his predecessors a man whom none can charge with having ever shown to his country and to the nation hatreds tyrants that ever disgraced the character of human nature. That he, Louis the Sixteenth, should be prosecuted even to the death. Yet such is the fact. I think it highly probable that he may suffer, and that for the following causes: The majority of the Assembly found it necessary to raise, against this unhappy prince, the national enthusiasm, in order to justify the dethearing him, (which also, when viewed from the eye to their safety) and to induce the ready adoption of a republican form of Government. Being in possession of his papers, and those of his servants, it was, if they would permit themselves to extract, to comment, to suppress, and to mutilate it was very easy to create such opinions as they might think proper. The rage which has been excited by the Convention against this man has been so violent that the public could not keep it down, and it would result in the acquisition of a fearful influence. The violence of the party are clamorous against him for reasons which I will presently state. The monarchist and aristocratic parties wish his death, in the belief that such catastrophe would shock the national feelings, awaken their hereditary attentions, and turn into the air and into the blood of the nation the loyalty the impetuous tide of opinion. Thus he has become the common object of hatred to all parties, because he has never been the decided patron of any one. If he is saved it will be by the justice of his cause, which will have some little effect, and by the pity which is universally felt (though none dare express it openly) for him. I have no doubt that the Convention will support the Duke of Orleans, and will prevent the condemnation of Louis. I believe that I am justified in this opinion. I have, I think, a plan of revenge against the Convention, which has been carried out, and which has been created by that plan. In general, I doubt the public spirit of a people, when it is joined with the public spirit of a class. The French are, of course, put by such persons. If we consider the particular circumstances which lead me to believe that he has, from the beginning, played a deep and doubtful game; but, I believe also that, on the present occasion, as on some preceding, he is the dupe. Shortly after the tenth of August I had information on which you may rely, that the plan of the Duke of Orleans was to recover the King of France, and in order to do it, had assembled and persuaded some of his friends, during the minority of the Dauphin. This idea has never, I believe, been wholly abandoned. The Cordeliers (or proxy council, which directs the jacobin movements) know well the importance of intervening the order of succession. They are very well to employ the Duke of Orleans, and I am much mistaken if they will consent to elevate him to the throne. So that, for his share of the guilt, he may probably be rewarded with the shame of it, and mortifying reflection, that, after all the conflicts of his political warfare, he has gained no victory but over his own

Paris, January 1, 1793.

Dear Sir:

I transmit, herewith, a duplicate of what I had the honor to write on the twenty-first of last month. Since that period this Government, perceiving that they had been wholly deceived, respecting the British nation, have made advances towards conciliation; at least so I am informed; and also that these advances are by a declaration that, however general the terms of their decree, they had no idea of exciting revolt, except in the dominions of the Powers leagued against them. That, as these Powers had entered into France, with a design to change the established government, they are justified in turning against them the weapons of revolt, which they had intended to use. If this should ever become an object of diplomatic controversy, it will, perhaps, be objected that, until the assertion of a general decay, be confirmed by other decisive proofs, the words must be taken in their plain and natural import. Should such new decree be passed, which, by the by, would take from France a very powerful engine, the case of Savoy will be quoted where, whatever may have been the supposed intentions, no facts existed to support them is yet produced, but by some other declaratory, it seems to me, that the authority of the British nation, and the projected invasion of Holland. I shall not either make any remarks on the unanimity in the British Parlia-

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Havre, December 25, 1792.

SIR: A vessel arrived here, from New Orleans, under the name of the Espérance, under a Spanish flag, and under the command of Captain M‘Faden, a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of Philadelphia, who calls himself owner of the vessel. Can he now take the American flag? His voyage from the Mississippi finished here. The captain, who has no further employ in the Spanish possession, wishes again to take his natural flag, and to go to New York. I think that he has nothing to fear from the agents of the Spanish Government, because he has satisfied all the charges to which that flag subjected him. He is provided with a regular American registry, by which he and Captain M‘Faden are supposed to be the proprietors of the vessel, which is called therein l’Espérance. This letter is dated at Philadelphia, January 2, 1792, and signed Alexander Hamilton, John Graff, and Fred. Phil. I am so well convinced of the authenticity of this title, that I should of myself permit the captain to hoist the American colors, were you not at so short a distance; which enables me to have your approbation on the subject. The captain has, on board of his vessel, the name of Euphrasie painted on canvas; which he assures me he was permitted in America to nail upon the stern of his vessel, when circumstances required. All this excludes the idea of any fraud. The reason why I am so particular in this matter, is, that I conceive the Americans will be very watchful and careful of their flag at the present moment; in which it would be convenient to more than one nation to borrow it, if it were possible. I therefore look for your answer, sir, in order to permit Captain M‘Faden to hoist American colors, under the name of Euphrasies and I request your orders on the subject without delay, to the end that the captain may make himself known publicly as an American, to take in a cargo for New York.

De La MOTTIE.

Paris, December 27, 1792.

SIR: I have received yours of the twenty-fifth instant. From what you say, it appears evidently that there has been a fraud in the voyage of Captain Faden, since he arrives as a Spaniard, and sailed as an American, which last character he means now again to put on. I do not at the same time see what you can do to prevent him, were you so minded. If there be a breach of the navigation law, it must be answered in America, and therefore, I should suppose it best to send by some other opportunity an account of the transaction to the Secretary of State. In the mean time, it seems to me proper to let him hoist the American colors, because the preventing him may do a serious injury to one who cannot, before trial and conviction, be presumed guilty of an infraction of the laws.

GOVERNEUR MORRIS.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Short, who is so kind as to take charge of my letters as far as Bordeaux, will go, he says, this day. I therefore take the latest opportunity to write, and to inform you that the appearances have not at all changed since mine of the first. Dumouriez has been some days in Paris. He stays at home under pretense of illness, but in fact to receive and consider the propositions of the different parties. It would seem that he is not reconciled to Pache, the Minister of War. Pache is very strong in Paris, and that circumstance renders him formidable both to his colleagues and to the Revolution. I am told that the majority of the latter body expect soon to be supported by a considerable number of volunteers from the departments. I am also told that it cannot be long before the bursting of the storm which has been so long brewing. This last intelligence is from one of those, who, though a promoter of the last revolution, is now marked as one of the victims. He says he will die hard, but laments the feebleness of temper which he experiences among those who, like him, are doomed to destruction. On the other hand, a person of cool discerning temper and understanding, who is in the confidence of those who direct the Jacobins, told me, when I last saw him, that they are determined to rule or perish.

You will easily suppose that this provision of honors is far from pleasant. I have, I assure you, been not a little tempted to spend a few days with some of my friends in the country, during the festive season, which would render such an excursion natural; but the critical state of things with Great Britain might take a turn which it would be important for you to know, and therefore it is right that I stay here.

I am, sir, with esteem and respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq.

Paris, January 17, 1793.

DEAR SIR: I have already had the honor to inform you that the statue of General Washington, by Houdon, is finished, and which I have been applied to by the statutory, in regard to the last payment for that object. He tells me that he hopes the State of Virginia will do as other foreigners, pay him the difference of exchange, a thing the more easy to them, as in fact it can only cost them the sum stipulated—the sum which they would have paid two years ago, and which eight years ago would have been specially secured against depreciation, could the emission of assignats have been then foreseen. I have said to him, that I am by no means competent to decide on the subject, but would forward to the State his application. I hope you will pardon me, sir, for troubling you with it; but as you agreed with Mr. Houdon in the first instance, it is (as well for that as for other reasons) most proper that I should address myself to you.

I am, with esteem and respect, dear sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq.

Paris, January 25, 1793.

DEAR SIR: My last (No. 17) was of the 17th instant. The late King of this country has been publicly executed. He died in a manner becoming his dignity. Mounting the scaffold, he expressed anew his forgiveness of those who persecuted him, and a prayer that his deluded people might be benefited by his death. On the scaffold he attempted to speak, but the commanding officer, Santerre, ordered the drums to be beat. The King made two unavailing efforts, but with the same bad success. The eyes of all were down, and were in such haste as to let fall the axe before his neck was properly placed, so that he was mangled. It would be needless to give you an affecting narrative of particulars; I proceed to what is more important, having but a few minutes to write by the present good opportunity.

The greatest care was taken to prevent an affluence of people. This proves a conviction, that the majority was not favorable to that severe measure. In effect, the arraignment of the Parisians caused the fate of their unhappy Prince. I have seen grief, such as for the unimonly death of a beloved parent. Every thing wears an appearance of solemnity, which is awfully distressing. I have been told by a gentleman from the spot, that putting the King to death would be a signal for disbanding the army in Flanders. I do not believe this, but incline to think it will have some effect on that army, already perishing by want, and moulder ing fast away. The people of that country, if the French army retreats, will, I am persuaded, take a severe vengeance for the injuries they have felt and the insults they have been exposed to. Both are great. The war against France is become popular in Austria, and is becoming so in Germany. If my judgment be good, the testament of Louis the Sixteenth will be more powerful against the present rulers of this country than an army of a hundred thousand men. You will learn the effect it has in England. I believe that the English will be wound up to a pitch of enthusiastic horror against France, which their cool and sedate temper seems to be scarcely susceptible of.

I enclose you the translation of a letter from Sweden, which I have received from Denmark. You will see there by what the Jacobin principles are propagated with zeal in every quarter. Whether the Regent of Sweden intends to make himself King is a most point. All the warm foreign nations the effect which I had imagined. The war with England exists, and it is now proper, perhaps, to consider its consequences, to which effect we must examine the objects likely to be pursued by England: for, in this country, notwithstanding the gascouettes, a defensive war is prescribed by necessity; for I may suppose that the French colonies are to be lost, and that the inhabitants have been directed to attend to signal guns, fired on offering occasions, and, on the seventh being fired, to lock their gates and shops. These steps trouble equally as much as the declaration of his Royal Highness astounds.

If all this be the consequences of a letter you, perhaps, are acquainted of, wrote by a Dean Widen, or a discovery made by Government, is yet a mystery. The general suspicion falls on a number of club of followers of Gustavus III. who, it is reported, are supported from abroad, and their leader, the unruly brewer, Mr. Westernman. Everything is quiet yet, and it is to be hoped that the above steps may be sufficient to continue this fortunate situation longer.

PARIS, February 13, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

My last (No. 18) was of the 25th of January; since it was written, I have had every reason to believe that the execution of Louis XVI. has produced on foreign nations the effect which I had imagined. The war with England exists, and it is now proper, perhaps, to consider its consequences, to which effect we must examine the objects likely to be pursued by England: for, in this country, notwithstanding the gascouettes, a defensive war is prescribed by necessity; for I may suppose that the French colonies are to be lost, and that the inhabitants have been directed to attend to signal guns, fired on offering occasions, and, on the seventh being fired, to lock their gates and shops. These steps trouble equally as much as the declaration of his Royal Highness astounds.

The general suspicion falls on a number of club of followers of Gustavus III. who, it is reported, are supported from abroad, and their leader, the unruly brewer, Mr. Westernman. war of empire, and, if she defends herself, she commands the world. I am persuaded that her enemies consider the British fleet as a target, and that, if they are to be protected, they will be compassed in two ways—either by obliging her to assume a new burthen of debt, to defray the expense they are at on her account, or else by a dismemberment. The latter appears the more certain mode. In this case it will, I presume, be attempted to make the Sone her northern boundary, as far as the Ardennes, and then along the Ar- dennes, the Moselle, and the Rhine to the Vosges, where the French, under the command of General Amanteau, Artois, and a part of Picardy, in the circle of Austrian Flanders, which may be erected into an independent State, and the country lying east of the Vosges and Mount Jura may be a compensation to the Elector Palatine for the cession of the Electorate of Bavaria to France. As things are now, I am not prepared, if the enemy knows how to make use of them. Alise is attached to the German empire, and to the cause of religion. The only thing which pleases them in the revolution is the abolition of the tithes, and they are as much disgusted by the banishment of their priests. I speak here of the Roman Catholics only. The seceding clergy would not care about the matter; but many of them are discontented at the revolution, and religion is with them the first care, but as yet they have not had a fair opportunity to show themselves, because they are awed by the numerous garrisons spread through their country. I think, as I mentioned in my last, that there exists a treaty respecting Flanders, between England and Austria, but I cannot find out the exact purport. Prussia is, I think, the most independent of the five Powers.

As to the conduct of the war, I believe it to be, on the part of the enemy, as follows: First, the maritime Powers will try to cut off all supplies of provisions, and take France by famine, that is to say, excite revolts among the people. General Genet, who is now in the midst of this affair, might engage, at the same time, in the Mediterranean, and might perhaps be the language of Prussia. I think I can perceive some seeds already sown to produce that fruit. It is not improbable that our vessels bringing provisions to France may be captured and taken into England, the cargoes paid for by the Government. Secondly, Britain may, perhaps, land a body of troops in Normandy, with intention to penetrate to Rouen, and cause the roya- lists to be erected by the French immigants. If a large body of the people flock to it, they might open the breach towards the capital, if not, they may move to the left, along the coast, to Abbeville, and thence form a junction with the army acting in Flanders; for this descent, if it take place, is but a secondary operation; the main stress will be in Flanders, for there the troops of Britain, Holland, Hanover, Austria, and Prussia, can be fed from the Rhine at a very low rate. If it be too late for France to engage the enemy, and she oppose them, because the provisions must, in such a case, be carried to an extreme corner of the country. Thirdly, an attack of great energy will be made on the side of Mayence, in the view to destroy totally the army under Custi- niere, in the arrondissement into Lower Alsace, and the rear of the army of the Rhine, in the arrondissement of Upper Alsace, for which purpose, nothing will be left undone to bring the Swiss into action, as thereby the fire of war will extend all along from the German Ocean to the Mediterranean Sea. Fourthly, the efforts on the side of Savoy will probably be confined to the recovery of that country, and such diversion as may occupy a part of the Prussians in that quarter. I believe the Slovay would not be engaged in the war, or alarm, of such may increase the want of bread, by multiplying the consumers: for I do not believe in a serious attempt on either Toulon or Marseilles. Under this chapter, as an incidental consideration, are the in- tense hatred and prejudice that I think a British squadron in the Mediterranean will do more or less harm to the French, and perhaps towards this than a dozen ambassadors. Lastly, on the side of Spain, there will be, I believe, nothing more than a revolu- tion at court, which should disturb the Queen and her paramour, might give some energy to the administration, which, at present, is extremely feeble.

Having thus run through the probabilities on the side of the adversary, I come now to what appear to be the views of France. You will have seen that the effective army for 1793 is fixed at something more than five hundred thousand men. These will be able to get together. The recruiting service goes on well, and although many of the last year's conscripts, and perhaps many of the present, may not to be mustered, yet the provisions to the army, the moneys army, barring accidents, will be completed. The main object, at present, is to overrun Holland—a thing which might have been effected six weeks ago, but, at present, I believe it is not to be done. If the Prussian and Hano- verian forces be made the object, I think it is now too late; but, if the attention be directed to the left, I think suddenly as Mayence, and perhaps by similar means. If this should happen it would greatly impede the operations, and, of course they will exert themselves to prevent that mischief. Never were the moments more precious than those to be parties in that quarter; for there the first blow will be more than half the battle. Should the enemy be unable to prevent the French from beginning to get a start there, and there is nothing to stop him till he comes to the Rhine, and, at every step, he would gather new force; besides, he need not embarrass himself with convoys, because he would soon receive abundance from the side of the sea. As to the colonies, I believe that France will not attempt to defend them, and their whole commerce falls naturally into the lap of America, unless the British prevent it, and I think they will find more convenient to neglect that small object, to pursue the great ones which open themselves to view in this quarter.

What I have just said leads me very naturally to your letter of the 7th of November. You had previously in- structed the Ministry to show a regard for the peace of Europe. You had expressed your wishes that the cession of August had not taken place, but, instead thereof, the useful power and confidence had been restored to the crown, I should, perhaps, have obtained what you wished, as a mark of favor and confidence. Temporum instaurat, et nos restituitur in illis. A change of circumstances rendered it necessary to change entirely my conduct, so as to produce in one way what was impracticable in another.

As I saw clearly, or at least thought I saw, that France and England would at length get by the ears, it seemed best to let them alone until they should be nearly pitted. When I found this to be the case, I asked an interview with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and mentioned to him my wish that an exception should be made in the decree against emigrants in favor of those who were in the United States. I told him truly, that I wished the alliance between the two nations to be strictly preserved. I told him, with great frankness, that, notwithstanding appearances, and the flattering accounts transmitted by some of his agents, Britain was, in my opinion, hostile, and an active enemy. I expressed a doubt, if it were the true wish of the government of Britain, that, on the principle of such a case, there could be no doubt but Mr. Hammond would erect himself to incalculate the opinion that our treaty having been made with the King was void by the Revolution. He said that such an opinion was absurd. I told him (precising, in this place, that the whole conversation was official and unauthorized on my part, from sincere principles) that I knew many, and it seemed to me that the whole conversation was conducted with that spirit of cordiality and good will which would be well to evince a degree of good will to America, which might prevent disagreeable impressions, and had therefore taken the liberty to suggest the exception in favor of emigrants, &c. Here I left it, and changed the conversation. Now, I knew well that some of the leaders here who are in the diplomatic committee, hate me cordially, though it would puzzle them to say why; and I was determined rather to turn that disposition to account than to change it, because I see some advantages to result from it. Thus I contributed, indirectly, to the slight put on me by sending out M. Genet without mentioning to me a syllable either of his mission or his errand, both of which, nevertheless, are matters of the greatest importance. I had taken a good deal of trouble to ascertain the meaning of England, and my continuance at Paris, notwithstanding the many reasons which might have induced me to leave it, would also, I thought, excite in some degree their jealousy, and I have good reason to believe that this effect was produced. I felt then the merit of doing with the enemy both carefully calculated, and in the manner of the thing you wished for is done, and you can treat in America if you please. Whether you will or not is another affair. Perhaps you will see that all the advantages desired do already exist; that the acts of the Constitutional Assembly have, in some measure, set us free from our engagements, and that, increasing daily in power, we may make quite a good bargain some time hereafter. It remains to add a few words in reply to what regards me, personally, in your letter. I am very happy, indeed, to find that my conduct, as far as it was known, is approved. This is the summit of my wish: for I cautiously acknowledge that the good opinion of the world would be beyond all earthly possessions. I have from the first so distinctly marked my intentions, and very principally, and very distinctly marked my intentions, and very principally, may well imagine; indeed, it is extremely painful. I have already given my reasons for staying here; but now the scene is changed, and I had thoughts of making a tour to the different consulates. There are, however, some pretty solid objections to that plan, for the present. The next thing which suggested itself was, to hire a country house for the summer season, in the neighborhood. At length, that my leaving the city might give no offence to any body, I have bought a country house in an out of the way place, where it is not likely that any armies will pass or repass, even should the enemy penetrate. If I lose the money paid for it I will put up with the loss. The act, in itself, shows a disposition friendly to France; and as it is between twenty and thirty miles from Paris, I shall be able to go thence, and turn up and down the country, unless driven out of it by war or famine. In this way I hope to avoid those accidents which are almost inseparable from the present state of society and government, and which, should they light on the head of a public minister, might involve consequences of a disagreeable nature. It is more proper also, I conceive, to make arrangements of this kind in a moment of tranquillity, for when confusion is awakened into mischief. In all this my judgment may err, but I can truly say that the interest of the United States is my sole object. Time alone can tell whether the conduct be as right as I know the intention to be.

SIR: I must first pray your indulgence for referring to the enclosed copy of what I wrote on the twenty-seventh of last month, to the bankers of the United States in Amsterdam. I make no comment thereon, only as I had not given the order in question, I consider it as of course, that I must replace the money which may be advanced on it. This is one of the cases in which not to act is taking a part, and in which it is vain to balance.

I am, with sincere respect, dear sir, your obedient servant,

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

FRANCE.

GENTLEMEN: I learn from the friends of Monsieur de Lafayette, (who is now prisoner at Magdeburg) that, although kept in close confinement, no provision is made for his comfortable subsistence. I own that I do not believe this assertion; but, should it be true, I think no moment is to be lost in administering relief. You will, therefore, be pleased to relieve him, by sending him such necessaries as may be required for him. You can extend your credit to the sum of ten thousand florins, which you will please to charge as paid by my order, in your accounts with the United States. Observe also, that it is not in my contemplation to furnish the means for his escape, for that sort, direct, nor indirectly, because it is not becoming the dignity of the United States to act in an underhand manner; but they would hear him appeal to what has been eminently useful to them should be in want of those necessaries which it is in their power to bestow.

MORRIS, W. & J. WILKINS, N. & J. VAN STAPHORST & HUBBARD.

No. 30.

DEAR SIR: I send, enclosed herewith, a letter which I have received from Monsieur Duchesne, with the copy of my answer. I know not whether my use can be made of such offers, but think it right to forward them, in order that Government may decide thereon.

I am, with esteem and respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

[Enclosures referred to in the foregoing.]

PARIS, 12th February, 1793.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

BLOIS, 6th February, 1793.

SIR: During the time Canada and Louisiana belonged to France, persons of the religious order had dispersed themselves among the different savage nations of those immense countries, for the purpose of carrying there instruction, and taking care of their souls. The Jesuits, from that source, having diminished the perpetual wars between tribe and tribe, and extinguished those funeral piles erected among them for the destruction of their respective prisoners. This design, this work, so honorable to man, was called useful.

Since Canada has belonged to England, and a part of Louisiana to Anglo-America, these missions have ceased, because the Protestant religion not admitting the religious orders, the ministers of that persuasion were not in number proportioned to the parishes, to perform parochial duty, and consequently there did not remain supernumeraries sufficient to maintain those establishments or to propagate civilization.

Hence, it results that the different savage nations with whom instruction had been begun are exposed to fall back to their primitive barbarity; and that this barbarity will become still so much the more dangerous, as, by communication with the different European establishments, they have procured themselves fire-arms, and acquired the habit of using them.

Unfortunately, this is the only art they have learned: for, notwithstanding the labors of the ancient missionaries, they have continued to occupy themselves only in the chase and in war, in little or no cultivation, and not at all in building, carpenter work, and other arts of civilization, which the missionaries were instructed to carry among them, and the labor of which they could not induce them to undertake but by frequent examples, patience, and more especially from their number, and the want of time necessary for the purpose.

Humility and even the tranquillity and prosperity of the United States solicit the re-establishment of these missions, as I set the tranquillity of the Indians, of the country, and of the commerce, and the extension of the arts, so necessary to civilization. I have been, for yet two years since, on the frontiers of the united colonies, some nations of those savages spread death, confusion, devastation, and terror. Nothing, therefore, would be so important as to re-establish among them those missions which, in time, becoming more numerous, would not fail to change these savages into honest enterprisers, industrious, happy, peaceful, courageous, and useful fellow-citizens, enemies hitherto ferocious. Would not this be making conquests, and increasing, in a sublime manner, the population, power, and prosperity, of the United States?

The missionaries who may be sent to make these conquests should invite their predecessors, who had known how to please nature, in a manner almost incredible, the confidence and attachment of the savages in their care. Like their predecessors, they should employ all their zeal in attending to their neophytes in sickness, and during their wounds; like their predecessors, they should form husbandsmen, smiths, masons, carpenters, weavers, potters, in a word, providing to them the succor of these arts, explaining to them their use and utility, creating in them the desire of putting them in practice, explaining to them is miserable and barbarous life, and rendering it to them pleasant and happy; thus conducting them, by degrees, to instruction and civilization.

In order to execute this enterprise, the United States want, as I have already said, subjects who possess the talents and qualifications. Mr. & Mrs. Carroll of Baltimore has not a sufficient number of ecclesiastics to send among the savages; but the present circumstances furnish a supply and full means, which is so much the more important, and of so much the more consequence to be speedily embraced, as a course of ages would produce the same opportunity. There are thousands of ecclesiastics, of every age, who have left France, and taken refuge, some in Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, others in Holland, England, and Spain. Nothing, therefore, would be so easy as now to offer an asylum and employment, in the United States, to those of these ecclesiastics who have not been already fixed in some other country, and who would embark with joy in those vessels which the Anglo-American Government should send for them.
In 1791 and 1792, some French ecclesiastics, upon the invitation of the Bishop of Baltimore, went over, some to establish, near Baltimore, public schools on humane principles of philosophy and theology, intended to form ecclesiastics as missionaries, and others among the Interior, so that the spread of the more advanced and civilization among the savages. The other ecclesiastics who left France had for their object to supply missions which were vacant, such among others as those of the French Canadians, and Catholics of the Illinois, established towards the entrance of the Illinois into the Mississippi and another mission which was also vacant; destined to their Catholicity the want of the point of a Dr. This being the case the missionaries ought now to be at their respective posts, but you will conceive, sir, how needful these beginnings are, and how much time would be necessary for this seminary of Baltimore to furnish subjects sufficient for the parishes in the interior, and for missions of the United States, there are no parishes in the interior, and to multiply the colleges in the United States by establishing them in the principal cities, which would equally increase the subjects necessary to promote civilization among the savages. This would perhaps accelerate, at most, in two hundred years, that so important civilization.

In order to bring about in some degree the grand work of civilizing the savages, I think, sir, that it would be necessary, in the first place, to establish a colony near where the Mississippi opens into the sea. The following are my reasons:

Independent of the surplus of aliment which this position would furnish by fishing in the sea, and by salting them, it offers to those who come from Europe, even in the neighborhood of their debarkation, fertile and uncleared lands, proper for all articles of our culture, even for those of our southern provinces, immense meadows for the increase of cattle, a mild and wholesome climate.

Another consideration induces me to prefer this position to any other. You know, sir, that, about the beginning of the present century, some French Canadians went among the savages called Illinois that they were allied together by marriages; that these people, united, went to establish themselves at the confluence of the Illinois and the Mississippi; that about the same time other French Canadians had gone to the Mississippi, to the savage tribes that lived on the Ohio, and that they were also married; that by this means the two nations lived in the greatest union; that they formed but one people.

This colony of the Arkansas is settled towards the eastern border of the Mississippi, at about one hundred and thirty miles from the mouth of the Ohio, and about eight leagues from the French Canadian missions established near the mouth of the Ohio.

From this establishment, in going up the Mississippi, is about one hundred leagues to the post or fixed mission on the mouth of the Illinois on that river, and this distance, of one hundred leagues from the mouth of the Ohio to that of the Illinois, is the same distance with different establishments, posts, or missions, as that between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Mississippi of Du Rober, that of St. Philip, and that of Kahokia. During the last war, several Canadian Frenchmen and Catholics of the Illinois, who inhabited these villages, had gone over to the territory of Spain. But the Bishop of Baltimore thought, as I have said, that the population by these missions, by their salubrity, by the increase of agriculture, and by their establishments, can have communication with the sea, which is absolutely necessary to them, and this is one of the reasons why I wish an establishment of a colony near the mouth of that river. This establishment would serve as an entrepot for everything coming by sea for the support of the colonies above, as well as for all that might come from them for exportation.

This new colony, which will increase by the affluence of the neighboring savages, and particularly Frenchmen, excited by the mildness of the Government and climate; the fertility of the lands, the abundance of everything, especially, as I am going to observe, if this new colony were formed for the most part of our western countrymen.

With respect to the commencement of this new colony, to be formed particularly of Frenchmen, nothing appears more easy: about forty years ago, some French, established in Acadia, were transported into the canton of Baltimore; these Frenchmen have considerably increased. With the protection of Government it would, therefore, be an easy matter to the Bishop of Baltimore to furnish them with these new Frenchmen, of whom one half or three-quarters should be married, and be found in the same colony near the mouth of the Mississippi. It would also be easy for this prelate to engage, through the missionaries of the establishments, of which I have spoken above—to engage, I say, an hundred young French Canadians, as many Catholics of the Illinois, fifty Frenchmen established with the Arkansas, and as many as the Mississippi, and fix themselves in the new colony. It is still necessary to observe, that the said detachments must consist of only about one half married men. I shall hereafter assign the reason.

I shall not intrude upon your time, sir, by entering into a detail of the means to be observed in the establishment of this new colony; in its safety; by placing it in an elevated situation, and at a distance from marshy ground; the precautions to be taken for obtaining grain, and seed for sowing; for the embankment of provisions sufficient till after the clearing and obtaining of crops, &c. It is not for me to speak of these things to a minister of religion. It will be sufficient for me to observe that the embattled ecclesiastics, to whom the Anglo-American Government may facilitate a passage, should be informed to embark with a servant, or associate husbandman or artisan, [they would not fail in this] furnished with the principal instrumentations; and respectful occupation. The said detachments should be divided nearly equal: one half should go to Maryland, to be employed by the Bishop of Baltimore in the service of the parishes, of the colleges, seminaries, and missions. The other half should be destined for the new colony; the latter, being arrived at the new colony, should be separated with their associates or with unmarried women, of whom one third should be separated to go to each of the colleges, one third to the nation of Arkansas and by remaining third to Post St. Vincenat, or St. Vincent, situated towards the junction of the Ouachab and Ohio, at fifty leagues from the French Canadian establishment and the Illinois Catholics, near the opening of the Illinois into the Mississippi.

For the ecclesiastics distributed in these three posts should each have his own tvile, and under particular circumstances, each should be accompanied by his respective chaplain and his associate. Some should be sent without, to instruct and civilize the neighboring savages by progressive steps. They should be accompanied by some Canadian Frenchmen and Acadia, Illinois, and some Arkansas, who would serve as an escort and interpreters with the different savages; particular care should be taken to inform them, that they are not the enemy of the English, but that they are the friends of the new inhabitants of the United States. They should be ransomed, and after taking care of them, they should be conducted to their respective nations.

The third should be occupied in founding, in each of the three posts, first, schools, then colleges and seminaries, in order to form, of the individuals among themselves, subjects proper to make a similar establishment among the savages, who have begun to be informed, and preparing to themselves, by that means, a chain of co-operators and of successors in a word, to avoid the necessity of continually recurring to Europe.
As to the subsistence of all those ecclesiastics, there was not any one mission or establishment hitherto incapable of defraying the expense. Therefore, according to the plan of the colony near the mouth of the Mississippi, every colony was to be divided into districts, or schools, such as the Choctaws, the Alabamas. These ecclesiastics should be accompanied by some of the Illinois of the Arkansas, sent for this purpose, and those objects, into the colony: the analogy of the indigent of the language, the customs, and the presents which should be made to these savages of the things known to be most agreeable to them, through the missionaries, which the missionaries know shall be, in most cases, and may be, for a very long time able to resist, because the most ferocious might oppose at first bad treatment to the first benefits, but they could no longer oppose them, if, as the missionaries did, those I am now speaking of had had usage a continued attention, and having opened, by its ordinary effect, that is to say, to attain the confidence and attachment of the savages, and they might profit of it by augmenting them more and more, and cementing an union by intermarrying the savage women with the unmarried Frenchmen, the Illinois, and the Arkansas. These new married persons would remain with the missionaries to the respective savage nations, some might be established among the Apalaches, or Chickasaws, that their wives and daughters might instruct the young women and daughters in the duties and occupations of their sex. I have now stated the reasons why I think, that among the Frenchmen, the Illinois, and the Arkansas, who should be sent to form the new colony near the mouth of the Mississippi, there should be only one half unmarried, because the people of every age, ancient and modern, proves that they, to connect and unite them with each other, there is no means more inapplicable than reciprocal marriages.

Schools might also be established among the respective savage nations; selection should be made therein of those who manifested the right sentiments and disposition, and good will for the purpose, and they should be sent to the colony for instruction in the higher orders of science, and afterwards return to their respective countries to form similar colleges, for the purpose of furnishing proper subjects for the like missions, or form, successively, similar establishments, by degrees, among the neighboring nations.

With regard to the post of Arkansas, it should have the same institutions, the same views, the same government and object, as the colony, as well within as without. From this post should be sent, in like manner, missionaries, among the Chickasaws, their neighbors, and among the other savages, upwards, to the mouth of the Ohio. The same measures should also be adopted with respect to the Chickasaws, and to Frenched Arkansas, and to Arkansas of the Chickasaws.

As to Post Vincennes, or Saint-Vincent, situated towards the confederation of the Oubachen and the Ohio, there should also be made for the purpose, also, arrangements for recruiting the missionaries of the same establishments and colonies, near the opening of the Illinois into the Mississippi, and to put those missionaries in a situation to create, in one of the establishments towards the confederation of the Illinois and the Mississippi, similar schools and colleges, for the instruction of subjects proper to propagate, by the same means, the missions to the northward, and as far as the savages inhabiting the eastern banks of the Mississippi.

From this same establishment of Vincennes, on the confederation of the Oubachen and the Ohio, missionaries should go up the Ohio to instruct and civilize, first, and more particularly, the savage nations on its southern borders, and, successively, the nations which live on the rivers which take a southern direction that is to say, on the frontier of the United States, and fall into the Ohio.

To secure success to their enterprise, the missionaries should take care to go in company with either French Canadians, Indian Catholics, or savages whom they have already attached to them, and known to be friends of the sacred missions, and who will, by the power of their example, encourage those savages to learn, from their example, husbandry and the other necessary arts, by giving them a bent for them, while their wives teach the savage females the duties and labors of their sex; the other unmarried citizens should marry the daughters of these savages, and this method would not fail to secure in them a very solid attachment. It should create schools and colleges, for the purpose of furnishing co-operators and successors for the mission of the same establishments, and for the purpose of furnishing co-operators and successors for the mission of the same establishments.

After having left a sufficient number of missionaries for the instruction of these savages, the other ecclesiastics should descend the Ohio, and go among the nearest savage neighbors; they should be accompanied by some of the savages, whom they have instructed, the latter being the magnets, as it were, on which the savages should form with this second nation, the same establishments as with the first, and so in succession, as the missionaries originally from Baltimore, and those who shall subsequently arrive there, should be sent by the Bishop of Baltimore, under the protection of the Government, to those of the savage nations nearest to the Ohio, and most accessible to Baltimore, in order to facilitate the communication by water.

This mission, which, like the others, should be regulated by the same principles, views, and motives, tending to the same objects, and by the same means, should be accompanied by some French Acadians, or other well disposed citizens, one half of whom to be married, and the other half unmarried.

The object of these missions should be to instruct the savages, to teach them to learn, from their example, husbandry and the other necessary arts, by giving them a bent for them, while their wives teach the savage females the duties and labors of their sex; the other unmarried citizens should marry the daughters of these savages, and this method would not fail to secure in them a very solid attachment. It should create schools and colleges for the purpose of furnishing co-operators and successors for the mission of the same establishments, and for the purpose of furnishing co-operators and successors for the mission of the same establishments.

The different missions or posts, established as I have mentioned, in contiguity on this river, and on the Ohio, would procure therein a facility, tranquillity, and safety of navigation and communication, especially by the respective rivers, and the Ohio, being longer and more elevated, than the Mississippi.

With regard to this civilization of the savages of the eastern borders of the Mississippi, and at a short distance from the sea, it would be much more easy, and much more certain, as they appear more susceptible than the others. In fact, I observe in the Encyclopedia, printed at Neufchatel, in 1778, that the most numerous of these nations is that of the Chickasaws, near the southern boundary of the United States, whose dwelling is in the Apalachian mountains, on the south by Florida, and on the east by Georgia; that they are divided into several nations, to whom the English, the Spanish, and the French, have given different names, and peculiar to their languages, these Apalaches, or Apaches, extend themselves along the borders of the Mississippi, where they have some thirty thousand souls; that these people are as well made as the inhabitants of the other savages, the barbarity of the others, who burn their prisoners of war; in a word, that the generality of these Apalaches are remarkable for longevity.

I observe in a Dictionary, entitled a Geographical Dictionary of Vogesen, printed in 1790, speaks nearly in the same terms of these Apalaches, and goes even so far as to say, that they have nearly all embraced the Christian faith: this latter article surprises me.

You are in a situation of knowing and verifying the truth of it, and of informing me whether it be true; but admitting that it is not true, the missionary's having at least all embraced the Christian faith, still it results, from these testimonies, that those people are more susceptible of instruction and civilization than the other savages, and that, by using the means I have hinted, the missionaries of the colony towards the mouth of the Mississippi would expen.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

APRIL 7th, 1819.

rience the greatest success, which would be so much the more important, as those, extending themselves from Georgia to the borders of the Mississippi, and from the mountains of the Ohio to a new hundred leagues, and that I have said, or France to the neighboring savages. My plan for the civilization of those savages, and others, is therefore reduced to two things, extremely plain and easy, namely, the establishment of the Missisquoi, and the Louisiana, of a new hundred leagues, and that I have said, of French Canadians, Arkansas, and French Illinois. The second is to profit immediately of the present circumstances, by employing French expatriated priests, who would embark, with joy, to carry among the savages instruction and civilization, some towards the southern borders of the Ohio, and the others towards the eastern borders of the Mississippi. Such, or several others of the sort, would be successively sent after them, and from those who should also successively be formed in the places themselves, would accelerate, perhaps, in less than two centuries, as I have already said, a civilization of beings often ferocious, and transform them into men, making being, hitherto miserable, happy; in a word, changing ferocious enemies into grateful fellow-citizens, who would secure the tranquillity of all the frontiers of the united colonies, their prosperity, and their glory.

These objects are so sublime, that I do not confine myself to the proposing of them; I offer, sir, as I have desired to do for a number of years, to co-operate in them, by embalming at my own expense the passage of some missionaries, husbandmen, and workmen, and by giving them notice, and my attention to inform and collect French ecclesiastics, expatriated and dispersed in the different States of Europe, if the plan which I have had the honor to present to you, and to which local situations, of which I am ignorant, may make some alteration necessary in the detail, were agreed to by the council of the united States.

It may be objected to my plan, that, in order to people countries of deserts, we must not favor celibacy, by calling priests devoted to it, and who would also devote thereto the persons who might be destined for the priesthood.

I say, in the first place, that those missionaries in favor of celibacy, and their successors, would procure, by their marriage, the depravity of the clergy; and, at the same time, the introduction of domestic duties among them.

The Dalmaetic Venetian is of the Greek rite of the Roman communion, which admits married subjects to the priesthood; and there is a seminary of married men in Rome; they are instructed in this Greek rite of the Roman communion, they are therein ordained priests, although married, and they are sent successively into Dalmatian Venetian, to do parochial duty, and supply the curacies as they become vacant by the decease of the curates married like themselves.

The United States might therefore act in this respect, like the republic of Venice. This republic preserved in Dalmatia the Greek rite of the Roman communion. In consequence of the law for the freetoleration of religion, the United States have already authorized the erection of a Catholic bishopric at Baltimore; they might also demand, or authorize for the missions, their neophytes, and the places which would be convenient for the erection of one or several Catholic bishoprics of the Greek rite of the Roman communion, which admits married men to the priesthood. I know a French expatriated bishop, who, if this arrangement were convenient to the Government, would give the means and facility to have it adopted at Rome. By this method, the objection against the celibacy of priests would be done away as well as the deficiency of population which it would occasion in the country in question.

Sir, sir, is the tribute which, in presence of the Supreme Being, I pay to my equals. I request you to present it to the council of the United States if you think it worthy of their attention.

I am, with respect, sir, your most humble and obedient servant,

DUCHESENE.

Ci-devant Commissary of the King, near the civil tribunal of Blos.

PARIS, February 12, 1793.

SIR,

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the sixth, which I shall forward to the Secretary of State in America. It appears to me to contain very good views. There is, however, at the present moment, an obstacle to your project taken in its extent. Hitherto the Spaniards have contested our right to navigate the river Mississippi of the Gulf of Mexico; and although there is every reason to hope that the Spanish Council will shake off their prejudices in this respect, yet it cannot be looked upon as certain.

Monsieur DECHESNE,

Ci-devant Commissaire du Roi, près le tribunal de Blos.

No. 21.

PARIS, March 7, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

Enclosed you have copies of what I had the honor to write on the 25th of January and 13th of February, also the copy of a letter of the 19th of February, from Mr. Pinckney, with my answer of the 18th. I send these last, to the end that due attention may be paid to such vessels as may be furnished with his passports, and which may, perhaps, prove to be British bottoms. I am so well persuaded that the United States will strictly observe the laws of nations, and rigidly adhere to their neutrality, that I am solicitous to prevent a practice which might expose us to suspicion, and finally involve us in war. On this chapter, it is proper also that I should communicate a fact which may perhaps have escaped your notice, for if it be a matter of serious consequence, let us know it. There are hundreds of blank commissions, which he is to distribute to such as will fit out cruisers in our ports to prey on the British commerce. I am convinced that few of my countrymen will be so lost to all moral sense as to embark in a game so abominable, where the murder of their fellow creatures enters as a leading chance. I am apprehensive, much the more, of the advantage from the gratification of subjects that it could furnish both themselves and their countrymen of the great and certain advantages to flow from honest industry on the present important occasion—an occasion which, duly attended to, and properly cultivated, will give to our navigation an increase too rapid almost for computation, and place us in the happy situation to be in two or three years the exclusive carriers of our immense productions. These considerations weigh much, but they are still but a feather in the balance with those of a much higher nature, which stand in connection with the nature of our Government, and of course with the happiness of generations to come. I know of nothing so dangerous, and I might say fatal to morals, as the sudden and unjustified growth of wealth; but wealth by the means of which it is increased is the same as vice. The suns of fortune and of honor are soon dazzled by the glare of grasping vice, and the young are seduced from the paths of virtue; and virtue once gone, freedom is but a name; for I do not believe it to be among possible contingencies that a corrupted people should be for ever free. Excuse, I pray, my dear sir, my observations, which I cannot restrain; they flow from the conviction of my earliest reason, and are strengthened by the experience of twenty years.

In mine of the 13th of February, I mentioned to you that this country would procure the five hundred thousand men required, and at that time there was every reason to think so, because the recruiting service went on well, for all the new corps which had been raised from the circumstances of delayed pay and reflection, calculated to catch idlers, and that there is a real scarcity of men. The losses of the last campaign are sensible in the mass of population, so that, notwithstanding the numbers thrown out of employ by the stagnation of some manufactures, and the reduction of private fortunes, the want of common laborers is felt throughout the whole country. Already they talk of draughting for the service—an experiment of very doubtful and dangerous complexion it would, however, succeed just now, but, if delayed, it would not, I believe, go down, and at any rate would not produce in season the required force, especially if the enemy should have any considerable successes: for you must not imagine that the appearances in this country are all real, and you must take into your estimation that the Convention is falling into contempt, because the tribunals govern it imperiously. These appearances, but the people cannot be dupes. It is the old story of King Log, and how long it may be before he shall send them a crane to destroy the frogs and floglings, is a matter of uncertainty. Already they begin to cry out for a dictator. An insurrection is also breathing without objects; whether, I am told, is to destroy the faction of the Girond, I think I mentioned to you, in a former letter, that the death of the King would be the forerunner of their destruc- tion; and already they see the sword hanging over their heads. The majority of the Convention is clearly at the disposition of their enemies.

They are therefore averse to you, and you will see in the gazettes, the decree for opening all the ports of this nation to our vessels on equal terms with their own. You will be so kind as to observe that this was done by]

...the Committee of the Court of Session. Now, you must know that the members of this committee, or at least the majority of them, are sworn foes to the members of the Diplomatic Committee. This is necessary to explain a little what is said in mine of the 12th, about that latter committee. I have received, indirectly, a kind of assurance from the former, (which disposes entirely of the Convention) that they will do any thing for the United States which I will point out, but, in fact, I know not any thing which we ought to ask; the decrees above mentioned contain, I believe, all that we want.

The history of them is not material.

I had the honor to mention to you, also, that I did not believe the attempt against Holland would succeed, and also that time was extremely precious to both parties, especially in regard to Maastricht, in whose fate was involved, perhaps, that of the whole campaign. This town had, I am told, offered to capitulate, but terms of such rigor were insisted on as to induce the French to refuse them. If they had, raised, and unless the French army should gain a victory, I do not see how they are to escape, provided the enemy exerts himself. Dumouriez had taken Breda, and was preparing to enter Holland, being ordered by the Minister of War, to whom he replied that he would go, but the minister must find him his way out. This latter may be no very easy task. The enemy is sending detachments of soldiers and cruisers to the French coast; the French have, indeed, beaten, the allies may cut off the retreat of Dumouriez; in which case, his fate must depend not only on the strength of his army, not over numerous, but also on the state of his magazines, which I believe to be bad. Should Valence be able to take good a gentle retreat, then he may be joined perhaps by Dumouriez at Louvain, and, together, they may cover Bruxelles. There are some more contingencies; such, for instance, are the following questions: What will be the temper and spirit of those departments nearest to the scene of action? What will be the degree of hope or apprehension among the inhabitants of the Low Countries? As to them, you will see by the gazettes that they are fast expressing their adherence to the French republic, freely pronounced. But, since it has been no small question among metaphysicians what it is that constitutes the freedom of the will, there is no small question, also, on this subject, among politicians, as to the case before us. Are they instigated by desire; are they seduced by hope; are they compelled by fear? Alexander, you know, cut the Gordian knot; the United States of America are to cut it out, and the French have imitated the example of that conqueror. Some striking ex- examples of those who opposed the union with France induced all the rest to give both their speedy and their free consent. It is therefore a problem to be resolved, what degree of force must be produced by the allies to operate on the free will of this people in a counter season. I think the solution of that problem is in Brussels. On the whole, my dear sir, the hour is big with important events. As soon as I learn anything more, I will communicate it in the mean time accept the assurances of that respect with which I have the honor to be,

Your obedient servant,

GOVY. MORRIS.

[Enclosures in the foregoing]

LONDON, February 19, 1793.

MY DEAR SIR:

This serves to cover a copy of such passports as I give to American vessels bound out of the ports of this kingdom. The existing circumstances must justify my issuing them, as I conceive those should regularly be issued only from our ports. I have been able to procure but a very imperfect translation of the form for passports annexed to our treaty with France; you may be able to procure for me that which is proper. If you could obtain an order to be published by the French Government to their officers of the marine, privateers, &c., to observe the stipu- lations of the treaty, with respect to American vessels sailing from these ports, it would be of much advantage to our commerce.

I have no doubts myself of their keeping the treaty, but they are entertained at Lloyd's. You will, however, take such steps as you may judge suitable to the circumstances.

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

Paris, February 18, 1793.

MY DEAR SIR:

I have received yours of the 12th, covering the form of a passport. I have been applied to for passports, but have refused to give them. I know enough of mercantile capability to be convinced that attempts of this kind are frequently made to cover, under a neutral passport, vessels, whose owners have saved the whole of their property, and if I were to sit as judge, the passport you give would influence my mind in favor of the captor; and that, on the following simple principle: Real American vessels have their registers and other papers in proper order, consequently, do not need any documents which we can give, and which, in fact, we are not authorized to give. Of course the application for such unauthoriza- tory document proves a consciousness that the rest is but ostensible and not real; perhaps better than any other reason: If we cover the property of enemies, we injure our own citizens, who no longer derive the expected advantage from their neutrality; and what is still worse, perhaps we justify, in some measure, the condemnation of those American vessels who may not possess the passport. You will observe that, by our navigation law, the owner is obliged to make oath to the property of the ship which he shall clear and trade, and that he must give a particular oath of the master, because he deposes to a fact which, from the very nature of things, he cannot know. He is, therefore, to be considered as one who cares not what he swears. Secondly, he does not depose to an essential fact, which he might know, viz: that the ship was built in America; and therefore, I believe that we are better American that the oath is made. Lastly, I know not by what authority the consuls administers such oaths. On the whole, my dear sir, I apprehend this is a commercial scheme, and that the apprehensions expressed at Lloyd's arise from their knowledge of what is concealed from you. I shall endeavor to prevent real American vessels from being detained, and I hope both of these will be for reversing the maxims of criminal justice, and say, better two Americans be confiscated than one fraudulent escape.

THOMAS PINCKNEY, Esq.

No. 22.

PARIS, 8th March, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

In reading over my letter of yesterday, I find that I omitted to mention the war with Spain. Truth is, that it was a matter so much of course, and of so little importance, that it escaped my recollection. Our commis- sioners will doubtless turn it to account. Last evening I was informed that the French army in Flanders has been defeated, but as this is not an official account, I merely mention it as it is, viz: a letter sent express by an individual at Brussels, on seeing sundry runaways arrive, and stores, &c. &c. coming in at sixes and sevens, with the report that the enemy were at the gates. On the other hand, you must take into account that the siege of Maestricht being raised only the 3d, one day's rest would be necessary for the troops which had come on by forced marches. Now, as the action must have taken place at Tongres, about forty miles from Brussels, and the courier in question left that city in the night of the 5th, it would follow that the enemy must have marched from Maestricht in the night of the 4th, and attacked at break of day, otherwise the runaways would hardly have got in by the evening of the fifth. As a whole, there has not just time enough for such an affair to have happened, and that is all. If there is any confirmation I will mention it.

In mine (No. 23) of the 9th instant, I mentioned to you that the enemy was in possession of Brussels; and so it was then asserted by authority, but it seems that he confined himself to Tongres and Liege, leaving the French army in possession of St. Tron. At the same time, it appears that he was employed in pushing forward a column on his left to turn their right flank, and that much movement has been the French army would, in all human probability, have been destroyed. To prevent the threatened danger, Miranda fell back to Louvain, keeping open thereby the two roads to Antwerp and Brussels. As the enemy will doubtless endeavor to cut him off from the latter, I do suppose that, having his expedition against the Netherlands completed, he will then set out to check Mr. de Cordova. In this case a battle must decide the fate of Flanders and both parties will collect, for the purposes, all the force they can muster. I do not think the position taken at Louvain is tenable, because Brussels may be reached very high by those who counted on success in that quarter, but I do not believe that the whole amounted to more than fifty, or at most sixty thousand, and should those in his rear be now attacked, few of those who number will get back again to France. I understand that the militia are to be drafted immediately, and what may be the success of that measure God only knows. I have not sufficient data on which to fix an opinion, but should it be accomplished by delay, or encounter opposition, the safety of Paris is more in danger than in force.

Adieu, my dear sir. I am truly yours,

GOUV. MORRIS.

The last letter which I had the honor to write was of the 13th instant, of which I enclose a copy, as well as of No. 21, 22, and 23, of the 7th, 8th, and 9th instant. I also enclose a copy of the letter from Dumouriez to the Convention, of the 12th instant, which not having been publicly read, he has caused to be printed in Flanders, and the enclosed is from Brussels. This letter, and the pamphlet in which it is published, should be general in circulating victoriously into the country, which I had the honor to communicate in mine (No. 14) of the 21st of December. It accords but badly, also, with a later transaction. He had opened a large loan, on his private credit and account, at Antwerp, but the capitalists having now ordered his arrest, and not having heard what was to be done, I have been compelled to write to you, to inform you that I had. mentioned in my correspondence, I had not noticed it.

The road to Treves. No good opportunity offering, I did not then communicate the result of that expedition, which, by the by, was never made public here; but the fact is, that he lost one-half his army, and those which returned were so weak that they could not stand any longer against the French, with whom they were left to defend themselves. The Prussians were thus driven back, and the French took possession of the whole of the territory between the Rhine and the BelgianNic. There was in the enclosed letter of Dumouriez three things worthy of notice, 1st. the great diminution of the French armies in that quarter; secondly, the violence used to obtain an appearance of union with France; and thirdly, the temper and disposition of the Flemish nation. On the first of these points, it is not probable that the figures given by Dumouriez were more than correct; but as to the latter, it is impossible to determine from where he had taken his ingredients, because they cannot be found in the evidence with Pache, mutilated as it is; and from which you will find that the accounts I had given you of his numbers were incorrect. Between one hundred and one thousand Frenchmen broke into the Low Countries last autumn, and yet what has been the present effect of it? The Prussians and Voltigeurs, who did not exceed thirty-five thousand, is strictly true. But there were sundry parts of the garrisons spread through the country, and all along to the seacoast, making up about ten thousand more. And it is true that many have come out of the hospitals, and many recruits have been sent on; but some have gone into the hospital; and the Thuringians, Bavarians, and Hanoverians, rather than lose some of their discipline, became volunteers and returned to the French service. But the size of those for whom the French took possession of that territory was, I believe, at least one hundred and seven thousand, beside the large numbers which a little previous to the efforts for the expedition to Holland; about all which, I shall say more presently, and only observe here that the army as being reduced by sickness, skirmishes, and desertion, to less than one half of their force. Such, says he, was our situation, when on the first of February you declared war against England and Holland, we, me; and that, in your case, I should not have voted for it. The number of the French, who had mentioned to you in mine of the 7th instant, (No. 21) upon very full information from various quarters of that country, the account which Dumouriez gives is a curious piece for history. The conduct which may naturally be expected from the French, of an able man and ten thousand, to the 7th of March, for the main part, and on the 1st of February, the reason why they had not already avenged the injuries they had received. But no sooner did the movements towards Holland lessen the garrisons distributed among them, than the smothered flame began to break out, and the French have already paid pretty severely for a conduct, of which the instances in modern times are too few.

In my last I mentioned to you that a battle appeared probable, and that it would decide the fate of the Low Countries. This battle took place definitively on the 18th, having been preceded by some warm skirmishes on the preceding days. As I mentioned on the 9th the whole force of the French as not being more than from fifty to sixty thousand, instead of the one hundred and twenty thousand at least, supposed to consist of the paper surplus beyond five hundred thousand, whatever that may be. Thus it seemed that the existent force on the first instant (as borne on the returns) was about two hundred thousand. Note this force is divided, and to be divided, into eight different armies, viz: That of the North, commanded by Dumouriez, the Ardennes, by Valence, the Monsieur de Biron, the North, by Kellerman, the Italy, by Biron, the Pyrenees, by Servan, and the seacoast by Labourdonnay. Deducing from the supposed existing force, for garrisons, sick, posts, and communications, and the numberless contingencies of service, eighty to ninety thousand, we have remaining a total of one hundred and ten thousand to one hundred and twenty thousand in the different armies under arms. So much for a general consideration. To give a more particular one concerneth themselves with

The army of Dumouriez may be stated at ninety thousand, that of Custine at fifty-four thousand, that of Biron at eighteen thousand, those of Valence and Beurnonville, each, seven thousand, those of Kellerman, Servan and Labourdonnay, each, six thousand. Of these three, the smallest army, the first worth noting here, as the others are all in different posts and garrisons. And, by the way, that we may finish at once with Biron's army, (intended to be about fifty thousand strong, but avowedly defective the first instant about thirty-two thousand,) as it has been in a kind of small action for the last three months, and must keep up sundry posts in the interior of the country for the total number, but a few thousand.

We shall come to Custine by and by, but at present we will return to the northern army. As this was to be exposed to the greatest efforts of the enemy, and as the Government counted on success in that quarter for the means to dictate its own terms of peace, the force of it was to be one hundred and forty thousand; but the above deficiency being fifty thousand, leaves the above number of ninety thousand. Deducing therefrom twenty-five thousand for the several garrisons, (of which there are at least a dozen) and for the sick, we have a remainder of sixty-five thousand, of which fifteen thousand were under Dumouriez, in Holland. The armies then of Miranda and Valence did not exceed thirty thousand, which is a number above the usual, and which is probably at this time within the 2nd to the 4th of March, besides what may have gone off in different directions. The army, therefore, which Dumouriez commanded at Louvain (on the 15th instant) could not exceed forty thousand. His loss, between that and the 19th was at least twenty thousand. He cannot, therefore, on the 30th, have had more than twenty thousand, and of these, about ten thousand were Dutch, and perhaps the Dutch contingent depended on circumstances. The scattering bodies of emigrants also formed an eventual force. The whole might, perhaps, be carried to one hundred and fifty thousand, from which it might be well to deduct one-third for posts, garrisons, contingencies, maladies, and deficiencies. On the 1st of April, therefore, Dumouriez must be reduced to half the number of his army, which is what he numbered himself as. He was obliged to commence his operations a month or six weeks sooner than had been agreed on, because the Prince de Hesse (commanding in Maastricht) informed him that he could not answer much longer for the defence of that place, a great part of his garrison being ill disposed, and the citizens unwilling to resist while their houses were crumbling about their ears. I have reason to believe that the information received from the surrender was unfounded. In this state of things a council of war was held, and it was resolved to undertake, at all hazards, the raising of the siege. This was done by the Prince de Cobourg, at the head of about twenty-five thousand (which Ferdinand of Brunswick) came, and, with the French, under Prince de Wessel, with a body of ten thousand (of which the生命力 of France was the same) and those under the French, opening the whole course of the Meuse up to the French frontier, forming a junction with the army of Beauharnais, and eventually cutting off the retreat of the French army by possessing a post in their rear between Mons and

Sir:—I have received several complaints of violations committed by French privates on American vessels. I have not communicated them to you, sir, hitherto, in the hope that they would not continue, and I have answered several letters on this subject, (addressed to me by the minister plenipotentiary at London) so as to dissipate the fears which the enemies of the French nation endeavored to inspire in my countrymen. But it appears to me of much consequence to prevent at least similar violations of the law of nations and of the treaties. Already has been announced to me the capture of the ship Aurora, of Baltimore, by the privateers Le Patriote, of Marseilles; of the brig Le Bacchus, also of Baltimore, by a privateer from Cette; and of the ship Laurence, of Charleston, by the privateer Le Suez Calvet, of Lorient. While avoiding you with the affecting recital of the violations committed on these different occasions, and which were so much the less excusable, inasmuch as they took place after the prizes were taken possession of, and when no resistance was met with. But I earnestly request you to give the necessary orders in order that, for the future, these illegal acts may be no longer committed, the serious consequences of which are incalculable. From the letters of Cusine, you will perceive that he has been totally defeated, for he found it necessary to fall back about forty miles, leaving a garrison in Mayence, which must last of course: and he may hourly expect to hear of further misfortunes in that quarter. Perhaps the Prussian army may stop to besiege Mayence, but I think a part of their force will be sufficient for that purpose. The country, as I have mentioned in a former letter, is universally indisposed to France, and I can say (on good information) the same thing of Savoy. It is now very fine weather in this city, and if the season be proportionately advanced in other quarters, the campaign will soon be opened on every side. There will be a great want of bread before we have another harvest, unless peace should take place. If Liége and Valenciennes should surrender at once, the campaign in that quarter will not be so much advanced as might be apprehended, because yet the magazines are not brought up, and time must be allowed for that purpose. It seems, indeed, probable that the enemy have taken considerable magazines belonging to France, but even these are at some distance. I expect every hour to hear of an attempt upon Givet or Mau- beuge, and it would seem (from the best informations I had) that neither of these places can be defended long. In short, on every side the horizon looks darkly. Whether Dumouriez will be able to lead his army against Paris seems as yet uncertain. Perhaps he may experience a similar fate to that of Lafayette: but he is in much better circumstances for a high game, and much abler to play it. At any rate, the enemy derive advantage from the squabble between him and the Convention. Here they are not yet fully apprised of their danger. Like those who die of a hectic, hope gleams to the last, and the latest breath is spent in expression of some splendid fancy. In the expiring struggles, however, let them happen when they may, we shall experience new horrors. Such, at least, is the probable chance.

The constant complaints, on account of the capture of American vessels, and the necessity of giving protection to such of our countrymen as are here, have prevented me hitherto from leaving Paris. At present the barriers are strictly guarded, and those who have applied lately for passports have been disappointed; but in a few days we shall know something more upon this subject. The ministry seem to be in a fair way towards an entire dissolution. In short, every thing here is in almost as much confusion as on the frontier.

With sincere esteem and respect, I am, my dear sir, your obedient servant,

Thomas Jefferson, Esq. Secretary of State.

[Enclosures in No. 26.]

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Morris.

PARIS, March 26, 1793, second year of the republic.

Sir:

I have just sent to the Minister of the Marine, my colleague, the letter which you have done me the honor to write the 5th of this month. I have requested him to pay the most serious attention to the object of the complaints which you have made against the capture, by some privateers of the republic, of three American vessels brought into our ports. I have requested an immediate answer, and I am persuaded that it will be satisfactory.

Never doubt, sir, the dispositions of the republic to avoid, with scrupulous exactness, every thing which might affect the union and good harmony which subsist between her and the United States. Be also convinced of the sincere desire she has of cementing more and more the connexions of friendship and fraternity with her friends and allies, the United States.

I have the honor to be, with sincere attachment, sir, &c.

GOUV. MORRIS.

Mr. Morris to M. Le Brun.

PARIS, March 28, 1793.

Sir:

I received yesterday, and almost at the same moment, the letters which you did me the honor to write to me on the 25th and 26th of last month. I am informed that a communication between France and the United States of America, the French frigate La Prospérité has captured the American ship Mercury, commanded by Captain George Todd, who claims for damages, expenses, and interest, resulting from this capture, the sums of £701 14s. 6d. sterling, and £383 10s. French money. Captain Todd sailed from the port of Maulex for the place of his destination but before his departure he gave to the.rotate his claim. I therefore request you, sir, to be so good as to give an order to the agents of the republic at Maulex, to manage and bring this business to a conclusion with the said M. Hort, or that you will be so obliging as to point out to me how he should proceed to obtain the indemnification which the republic will certainly not fail to grant him.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 29th March, 1793, 2d year of the republic.

Sir:

I received the letter which you wrote to me yesterday, as well as the papers it enclosed. I immediately sent a copy of them to the Minister of Marine, and requested him to take the most speedy measures for procuring from Captain Todd the satisfaction which may be due to him, and to prevent in future the vessels of our good allies from being exposed to the attacks of our ships of war and privateers.

But a liberal treatment of many of your fellow citizens, who have just experienced proceeds, in part, from the difficulty of distinguishing an American from an English vessel, and from the probable connexion between several individuals of the two nations to make masked expeditions. In order to preserve to the citizens of the United States all the advantages which result from their neutrality, it is the interest of the American Government to hinder this fraud, and I have every reason to believe that the laws which, in the United States, the national flag, is clear and precise. I know that these laws require not only that the vessel shall be American built, but that the captain and a great part of the crew shall be Americans.

I request you, sir, to communicate to me the last regulation, in this respect, made by Congress, that I may inform the officers of our ports of the fact, and through them, the commanders of our vessels of war. This measure appears to me essential to do away all contest that might arise on this subject.

I have assured you, sir, by my last letter, of the sincere desire of the French republic not only carefully to avoid every thing that might affect the good harmony between the two nations, but to tighten more and more the fraternal connexions which unite them. You will have seen proofs of it in the different decrees which have been rendered by the National Convention in favor of the commerce of the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

LE BRUN.

PARIS, April 5, 1793.

DEAR SIR: I did myself the honor of writing to you (No. 26) yesterday. Colonel Touzard, who takes charge of my letters, having been detained a day longer, it furnishes the opportunity of sending this day’s gazettes, and such intelligence as is now arrived. It appears that the army of Dumouriez is attached to him, and will go all the length of which he desires. What is worse, is that the militia also adheres; so that he has all chances now in his favor; and, probably, as soon as the magazines are duly replenished, he will advance; for, under such circumstances, we are not to expect much resistance from the frontier towns. The affair of Custine has been very serious. The garrison of Mayence is shut up in that town, and if it capitulates the enemy derive from the magazines lodged in it the means needful for ulterior operations. Hence, I conclude such terms will be offered as will be accepted of. Custine’s letter, it is entirely open, and, in my opinion, the several passes in the Vosges mountains will be occupied by the column of Hessians, and, in that case, the retreat to France becomes impossible, and he must make the best of it in Alsace. Every hour is now big with important events, and how matters will go in this city the Lord knows.

I am, respectfully, my dear sir, your obedient servant.

DEAR SIR: An opportunity presents itself, which I make use of, to transmit* copy of my letter of the 1st to Monsieur le Brun, with that of his answer, of the 8th, and of the decrees, which were therein enclosed, viz: of the 18th of February, and 26th of March. I have not sufficient confidence in the conveyance to give you any information beyond what you will derive from the newspapers of which I shall send you a packet.

Accounts from the northward are contradictory and uncertain. The enemy was, however, ready for action three days ago, and, therefore, I presume that we shall hear of him presently.

I am, with esteem and respect, dear sir, your obedient servant.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

GOUV. MORRIS.

No. 29.

PARIS, 19th April, 1793.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed you have copies of mine, of the 8th, 9th, and 11th instants, (Nos. 26, 27, and 28,) also, copies of my letter to Mr. Le Brun, of the 1st and 3d, with a copy of Captain White’s memorial. You have, further, two or three copies of a letter from the Minister of the Marine to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, of the 7th instant, and of two letters of the 8th, from the latter to me; the one covering a circular from the former to the officers of his department in the different ports, and the other two decrees of the Convention, the purport of which I have already communicated.

Since mine of the 5th, I learn that the militia have, in general, quitted the standard of Dumouriez, but he has about twelve thousand of the regular troops, and there is reason to believe that others mean to join him. The terror excited by his defection begins to subside, or rather it is suspended, until some great blow shall be struck. There seems to be more of treason in this country than is imagined, and every day increases suspicion, which, whether well or ill founded, has always the effect of distracting the public councils. Most people wonder at the delay of the Prince de Cobourg; but, besides the necessity of collecting his magazines, artillery, &c. which is a very heavy affair, I have reason to believe that he waits until some other schemes are ready for execution, and, therefore, it may be yet four or five days before he commences the siege of Valenciennes. Could in a needful preliminary, as, in that place, he must receive the various supplies which come up the Scheldt. It cannot hold out long.

You will observe that Dumouriez, and, after him, the Prince de Cobourg, declare themselves in favor of the late constitution, with such alterations as the nation may adopt; and the latter gives the most plausible assurances that he will not meddle with the internal affairs of France. This conduct is wise, and will doubtless gain them a considerable party in the country, if they act consistently with those declarations. It is said here (and those who say so to me tell me that they speak on good authority) that the Powers allied against France begin already to be disinclined. That they will disgrace (if successful) there can be little doubt, because they are actuated by different interests and motives; but I think that, at present, those who assert the disunion rather speak from induction than from information. Custine has retired, you see, to Weissenburg, and there he has a bad position. The enemy will probably make a stand at Neufchâteau. Here, at present, we do not learn that the Austrians have crossed the Rhine in Upper Alsace, and that will be, perhaps, a preliminary to the operations against him.

As far as I can judge the public mind, it seems that there is a general state of suspense. Success on either side will fix the opinions of a very great number, who will then act to show their sincerity. Here, they hang people for giving an opinion in favor of royalty, (that is, they cut off their heads) but yet I am told that such opinion is openly avowed and supported in the streets. I am told that there is a majority even of the Convention who think a king necessary, but, as they see the loss of their own lives in connection with the re-establishment of the throne, it is not to be supposed that they would tell such thoughts, and, therefore, the information may well be suspected. Time will show that there are among them some false brethren; and, certainly, the most intelligent must be convinced that the republican virtues are not yet of Gallic growth. The Duke of Orleans is in the way of reaping the fruits

FRANCE.

THOMAS MORRIS.

P. S. I have mentioned that I am told there is a plan in operation here to detach Great Britain from the Confederation, and make a separate peace with her, but I am persuaded that the attempt, in itself vain, must fail, from the parties said to be employed, if from no other cause.

[Enclosures in the foregoing despatch.]

PARIS, 1st April, 1793.

SIR:—I have the honor to receive your letter of the 29th March, and I have in consequence that of sending you, herein enclosed, the formula of the certificates of registry with which American vessels should be furnished. Our Government has granted such certificates only to vessels wholly belonging to the American citizens. They must also, have been built within the United States, or have belonged to American citizens from the 16th of March, 1793. The law of the United States requires, besides, that the captain should be an American citizen, and before the curregistering of the vessel, that one of the owners attests, under oath, to the truth of all the facts. In fine, the captains and owners are prohibited from giving selling, or lending, the certificates of registry; and it is declared that, in case they are made use of for the purpose of putting a foreign vessel under an American flag, she shall be liable to confiscation. Such, sir, are the regulations made on the 1st September, 1793, and I am not informed whether, since that time, any change has taken place in them. I have read, indeed, in one of our gazettes, that, in the course of the month of January, a new law on this subject had been presented for the approbation of the President of the United States, but I am ignorant of its contents, not having yet received a copy of it. I am persuaded, however, that it does not essentially differ (as to the subject in question) from that of which I have just had the honor to speak to you. I shall, therefore, sir, attempt to communicate it to you, as it is in my inclination, as well as my duty, to prevent, as far as possible, foreigners, and especially the enemies of France, from enjoying the privileges of our neutrality.

I am well persuaded, sir, of the good dispositions of the French republic towards that of America, and I shall continue to give a faithful account of it: for I sincerely desire, more and more, to cement the connections which unite the two countries. It is in consequence of that same desire that I request you, sir, to be so obliging as to have me furnished with a copy of the decrees rendered by the Convention to which you do me the honor to refer me. Hitherto I have not had it in my power to speak of them, in my despatches, except in a general manner, having had no other communication of them than through the uncertain medium of the gazettes.

Monsieur Le Brun, &c.

PARIS, 3d April, 1793.

SIR:—I have the honor to present to you, herein enclosed, the copy of a memorial this moment presented to me by Captain Thomas White. It gives me pain, sir, to be obliged so often to trouble you with such disagreeable subjects. I know that, in the war of revolutions, accidents will happen, much against the views of an enlightened administration, and I have the honor to annex to this letter, the copy of a proclamation which the Congress of the United States of America has thought proper to make, in circumstances, in some degree, resembling those in which the French republic are at present. I do not doubt, sir, but that you will put in execution, against violations of the treaty, the conventions herein stipulated, in regard to them, and particularly in the fifteenth article.

I have the honor to be, &c.

M. Le Brun, &c.

To Mr. Morris, minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the republic of France, the memorial of Thomas White, Captain of the ship Lawrence.

Captain Thomas White sailed from Charleston, the 7th of February last, on board the ship Lawrence, which he commanded, for London, with a cargo of rice and indigo. The 21st of March, being in the latitude of Portland, he met with a French privateer, called the Sara Calotte, of Honfleur; the latter fired a cannon at him, and desired him to bring to, and endeavor to come alongside, which he could not effect. Captain White, persuaded of the existence of peace between France and the United States, came to, after hoisting his American flag. The privateer ordered him to hoot his boat, and to come on board, which order was accompanied with the most hostile threats; however, Captain White obeyed immediately, and, to leave no room for suspicion of his good faith, he presented to the captain of the privateer his sea letters and clearance of the custom-house of Charleston. He seemed to be satisfied, and returned the papers; but he sent eight men on board the American vessel, and detained those who had gone on board. He presently sent others from on board of the American vessel, and, finally, there were left on board the ship Lawrence, only the Captain, one sailor, and cabin boy. They then changed the course of this ship, and the two vessels entered the Road of Havre de Grace the 23d of the same month.

On entering the port, Captain White went to his chamber for some linen, and effects, which might stand in use of shore. Then the French crew permitted themselves to treat him in the most unparallel manner; they loaded him with injuries, cut him with a sabre, pillaged all his effects, and even his last secret papers.

The ship Lawrence was insured for London, and this vessel having been brought to Havre, the insurance is lost: the cargo was composed of rice and indigo; there is no doubt of its being much injured, since the vessel — before she could enter the harbor perhaps it may also have been pillaged. In a word, Captain White has been injured, struck with a sabre, and plundered of all his effects.

He supplicates, therefore, the minister of the United States to the republic of France to take his complaint into consideration, and to have justice done to him.

THOMAS WHITE.

I have received, my dear colleague, the copy which you addressed to me, of the second letter written to you by the minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, concerning the capture of several American vessels, in contempt of the neutrality of the same States, and of the treaty of commerce subsisting between the two nations.
Immediately, on the first information which you had the goodness to transmit to me on this subject, I gave the most particular orders, for the purpose of conciliating to that friendly Power all the attention she has a right to expect from a nation jealous of discovering a religious observance of her treaties, I cannot doubt the punctual execution of those orders, and the minister plenipotentiary of the United States shall be assured, in every case, of obtaining the utmost prompt and full satisfaction, provided the vessels of that nation conform themselves, with the same exactitude, to the laws relative to the transportation of warlike stores, and other objects, prohibited, in time of war, to be carried in neutral and ally vessels.

I shall always receive, with pleasure, the communications you may think proper to make to me, for securing to the flag of the United States the protection which the law of nations, and the fraternal dispositions of the French republic, fully allow it.

CITIZEN:

Being informed that some French privateers have taken vessels belonging to the United States of America, I have the honor to request you to take the most speedy and efficacious measures to put a stop to this robbery, which essentially compromises French honor and loyalty. You must be sensible of how much importance it is to the republic to preserve the good intelligence subsisting between her and the United States, and to tighten, if possible, the bonds of a fraternal alliance with people, who, having conquered and obtained liberty, value our principles, and respect our measures, and to use all the means which you shall have taken on this subject, you will concert as well with the maritime districts as with all the constituted authorities, who will doubtless readily concur in this act of justice, and of the law of nations.

MONGE.

PARIS, April 8, 1793, second year of the republic.

SIR:

I have received the letter which you have done me the honor to write to me, on the 1st instant, as well as the formula of the certificates of registry enclosed in it. I shall send a copy of it to the Minister of Marine, requesting him to make it officially known in the different ports of the republic.

Besides this proof, fully attested, it were to be wished that the American vessels might be furnished with a passport agreeably to the model annexed to the treaty of commerce of 1778. I have instructed Citizen Genet, minister plenipotentiary of the republic at Philadelphia, to require of the Government of the United States a regulation for having all American vessels furnished with those passports, to prevent every difficulty that might arise in that respect.

I cannot at all doubt, sir, but that the dispositions you manifest, of tightening more and more the bonds which unite the two nations, are also those of your constituents. It is under this persuasion that the National Convention passed the two decrees, of which I herein enclose copies.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Décret de la Convention Nationale du 18 Fevrier, 1793, de la 2e de la république, relatif aux denrees exportées ou importées par des vaisseaux Amériqains dans les colonies, ou en France.

La Convention Nationale, après avoir entendu le rapport de son Comité de Défense Générale, décréta ce qui suit:

Article premier. Tous les portages colonies françaises sont ouverts aux vaisseaux des États Unis d'Amérique.

2. Toutes les denrees exportées ou importées par les vaisseaux Amériqains, ne payeront à leur sortie, ou à leur entrée, en France, que les mêmes droits percus sur celle que portent les batimens Français.

3. Le conseil exécutif est autorisé à prendre toutes les mesures raisonnables pour que les États avec lesquels la république est en guerre, ne puissent profiter des avantages accordés à une paix amie.

4. Le conseil exécutif négosiera avec le Congrés des États Unis pour obtenir, en faveur des commerçants Français, une réduction de droits semblable à celle qui est accordée par la présente loi aux Américains, et pour preserver ainsi les liens de bienveillance qui unissent les deux nations.

5. La Convention Nationale suspend l'exécution de la loi du 28 Aout, 1790, décrète que tous les batiments chargés de marchandises des grandes Indes pourront aller débarquer dans tous les ports de la république pendant tout le temps qui durera la guerre, et que les vaisseaux qui n'apporteront que des denrees des îles de France et de Bourbon jouiront désormais de la même liberté.

[Translation.]

Decree of the National Convention of the 18th of February, 1793, second year of the republic, relative to produce exported or imported by American vessels into the colonies of France.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of their Committee of National Defence, decrees as follows:

Article 1. All the ports of the French colonies are open to the vessels of the United States.

2. All the produce exported or imported by American vessels shall pay, on going out of, or arriving in, the ports of France, only the same duties as if carried in French vessels.

3. The executive council is authorized to take all convenient measures, in order that the States with whom the republic is at war do not profit of the advantages granted to a friendly Power.

4. The executive council will negotiate with the Congress of the United States to obtain, in favor of the French merchants, a reduction of duties similar to that granted by the present law to the Americans, and thus tighten the bonds of benevolence which unite the two nations.

5. The National Convention suspends the execution of the law of 28th August, 1790, decrees that all vessels laden with merchandise of the East Indies may embark in the ports of the republic during the continuance of the war, and that the vessels which bring only productions of the Isles of France and of Bourbon shall henceforward enjoy the same liberty.
Décret exempting from all duties the subsistances and other objects of approvisionnments in the colonies, relatively to the United States, pronounced on the 18th March, 1793, second year of the French republic.

The National Convention, willing to prevent, by precise dispositions, the difficulties that might arise relatively to the execution of its decree of the 19th February last, concerning the United States of America, to grant new favors to their commerce, and to renew the commercial relations with the colonies of France, in the same manner, as the vessels of the republic, decree as follows:

Article 1. From the day of the publication of the present decree in the French American colonies, the vessels of the United States, of the burthen of sixty tons at the least, laden only with meals and subsistances, as well as the objects of supply, announced in article second of the arrêt of 30th August, 1784, as also lard, butter, salted salmon, and candles, shall be admitted in the ports of the said colonies, under the condition that the customs shall extend to the French vessels laden with the same articles, and coming from a foreign port.

Article 2. The captains of vessels of the United States, who, having brought into the French American colonies the objects comprised in the above article, wish to return to the territory of the said States, may land in those countries, independently of the siropes, rhums, taffias, and des marchandises de France, une quantité de café équivalente au cinquième de tonnage de chaque navire, aussi qu’une quantité de sucre équivalente au dixième du tonnage, en se conformant aux articles suivants.

Tout capitaine de navire américain, qui voudra faire des retours dans les Etats Unis en café et sucre des colonies françaises, devra justifier que son bateau y est entré aux deux tiers au moins de sa charge, suivant l’article premier à cet effet, il sera tenu de remettre, dans les 24 heures de son arrivée, au bureau des douanes du lieu du débarquement, un certificat des agents de la marine qui constate la jauge de son bateau, et le tonnage effectif de son chargement.

En tous les dites douanes s’assurant que l’exportation des sucre et café n’excèdent pas les proportions fixées par l’article 2 du présent décret.

Les capitaines des bateaux des Etats Unis d’Amérique ne payeront, à la sortie des îles, ainsi que de ceux de la république, qu’un droit de 5 livres par quintal d’indigo ; 10 livres par milliers de contes, 2 livres par milliers de café ; 5 livres par milliers de sucre, tete et terê, et cinquante sous par millier de sucre brut. Toutes autres marchandises seront exemptées des droits à la sortie des dites colonies.

Les sucre et cafés qui seront chargés, payeront dans les douanes des colonies françaises, ou seront établis, en sus des droits ci-dessus fixés, ceux imposés par la loi du 19 Mars, 1791, sur les sucre et café importés des dites colonies en France, et conforme à la même loi.

Les capitaines des bateaux des Etats Unis qui voulaient charger des marchandises, dans les dites colonies pour les ports de France, fourniront au bureau des douanes du lieu du départ les soumissions exigées des armateurs des bateaux français, par l’article 2 de la loi du 10 Juillet, 1791, pour la délivrance de la décharge de ces marchandises dans les ports de la république.

Les bateaux des nations avec lesquelles la république a conclu un traité de paix, pourront porter dans les colonies françaises d’Amérique, des marchandises et des objets desus designés par le présent décret. Ils pourront aussi rapporter, dans les ports de la république seulement, toutes les denrées des dites colonies, aux conditions énoncées dans le dit décret ainsi que dans celui du 19 Février.

Saintonge, (out Paris) 30th May, 1793.

Dear Sir,

I have the honor to transmit, herewith, the copy of mine (No. 29) of the 19th of the last month. You will see by the gazettes the state of affairs, as given to the public; but much allowance must be made, as I have already had occasion to mention. It is, however, clear, that the greater part of those troops which adhered to Dumouriez have returned to their country, and many to their standards. It is evident, also, that the Prince de Co- borromes, as most of the other officers who have been his masters and their associ- ates, since he has found it proper to release that proclamation; but whether for what is there said as to the Government or as to the territory of France, may admit of doubt; perhaps there may be a little of both in the objections made against it. The delay to be noticed in the operations of the allied armies proves, in my opinion, two important facts: one that they mean to leave as little as possible to chance, and therefore wait the arrival of all their forces; and the other, that the original plans of the campaign are to be steadily pursued. Hence, I infer that the supposed disunion, mentioned in my last, does not exist in any essential degree. It seems that the Austrian artillery was not come up very late, so as to open the trenches against Condé, which hitherto has been rather invested than besieged. It seems, also, that the Hanoverian troops have come on so slowly as to have given every advantage to the French armies in Holland, if the successes of the Prince de Cobourg, in Flanders, had not rendered the proposed invasion abortive. However, the period being now arrived about which it might reasonably be expected that the weather would permit of offensive operations, and the country afford resources to the cavalry of the armies, we shall soon know somewhat of the comparative strength of parties. On the frontier they have to besiege, not only Condé, but Valenciennes, Bouchain, and Cambry, in order to open a road in the direct line of advance, besides which, it would seem that they want Douay and Arras, on the right, with Bavay and Maubeuge, on the left, to cover their flanks. Hence results the formation of seven sieges, after Condé, in order to open the road fairly to Paris, while, on the seacoast, they would want only Dunkirk and Calais, after which they might march securely along the coast, taking possession of the ports and erecting slight works to cover their retreat, should retreat become necessary. I am persuaded, therefore, that the main efforts will be made still in that last direction, unless intelligences are established in the way of an offensive. Mtona, Jacob, and the other resistance of the troops in the possession of the Valenciennes and the region of the district are not disposed to resist. The militia, or volontaires, are, however, well determined. I know that the Government are very apprehensive as to Normandy, and I still believe in a descent there, and consequent revolt. You will have seen that the insurgents on the southwest of the Loire have had, hitherto, very considerable success, although the gazettes have treated of accounts of their retreating. That they have hitherto received no succor from abroad, confirms me in the opinion that the main blow is to be struck on the side of Normandy, unless, indeed, the enemies of France are absolutely blind. I learn that the army of Biron has suffered very severely in the defeat—all published as victories gained over the Piedmontese. However, a year on French territory (notwithstanding the numerous foes) remains untouched, though on all sides greatly menaced.

Enclosed you have copies of my letters of the 28th of April and 14th instant, to Mr. Le Brun, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, with that of his answer of the 17th, and my reply of to-day. These pieces require no comment.

With sincere esteem and respect, &c.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State, Philadelphia.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

SIR:—SAINPORT, (by Melun) 28th April, 1793.

Captain Alexander Frazer, commanding the American ship Fame, belonging to Mr. Thomas Dickinson, of Boston, has this moment complained to me, and supports the same by the enclosed statement of it: The Captain freighted his vessel to Mr. Thomas Johnson, a citizen of the United States of America, and consul of the United States, at London, to come to Dunkirk, there to take in, on the account of the said Mr. John- son, one hundred and eighty-two pipes of consine brandy, and to carry them from Dunkirk to Altona. The cargo being completed, and Captain Frazer found that his powers from Mr. Johnson were not departing for his destination, when he was opposed, in consequence of a resolution taken by the Assembly of the Council General of the commune of Dun- kirk, under the presidency of the mayor and municipal officers. This resolution is founded upon two considerations: first, it is supposed that the brandies in question might have been destined for England, but afterwards that they were destined for Altona; and admitting that the detention in this case would be an attack upon the property of the said Mr. Johnson, they declare that the scarcity of brandies in that place renders all supplies of this kind very valuable, and, in consequence, it was agreed that those laden on board the ship Fame, Captain Frazer, by order and on account of Joshua Johnson, consul of the United States of America, residing at London, and destined for Altona as aforesaid, were to be discharged, &c.

I am so well convinced, sir, of your justice and exactitude in having the laws and treaties of the republic observed, that I confine myself to the simple relation of the facts which I have just had the honor of stating to you above.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

SIR:—PARIS, 14th May, 1793.

I have this moment learned that the National Convention, in the sitting of the 9th, authorized the French vessels of war and privateers to arrest, and carry into the ports of the republic all neutral vessels which shall be found laden, in whole or in part, either with articles of food belonging to neutral Powers, and intended for an ene- my's port, or with merchandise belonging to an enemy, which merchandises are declared lawful prize.

I am unacquainted with the reasons, sir, which have given rise to this decree, but I think I can foresee that, as to articles of food, the rules which the national convention have adopted will be the same as those which have been adopted by our former and ancient enemies, and that, henceforward, commercial speculations will depend on the point of subsistence of the naval superiority between the belligerent Powers.

As to the disposition of the decree with regard to enemy merchandises on board of neutral vessels, one might go into a detail of observations were it to fix that matter by a treaty yet to be formed, but that object being already regulated in a definitive manner by the treaties of commerce between France and the United States of America, I confine myself to observe to you, sir, that, from the general terms of the decree, the dispositions of it might be extended to American vessels, and that that most certainly was not the views of the Convention.

It appears to me, therefore, of consequence, sir, to make a supplementary decree to that of the 9th, in order to limit the application of it in a manner agreeably to the justice and good faith of the French nation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

SIR:—PARIS, 17th May, 1793, 2d year of the Republic.

I have received the letter which you have addressed to me, requiring, according to the terms of the treaty of commerce, that the vessels of the United States be exempted from the dispositions of the decree of the National Convention, which authorizes the vessels of war of the republic to seize, on board of neutral vessels, the articles of food, as well as the merchandise belonging to an enemy, or which have been given by him to his friends.

In consequence of your complaint, I wrote immediately to the Committee of Public Safety, in order to engage it to make a report thereon to the National Convention. The committee have approved the observations which I made to them on that subject, and they will, without delay, demand of the council, except in the particular stipulations contained in the treaties of commerce, will not be subject to the dispositions of the decree of the 9th.

I have also taken the necessary steps in order to obtain from the Provisory Executive Council a decision concerning the exemption of the American vessels from the operation of one, of which, however, I am informed that the council has reserved to itself the decision of the case in the first instance.

The dangerous situation in which the town of Dunkirk now is, has justified, in the eyes of the council, the pre- caution taken by the municipality of that place, to hinder the exportation of brandy. The decree, of which I herein enclose a copy, will enable you to appreciate the motives of the determination of the Executive Council, and in order to direct the steps which the captain of the ship Fame is authorized to take to obtain from the municipality of Dun- kirk a just indemnification for the expenses of the delay he has experienced.

I have the honor to be, &c.

LE BRUN.

MR. MORRIS.
Extract from the Registers of the deliberations of the Provisory Executive Council of the 16th May, 1793, 2d year of the republic.

On the report of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, touching the claim made by the minister plenipotentiary of the United States, relative to a vessel of his nation laden with brandy, and detained by the municipality of Dunkirk, from motives of precaution, seeing the probability of an immediate attack of that city by land and sea,

The Provisory Executive Council, considering the immediate danger in which the city of Dunkirk is, and the necessity of not depriving it of any object of supply for the support of the troops, approves of the precaution taken by the administrators of that city.

Considering further the connexions of friendship subsisting between the French republic and the United States of America, and not wishing in any manner that the extraordinary case of the captain of the American ship The Fame should be prejudicial to the interests of his employers,

The Provisory Executive Council charges the municipality of Dunkirk to have ascertained the expenses of lading and unloading the above mentioned brandies, as well as those of the delay the captain has met with, and to pay him their amount.

The Provisory Executive Council, besides, charges the Minister for Foreign Affairs to send to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States, copy of the present arret, and to inform him of the imperious circumstances which have prevented the council from attending to his demand.

True copy conformable to the register 15th May.

The Secretary of the Provisory Executive Council.

LE BRUN.

SAINPORT, 30th May, 1793.

Sir:

I have this moment received the letter which you have done me the honor to write to me on the 17th, with the deliberation it enclosed of the Executive Council of the 14th.

It appears to me natural, sir, to secure, in a city threatened with a siege, the supplies which are necessary for it, and to suspend for that purpose the general commercial laws. I, at the same time, see with pleasure, that the council has determined to have rendered to the interested the indemnification which justice requires. Such are always the proceedings of a free people. I ought, however, to observe to you, sir, that the person who has made the bargain for the capture of brandy on board of the Fame is exposed first to the inconvenience of being liable for the amount until circumstances permit him to export them, and afterwards to the payment of the lost freight. Therefore, I venture to flatter myself that the council, in the course of the justice which presides over their deliberations, will have the goodness to expedite their orders for arranging the whole of this business with the correspondent of Mr. Johnson at Dunkirk, so as to do away all pretext for complaint against the French Government in those who might be disposed.

As I am fully persuaded, sir, that the representatives of the French nation will never be deficient either in the purity of its conventions, or in the loyalty of its character, I have this moment informed our Government that the decree of the 9th will, in a few days, undergo the changes which you have had the goodness to announce to me.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SAINPORT, near Paris, 1st June, 1793.

Dear Sir:

My last (No. 20) was of the 30th of May. I had the honor to transmit therein copies of my last correspondence with the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Herein I have the pleasure to send a copy of his letter to me of the 26th, covering copy of the decree of the 33d.

I shall not say any thing at present upon the state of public affairs, but refer to what I have formerly said, and to the developments contained in the gazettes.

With sincere esteem and respect, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

[Enclosed in the foregoing dispatch.]

PARIS, 26th May, 1793.

Sir:

Conformably to the dispositions which I have had the care of communicating to you in my letter of the 17th instant, I have the satisfaction now to transmit to you copy of a decree passed by the National Convention, which declares that the vessels of the United States are not comprehended in the decree of the 9th May. You will there find a new combination of the principles, from which the French people will never depart, with regard to their good friends and allies the United States of America. You will also be convinced, sir, that the confidence that you have placed in the loyalty of the republic, by informing your constituents of the dispositions which I have communicated to you, was well founded.

I have the honor to be, &c.

DEAR SIR:

This will accompany duplicates of Nos. 29 and 31. I have now the honor to transmit a copy of the decision made by the municipality of Dunkirk on the 3d instant, respecting the ship Fame, which I received last night in a letter from that place of the 7th, which informs me that the ship was then sailed. I have just now written to Mr. Le Brun (who by the by is en état d’arrestation) a letter of acknowledgment, copy whereof is enclosed. I derived pleasure by being able to inform him of the good news. I have heard the news of the best regulated Governments it isdifficult to prevent the violation of the rights of neutral Powers, and much more so, where, in the tempests of a revolution, Government resembles more a weathercock, marking from whence the hurricane arises, than a tower to resist its force. Whenever a good opportunity presents itself I shall take the liberty to have you apprised of such late events for I respect, sir, too much your curiosity to state that it is not quite determined whether shall be the conventional appellation of what passed in the end of May.

I am, with esteem and respect, dear sir, your obedient servant,

GOV. MORRIS.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

Extract from the Registers of the deliberations of the municipality of Dunkirk, of the 3d of June, 1792, 2d year of the republic.

A letter having been presented by citizen Brown, from the Minister for Foreign Affairs, of the 30th of May last, to Captain Alexander Fraser, commanding the ship Fame, relative to the cargo of brandy embarked on board of him, and according to which he is authorized to pursue his voyage: considering that, after having conferred with citizen Carnot, his representative, it was agreed yesterday to take off the embargo laid on the said vessel, and after having had an interview with citizen Brown on the indemnity which the said captain might require, which indemnity has been agreed up to the amount of the original indemnity; the said captain has also agreed to make certain advances to the said vessel in consequence of which, the said captain is authorized to depart as soon as he shall think proper, we engaging to pay, or cause to be paid, to citizen Brown, the indemnification agreed on.

MAEYENS, Registering Secretary.

SAINTPOM, 12th June, 1793.

SIR:

I have just learned, with satisfaction, that you have permitted the ship Fame to sail from Dunkirk, with the cargo of brandy, on granting to Captain Fraser an honorable indemnification for the delay occasioned him. I shall immediately render an account thereof to the ministers of the United States; and I venture to assure you, sir, that the open and loyal conduct of the French Government in regard to us, will calm the uneasiness which particular facts might have given rise to in the minds of my countrymen.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Mons. LE BRUN, Minister for Foreign Affairs.

No. 33.

SAINTPOM, 29th June, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

This will, I expect, accompany my last, (No. 32) of the 12th instant, no opportunity having offered since it was written. I do myself the honor to enclose herein the copy of what I wrote on the 12th instant, to Mons. Le Brun, respecting an atrocious violation of our flag, and respecting a very extraordinary step taken by the Convention in the repeal, on motion of a member, of the decree by which our ships were exempted from the seizure to which those of others were exposed. I was informed that the object of the decree I complained of, was to effect the confiscation of a large cargo belonging to citizens of the State of South Carolina, and which has been, sometime since, acquitted at Havre, but an appeal made from the decision of the court, though grounded on the clearest principles, was determined against the captors then declared that they would obtain a decree for the confiscation, by means of their rights in the convention, and, sometime afterwards, that of the 9th of May appeared, in which a retrospective clause covered precisely the object they had in view. Such a coincidence of circumstances was somewhat remarkable; however, I most unwillingly referred to it in my first application, which (as you will have seen) produced the desired effect, being the decree of the 23d of May. The interested parties, as soon as this decree was passed, went to work, as (I was afterwards informed) and by force of money, as my informant says, procured the decree of the 25th. Certain it is that the former was not sent on to be enregistered until after the latter had passed, and then both were immediately forwarded together. It did not become me to give ear to calumny suggestions, nor yet could I be totally deal to a matter of such general importance to the United States. You will perceive, in the close of my letter to M. Le Brun, some general observations, which may render the corrupted members, if such there be, a little more cautious. I shall also enclose, herewith, a copy of M. Le Brun’s answer of the 21st instant, to mine of the 19th.

I had directed Mr. Collyns, the agent at Dunkirk, to cause a prosecution to be commenced against the murderer of our fellow-citizen.

In a letter, written long since, I mentioned to you, sir, that I was in quest of M. Merlino. I have since found him, and conversed with him. He is immensely rich, but seems to have been the father of his own fortune.

If I can judge from his countenance, the inquiry was on foot in the hope of negative answers, and the affirmative is of course not pleasing. Certain it is, that he showed no inclination to spare to the necessities of his nephews a part of his own abundance; but this is the less reprehensible, in that he treats himself no better than his own relations.

Your favor of the 29th of April reached me two days ago, and now I have those of the 8th of that month, and 12th and 13th of March. To the contents of the last mentioned letter, I shall pay all due attention, whenever opportunity shall have been found or made for the purpose. I am happy to think, sir, that you have been in receipt, by the 8th instant, of the original of the 13th of March, that your sentiments accord so entirely with those which I had the honor to express in mine of the 20th of August, and that the conduct which I had thought it proper to pursue is thereby justified. My correspondence with Mr. Short will have shown you, sir, that I have been very far from questioning the principles which you state; and I perfectly agree in the maxim in the application of clear principles when the facts are clear. But, while events are doubtful, the feellessness of human foresight may, I hope, be pardoned for hesitating where things of vast moment depend on steps to be immediately taken. A man of so little eminence in the late revolutions, and who has since left France, urged me much to go away, shortly after the 10th of August. As I had not (and have not) any reason to question, either on my own account, or on that of my country, the sincerity of his advice, I could only examine the ground of his judgment, which has always been esteemed a good one. We differed in opinion, but the sentiment he expressed strongly: “In your case, said he, I would go to England or Holland, and from thence state the existing facts, and ask my court to decide at once on my conduct, without waiting for future events.” As it was clear from hence that his reflections turned principally on my personal situation, I told him that my conduct would be influenced by considerations totally different, and, therefore, conceiving it most conducive to the interests of the United States, I should stay.
In the present moment, you will observe, sir, by the public papers, that a majority of the departments declare themselves against the authority of the present convention, after the arrestment of their fellow members, just as, in the month of June last, a similar majority declared their execution of the attempt on Louis the Sixteenth; but who will venture to tell us what Augst is to produce in the next? A small part of the insurgents, wherever the insurgents arrive, it appears that the whole country is friendly to them; so that, if one were to judge by the number of the insurgents in that quarter, France would be nearly unanimous in the re-establishment of royalty, should they come in force to Paris. Then the established principle of administration would undoubtedly be, that all which has been done within the last year was an abominable usurpation, &c. &c. And without exception of Government, they might dissent from the application of them, by a subtle distinction between the voice of a nation, and what would then be called the voice of a faction. Under circumstances of this sort, I am particularly happy to have recourse to your orders, which I shall implicitly obey. Accept, I pray you, my sincere thanks for having given them to me so opportunely.

I will apply to the minister for the orders you wish respecting payments to our citizens, and make no doubt that they will be transmitted. And, indeed, I should suppose that if, without such orders, the payments were made by the minister, who is the arbiter of the country, the system which Government would allow the justice of a deduction to the amount from what we owe. It is possible that we may have occasion to insist on that principle; among other reasons, because of the plundering of our ships, of which complaints are daily made, and to which the present Government of this country is too feeble to prevent. Doubtless, what has been done is, or, at least, I have reason to think, the King in the Tulleries. In short, you will find, in the list of those who were ordered by their brethren to be arrested, the names of those who have proclaimed themselves to be the prince molers of the 10th of August, and fathers of the republic.

I am hurt and vexed at the delay of my affairs, for which I say of the advice which had received on the 20th of April, nine, down to the 13th of February, ought to have reached you by that time; and, indeed, notwithstanding the length of winter passages, there was room enough for their arrival. But the mischief arises from the ports where vessels are put up, as to sail on one day named, and, some four or five weeks after, we learn that they are still detained, and that it would be in vain to try to reach the port. This, you will find, in the list of those who were ordered by their brethren to be arrested, the names of those who have proclaimed themselves to be the prince molers of the 10th of August, and fathers of the republic.

I am hurt and vexed at the delay of my affairs, for which I say of the advice which had received on the 20th of April, nine, down to the 13th of February, ought to have reached you by that time; and, indeed, notwithstanding the length of winter passages, there was room enough for their arrival. But the mischief arises from the ports where vessels are put up, as to sail on one day named, and, some four or five weeks after, we learn that they are still detained, and that it would be in vain to try to reach the port.

The assurances you give in your letter of the 20th of April, that our fellow-citizens are disposed to preserve an exact neutrality, gives me sincere pleasure, as well as from what I took the liberty to say on that subject in former letters for the present, I can see nothing that indicates neutrality by the treaties concluded by the French above a year ago, for, because, if there is any part marked out for sale in Europe, I think, in the present critical moment, purchasers would be found. By the by, I think a plan might be formed for purchasing land and building houses there, by way of actions; but I shall not dwell thereon at present, and will write more fully about it when I receive the plans and letters you promised to send me.

By the first very good conveyance which may offer, I will send out the dies you order; at present I have none such, and only time to write by the person who takes this with him, and who is to sail for Havre for New York. I would rather give them in charge to some one who is himself going over, for great neglects happen in the ports, as I know by frequent experience.

Mr. Pinckney has doubtless informed you, long since, that Mr. Droz declined going out to America. There was some misunderstanding on the subject between him and Mr. Short, which he entered into a long history of, desired me to communicate the truth of the matter, and respect it. I found it impossible to get him into the service of the United States, which was the main object, I thought it unnecessary to trouble you with a long chapter of little sorenesses, which were, I could clearly see, the effect of prudential caution in Mr. Short. I have endeavored to make a good effect in the artist, and I am sorry, however, for the thing, because the conversation I had with him, and the inquiries I made, and the letter he wrote to me, would have been the most powerful aids in his favor in the port.

The assurances you give in your letter of the 20th of April, that our fellow-citizens are disposed to preserve an exact neutrality, gives me sincere pleasure, as well as from what I took the liberty to say on that subject in former letters for the present, I can see nothing that indicates neutrality by the treaties concluded by the French above a year ago, for, because, if there is any part marked out for sale in Europe, I think, in the present critical moment, purchasers would be found. By the by, I think a plan might be formed for purchasing land and building houses there, by way of actions; but I shall not dwell thereon at present, and will write more fully about it when I receive the plans and letters you promised to send me.

With perfect esteem and respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

SAINPORT, June 19, 1793.

SIR: I have just received the copy of a declaration made by the captain and crew of the Little Cherub, an American vessel, which states that this vessel, having taken on board thirty French passengers, driven off by the Spanish government, conducted them to Havre, whence he took his departure on the 3d current, furnished with a passport (from M. de Stael), and on the 11th the vessel was captured by the Vrai Patriote and l'Argus, privateer, belonging to the republic, and carried into the latter part; that the captain and crew have been very badly treated, although they had made no resistance; and that the French government, in the name of the people of France, has annexed, one of the articles of the convention of the 5th of the past month, whatever, blew his brains out. Such serious facts, sir, oblige me to lay a complaint of them before you, and very earnestly to request that strict inquiry may be made concerning them, and that, in case they shall be found to have been represented to me, the murderer may be punished with death.

I was much astonished, sir, to learn some other, that the Convention had, on the 28th of last month their decree of the 23d, and that consequently the depositions of the decree of the 9th, acknowledged by that of the 33d to be contrary to the treaty, were again revived. It was impossible for me to believe it, had I not received a copy of the decree. I observe therein that the Committee of Public Safety, in concert with that of the marine, were instructed to give in a definitive report on this business within three days. It becomes of course of consequence to fix the matter of the fate of the American vessel, for in the present situation of this country, we must expect to see that species of dispute multiplied, in which culpity on the one hand, and fear on the other, will give place to callous insinuations, which lead uninfomed persons to think that the interest of individuals might influence the national decisions.
foreign relations,

I have the honor to be, &c.

M. Le Brun, Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Sir:

I hasten to reply to the letter which you did me the honor to write to me, the 19th of this month.

Infinitely wound at the afflicting details that letter contained, I conceived it my duty immediately to instruct the Minister of Foreign Affairs here to report of which you are so kind as to require. So you will there find the sincere expression of sentiments which I prove, and of the opinion of the Provisional Executive Council.

Be persuaded, sir, that if the facts you have reported are true, the outrage committed on board the vessel called the Little Cherub shall not pass by with impunity, and that the government of the United States will take all the measures which shall depend upon it, in order to prevent the neutrality of the flag of our good friends and allies from being violated.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

Le Brun.

United States.

Report.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States has just made very serious complaints against a violation of the law of nations, and of the treaties concluded with the free Americans.

The Little Cherub, an American vessel, having on board thirty French passengers, whom the Spanish Government had driven off, conducted them to Havre, whence she sailed the 3d current, furnished with a passport from the Spanish authorities, containing the false statement of the taking of these persons by privateer le Vrai Patriote and le largue, belonging to the republic, and carried into the latter port. The captain and crew have been very treatly, although they made no resistance. The French being in full possession of the American vessel, one of them seized the mate, and, without provocation of any kind, blew him, burnt out. The minister plenipotentiary of the United States demands that inquiry should be made as to the facts, and that the murderer be punished with death, and the vessel released conformably to the treaty.

If the facts above related are true, it is not only for the interest of the republic, but for its honor and justice, to avenge this atrocious violation of the laws, and to give to the Captain of the Little Cherub, and to his crew, all satisfaction due to him. This crime is so much the more punishable, as he had come to Havre to land there a great number of our brethren, driven away from Spain, and the captors have infringed, with regard to him, not only the laws of war, but those of hospitality and gratitude.

The minister of the United States complains, also, that the decree of the 23d of May, which declares that the vessels of the United States shall not be comprehended in the dispositions of that of the 9th of May, has been reported by the decree of the 28th of May, and that the definitive report, which, according to the terms of the decree, should have been made in the business three days after by the Committee of Public Safety and Marine, in concert, has not yet been published. It remains to be seen, and, among others, one richly laden, remains sequestered, to the great prejudice of the proprietors and merchants.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs conceives that it is his duty strongly to insist on a prompt decision concerning the complaints of the American minister. He observes that, independent of the fraternal connexions which unite the two nations, the republic has the most pressing interest to treat the free Americans with attention, and to take their vessels under its particular protection. The United States become more and more the granary of France and her colonies; they manifest the most favorable dispositions of succouring us; and the courage which they have discovered in acknowledging formally the French republic, in spite of the menaces and intrigues of England, prove that their friendship for us is above all political or interested considerations, which might have led them to follow the impulsion which England, Spain, and Holland, have in vain attempted to give them.

Relate these motives to the minister of the United States, and I maintain that the government of the United States should be severely punished; that the captain receive full indemnity, as well for the injury committed on board as for the delay he has met with; and that, according to the 18th article of the treaty of commerce between France and the United States, the American vessels enjoy folly, and without any exception, the advantage resulting from their neutrality, as long as that naturely assures the supplies of the republican and of her colonies.

No. 55.

Sloops, August 13, 1793.

Dear Sir:

Enclosed herein you will find copies of my letters of the 27th and 28th of June, 4th, 21st, and 34th of July, and 6th of August, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, with copies of his letters to me of the 3d, 19th, 29th, and 30th of July. From these, you will perceive that my application for an order to the Minister of France in America, to pay, out of the funds to be furnished by the United States, the drafts made on his predecessor from St. Domingo, produced the desired effect. Some subsequent circumstances have induced me to believe that, under that cover, an attempt will be made to pay the bills drawn on Europe in favor of French citizens. I have certified signature heretofore as calculated to this purpose, but as I presume that measures will be taken of a cautionary nature, I shall not pretend to suggest any.

You will perceive, sir, in this correspondence, one of the many violations of our flag in the case of the Little Cherub, which, being attended with circumstances of peculiar atrocity, called for more pointed animadversion. The conduct of the Government on this occasion was perfectly proper. The person who committed the murder has, however, been acquitted on the testimony of his companions, in direct contradiction to that of the American master and crew. The case of the ship is still depending, and I know not what will be the event. It now appears that part of the crew are bounty men, hired for the present of Flemish merchants, and to be delivered at Ostend; but more of this presently. I must, however, take the liberty of recommending to the notice of Government Francis Coffyn, of Dunkirk, an old deputy of Mr. Blair, while he was Consul General. On many occasions, and especially in the affair of the Little Cherub, he has behaved with much sense, spirit, and industry. The conduct of such business is of immense importance now, for the present situation of this country, the laws are but little respected; and it would seem as if pompous declarations of the rights of men were reiterated only to render the daily violation of them more shocking.

In my application on that subject, I have been very careful, fearing that I might be deceived by British seamen, and consequently that our countrymen might afterwards be without redress; as, in such case, the government here would throw all the complaints aside as being unfounded. Among others who have asked the protection of the United States are some Nantucket whalemen; and, at first, their requests were so artfully made that I was near beliefing them to the dupe. I have, however, declined all interference in their favor, telling them that when they embarked under a foreign and rival flag, they forfeited, by their own act, the protection afforded by that of the United States, and must consult themselves in their present situation by the privileges which they formerly enjoyed, and which tempted them

Sir: The United States of America, faithful to their attachment for the French nation, in consequence of the demand to that effect made by M. Ternaut, went to the succor of St. Domingo upon the basis of the decree passed by the National Assembly: and the payment of four millions, which make the object of that decree, has been completed. In consequence of the same attachment, and another demand of M. Ternaut, arrangements have been taken to place to the disposition of that minister a sum of three millions, which was to be employed in purchasing provisions for his country.

The Government of the United States, in communicating to me the measures which I have the honor of communicating to you, inform me that the administration of the colony of St. Domingo had purchased several cargoes sent to that island by American merchants; that they had seized others; and that, for the payment of the whole, they had furnished bills on the representative of the French nation at Philadelphia, which, from the want of funds, he has not been able to honor. No one doubts that France will finally acquire herself of a debt so sacred, but in such a case as the present, delays are very prejudicial to those who experience them. In consequence, sir, I have received orders to solicit of the French republic an instruction to their minister at Philadelphia with a view to paying off those bills with the funds which are to be paid to him by the Treasury of the United States.

M. DEFORGES, &c.

Mr. Morris to M. Deforges.

SAINPORT, June 28, 1793.

Sir: I have this moment received your letter of yesterday, and it is very pleasing to me to be able to felicitate you on your nomination, at the same time that I thank you for the sentiments of friendship which you do me the honor to testify for the United States, as well on your own, as on the part of the French nation. The good dispositions of the United States are unequivocal, and my personal attachment to France is of long standing and very sincere. Therefore I experience a double pleasure on every occasion that presents, of giving a new force to the connections which unite the two nations. I most ardently wish that nothing may injure the harmony existing between them.

Permit me, sir, to renew to you on this occasion my entreaties with respect to the decree of the convention of the 28th May. I learn with satisfaction of the daily arrival of wheat and flour sent to you from America, but I am not without uneasiness for those which ought to follow. Indeed, how can we hinder the enemies of France from adopting, with regard to us, the example that she has given them, and especially the English, who cannot be held by the faith of treaties (since we have none with them) from following any other impulse than that of their own interest? And how can we complain after the manner of France in which we have given to her the fruits of our labors in May? I do not speak to you, sir, of the impression which that decree will naturally produce in America. I had rather that such considerations should present themselves to your own reflections, than be the effect of mine. But it is of consequence that the Convention decide definitely; because delay, by allowing the decree to exist, exposes us, without profit, to all the inconveniences which must result from it. I ought, also, to observe to you, sir, that it will be very difficult, and, perhaps, impossible, to prevent your privateers from committing illegal and outrageous acts, as long as they are permitted to bring into your ports all the American vessels laden with articles of food for countries at war, without the limitation of the funds, and they frequently conduct to a French port that which was destined to another; hence result great inconveniences to both parties.

Captain Pease, of the brigantine Patty, belonging to merchants of New York, whence he sailed the 7th April, has just informed me, that, after having escaped the inquisition of several English privateers, he was stopped by a French fleet on the 21st May, and afterwards forced to enter the port of Cherbourg, although his cargo of flour was addressed to the Mayor of St. Valery. The municipality of Cherbourg coerced him to discharge this cargo there, and his vessel having been run aground, is so materially damaged as not to be able to sail to Gottenburg, where he was to go from St. Valery, in order, sir, that you have the goodness to cause the necessary inquiries to be made in this matter, and that the amount of damages which are due may be granted to him. He is now soliciting it of the municipality of Cherbourg.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUY, MORRIS.

M. DEFORGES.

SAINPORT, July 4, 1793.

Sir: I have this moment received the letter which you have done me the honor to write to me on the 3d, with the copies of the decrees it enclosed. The repARATION ordered by the representatives of the French nation is worthy of its justice, and consequently the United States will be perfectly satisfied with it. They will also see, sir, in that which exempts their vessels from the dispositions of the decree of the 9th of May, a new proof of French loyalty in fulfilling their engagements. I shall give them an account, at the same time, of the instructions which you have had the goodness to have forwarded to Citizen Genet. I was so confident of the measure's taking place, that I have already given assurances of it. I request you, sir, to accept the testimony of my acknowledgments for the promptitude with which you have expedited those affairs.

I have just learnt, sir, that a Thomas Toby, a citizen of the United States, and now in the hospital of Boulogne, seaman, is detained there as an Englishman, having been found on board of an English vessel which was cast away on the coast of France. This citizen entered as a passenger before the war, in order to go home by way of England, because the American vessel to which he belonged had been sold in Spain. I shall be much obliged to you, sir, if you will be pleased to give orders for his liberation.
I take the liberty, sir, of enclosing a letter from Messrs. Le Conteuf, of Rouen, and I request you to be so good as to have the order which they demand expeditiously.

To M. Deforgues, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Morris to M. Deforgues.

SAINPORT, July 21, 1793.

Sir:

I receive with gratitude the new testimony of the amicable dispositions of the French republic towards the citizens of the United States of America, which you did me the honor to transmit to me on the 19th, and of which I shall render an account to my constituents. Permit me to request you, sir, on this occasion, to recollect the affair of the brigantine Patty, about which I have the honor to inform you. In the last period, one of the owners has come to Paris to solicit justice of the Minister of the Interior. He informed me that the municipality of Clerbourg had replied to his demand, that the conduct they had observed with regard to the brigantine had been dictated to them by that minister, and that therefore he must address himself to him for the damages and expenses which resulted therefrom.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Mons. Deforgues, Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Morris to M. Deforgues.

SAINPORT, July 24, 1793.

Sir:

I have just received a letter from Havre, dated the 20th, of which the following is an extract: "The decree of the 1st of this month concerning the Anglo-American vessels has been expounded to our tribunals and regularly registered. In consequence we presented ourselves yesterday to the tribunal of the district, in the well founded hope of therein obtaining the justice we have so long claimed, that is to say, the restitution of the ship Laurens and her cargo; but to our very great astonishment, and contrary to all the rules of justice, the tribunal has not yet been pleased to decide, and has postponed the judgment to the 31st of this month; and for this reason—because the attorney for the privateer stated that he expected a new decree affecting that of the 1st of July. He read in court a letter from one of the interested in the privateer, now at Paris, mentioning that the Marine Committee was about presenting a new report: that Laveau, deputy from Houfleur, "where the owners of the privateer which captured the ship Laurens reside, was the reporter; that La Croix, a deputy from l'Eure, had found the claim of the privateer to be just, and had promised to support it that the Marine Committee were favorably disposed. The situation of Captain White is truly distressing. He has been the honor of four months, and all his crew have left him; this vessel, in a deplorable condition, having constantly four feet water in the hold. He cannot have her repaired, as the first judgment authorizing it is attached, and the privateer leaves this vessel in confusion. For these four months the captain has sought justice, and he has not yet been able to obtain it."

I think it my duty, sir, to inform you of these facts. I have no idea that the interests of the republic should be sacrificed to those of individuals; but it appears to me that the declaration of the attorney, and especially the letter which he read, are derogatory of the dignity of the national representation; and I fear, besides, lest the postponement of the decision, in consequence thereof, may injure the reputation of justice, which France has always imposed on herself the duty of preserving unimpaired. I am persuaded, above all, sir, that the interested in the privateer, in supporting the indirect means they have used, by the names of two deputies, enjoying the just title of so much renown, have had no authority from them, as they certainly could not have that of the Convention, to promise a decree which they have already twice declared to be contrary to the treaty, and consequently a violation of public faith.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUV. MORRIS.

M. Deforgues to Mr. Morris.

PARIS, July 3, 1793, 2d year of the republic.

Sir:

I have received the letter which you did me the honor of writing to me, the 27th of last month, informing me that several drafts, furnished by the administrators of St. Domingo, on the minister plenipotentiary of the republic with the United States, to pay for the supplies which they purchased of some American merchants, have not been paid off, and that you have received orders from your Government to solicit the payment of them.

It is a pity, sir, that, before the furnishing of those drafts, the administrators of St. Domingo had not concerted with the representative of the nation, at Philadelphia, in order to secure the means of having them honored there, and that the reimbursement you require should have met with so long a delay. I am about giving to citizen Genet the necessary instructions to enable him to answer this extraordinary expense. The government of the republic have already instructed that minister to testify to the President of the United States their acknowledgments for the efforts which have been made by your countrymen, to succor the colony of St. Domingo. They have confirmed the opinion, which we have always entertained, of their attachment to the French republic.

The National Convention, justly filled with indignation at the violations committed on board the American vessel, called the Cherub, has passed the decree of which I enclose a copy. I hope that the reparation ordered, by the representatives of the people, will appear to you satisfactory.

I also enclose a copy of a decree exempting the vessels of the United States from the dispositions of the decree of the 9th of May. I am very happy in being able to give you this new proof of the fraternal sentiments of the French people for their allies, and of their firm determination to maintain, to the utmost of their power, the treaties subsisting between the two republics.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs,

DEFORGUES.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs to Mr. Morris, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, July 29, 1793,
2d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have made the necessary inquiries, in consequence of the complaints which you made to me the 28th of June last, to find out the authors of the damage done to the brigantine Patty, Captain Peace. I have not received any answer to the letter which I wrote on the 4th of this month, to Cherbourg. But I observe from what you write to me, that this business is pursued directly with the Minister of the Interior, by one of the owners of that brigantine. I do not doubt that my colleague will render justice to the owner, if, as I presume is the case, his claim be well founded.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs,

DEFOUGUES.

PARIS, July 30, 1793, 2d year of the republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have informed my colleague, the Minister of Marine, of the details of your letter of the 24th of this month, concerning the American ship Laurens, Captain White. The Minister and I are immediately to concert together as to the means of terminating, as speedily as possible, this business, in which my predecessor had already invested himself. You ought not to doubt, sir, of my readiness to inform you of the definitive resolution which shall be taken on your demand for Captain White, and of the justice which will be rendered to him, if he has conformed himself to the laws on the transportation of warlike stores and other objects prohibited in time of war.

DEFOUGUES.

SAINTEPORT, September 22, 1793.

DEAR SIR: My last, (No. 35,) was of the 13th of this month. This will accompany triplicate of what I had the honor to write on the 7th of August; also some copies of letters to the ministers. By the by, I shall cease to send you copies of my various applications in particular cases: for they are so numerous, that they will cost you more in postage than the benefit they are worth. I suppose Mr. Pinckney has hitherto been full of statesmanlike business: for I learn now and then that the British privateers make as free with our vessels as the French have done.

I understand that it is still in contemplation to repeal the decree I complained of, and that, in the mean time, it has not been transmitted to the tribunals. We shall see. In effect, this decree can do very little harm, because the fleets of this country are confined by those of the enemy, and the privateers, by a decree of the Convention. The exchange during the last month experienced great shocks, owing to the violent measures pursued by the Government to support it. On the whole they have kept it at about two and a half to three for one, but mercantiles have risen rapidly in price, and must continue to rise, among other reasons which will easily suggest themselves to your mind, because the compression on the paper mass in one place must force it out in another. Even lands feel the effect, although the market has been, for two years at least, greatly overstocked with that article. The paralyzing of a part of the assignats had as I told you, an effect which could but be momentary. A further decree was, therefore, passed against them, whose effect also diminished in the first moments. To prevent agiotage, the effets publics were ordered to be recorded, and the India Company's property was seized: and as this was not sufficient, the caisse d'échange was abolished. Still the immense weight raised by political gas, could not but bring down with it the supporting balloons, wherever at last, the backers and brokers were laid hold of. I am told they amassed the menaces against those who may remit to foreign countries, agents of the Government offered some bills cheap, and that the purchasers were imprisoned as gens suspects.

However, experience shows that evils inherit in the nature of things cannot be prevented otherwise than by destroying the things themselves. By the law it is death to sell or buy specie, and yet specie is publically bought and sold every day.

You have, I hope, received the new constitution, which you will see is suspended until the revolution shall be finished. You will have seen, also, that the party of the Girondine or Brissotins is quite down; as yet none of them have been executed. Probably, the first great misfortune will call them from their dungeons as expiatory victims. I am not possessed of the proofs which exist against them; and it is, you know, a maxim of our law, that every man is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is proved. If one may judge from the indefinite precautions taken, one would conclude that the very great majority in this country is become royalist. I think I have already expressed my conviction, that there cannot long exist three parties. It is said that the Brissotins, as soon as their adversaries gained the upper hand, enlisted themselves in (secret) under the royal banner, but I think strong proof should be required before the fact is admitted.

I do not mention to you the military events, because you will learn them fully from the different gazettes, and also, because I do not think military events decide so much as is generally believed. If the success be nearly balanced, France is so far victorious. But her resources are wearing away very fast, and the period seems to approach when the state of finances will be of little moment, because the useful things will no longer exist, and of course they can neither be bought with money, nor seized by force, nor obtained through solicitation. Will the allied armies push on to Paris? What would be the effect of their appearance? Two important questions: to answer the first would be presumption, and to answer the second would look like madness.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Eng., Secretary of State.

No. 37.

PARIS, October 16, 1793.

DEAR SIR: Yourns of the 16th, 22d, and 26th August, were delivered to me at my country house, on Saturday morning, the 5th instant. That of the 13th June, mentioned in yours of the 17th, I have never received. I arrived in this city the afternoon of the 5th. I had an interview with the Minister of Foreign Affairs in the morning of the 6th. He promised me to recall Genet immediately. I came home and transmitted that which you had written for the purpose, with the note, of which a copy is enclosed. I am busied about obtaining a proper successor, and taking measures to prevent, for the future, what you have lately experienced. I expect to send every thing in good order by the advice of your good opinion.

I am, with respect, and sincere esteem, my dear sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esquire, Secretary of State.
Mr. Morris to Mr. DeForges.

Mr. Morris to M. DeForges.

SIR: I have this moment received a despatch, which it appears to me important to send you, without loss of time. I therefore transmit it in original, requesting you to have it returned to me after you shall have communicated its contents to the public, perusing the copy I have sent you. Messengers have been dispatched by the delegates of the United States, and of their determination religiously to fulfil their engagements towards the French nation. You will there, unfortunately, observe that the agent, whom you had charged with the maintaining of the good harmony between our two republics, has, I fear, been very discreet, and that all the most essential interests are (in his hands) seems compromised. I regret much that the letter of the 13th of June, of which our Secretary of State speaks to me, has not yet come to hand. As I should sooner have been enabled to inform you of an evil so much the more dangerous, as distance prevents the application of a prompt remedy. I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 38.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

No. 38.

Mr. Morris to Mr. DeForges.

SIR: I have written a short letter, (No. 37) this day, in answer to your despatches. Herewith I do myself the honor to transmit the copy of what I had the honor to write to your 26th of last month. The exchange has been sustained as there mentioned. On the 8th of last month I desired Mr. Jones (with whom Mr. Fenwick had entrusted his consular affairs, during a voyage he made to England) to give you his opinion respecting the situation and temper of Bordeaux, with the reasons therefor. The gazettes will have shown you that apprehensions were entertained respecting the dispositions of people in that quarter. I believe that there is still cause to apprehend, more especially, as the insurrection in the Vendée is more menacing than ever.

The conduct of the Convention, respecting our treaty, will have formed an useful reinforcement to those who would preserve our constitution. My efforts to support the treaty have been constant and persevering, although, in my private judgment, the breach of it on the part of our allies, by releasing us from the obligations it has imposed, could not but be useful under the circumstances. I am very anxious that consuls and vice consuls should be appointed in all the ports. My countrymen are incessantly applying to me, from every quarter, about property taken from them. I am desired from abroad to claim such property. The courts chican very much here, under the pretence that claimants do not produce proper authority to enable me to act. I have the honor to mention, that I should be thereupon represented as a party interested, and, of course, my representations against the inquisitions, which are but too frequent, would be disregarded. It happens, also, that I am called upon to name proper agents in the ports where there is no consul. In such cases I must take the recommendation of a banker, and incur the risk of placing a person interested in a capture as protector of the property taken.

The state of public affairs here involves me in another very disagreeable predicament. My fellow-citizens are aggrieved, and apply for redress, to which they are justly entitled, and which they are led to expect with the greatest certainty, as every public act breathes warm attachment to the United States. On the other hand, it is frequently impossible to obtain redress; because the Government, omnipotent in some cases, is, in others, not merely feeble, but enfeebled. I am forced to say that my demands must embarrass and frequently irritate them. The ministers, ought to be accountable agents of public authority, are placed in such direct subordination to the Crown, in the Salut Public, that even the common routine must await their flat, and they are unaccountable, and swayed by the terror of an insurrection, which may be excited at any moment, should they displease the leaders of this city. Consequently, while they see and lament the consequences of many acts, they are obliged to commit them.

I am now in the disagreeable position between my national and particular interests. In preferring the former, the latter become clamorous, and I am sure that I shall be represented as an idle and unprofitable servant. To this inevitable evil I must submit. But another has arisen out of it, which gives me concern. In assigning to complainers the reasons why their expectations must be disappointed, I have been obliged to state things, which, being repeated and misrepresented, have produced a disagreeable effect in the minds of those who are to decide on the applications I make.

This will appear more clearly from an example. On the 30th of August a deputation of four ship captains, chosen by their brethren of Bordage, appeared before me in being prevented from sailing with their cargoes, &c. Their suffering was occasioned by one of those decrees which, being commanded by the popular cry, in a time of violence, the Legislature, though it may perceive the impolicy, dares not repeal. The deputation, as it natural, had flattered themselves with immediate and ample redress. It was very easy for me to moderate their expectations, and to explain the difficulties. Interest is often blind and sedition just.

My moderation was ill suited to their wishes, and my letter to the minister, of which a copy is enclosed, seemed to them rather an abandonment of their cause than the prosecution of the only redress which appeared to me attainable. The partial way in which the minister received the letter, swayed them to take the misfortune without going out of my way to seek it. This was the more natural, as the visitation of various despatches, I need not comment upon it, because you well naturally place yourself in my situation, and feel its unpleasantness.

I will not now give you any thing in the style of news, deferring that until the moment when Captain Culver shall be about to depart. In the meantime I pray you to accept the assurances of that esteem and respect with which I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient servant.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

Frances, 8th October, 1793.

Mr. Morrise to M. DeForges.

Sainport, 20th August, 1793.

SIR: Four persons who have been deputed by the captains of the American vessels, of which I have the honor to send you herein the list, have come here from Bordeaux. These captains represent me to the people of the respective vessels have sent them here in consequence of the decrees rendered by the National Convention in favor of American commerce, and in the confidence that they would be permitted freely to follow their business; that, represented the privileges of the other vessels, they have brought to this country considerable cargoes of flour, and other articles of provision; that, considering the exchanges with foreigners, the said cargoes have been sold at an enormous loss; that they have no other means of repairing that loss, but by taking, on their return, productions and French manufactures; that several of them have freighted their vessels to French merchants, to carry merchandise to the French colonies that the exportation of all merchandises being prohibited, they are obliged to unload those which they have on board, and to go out in ballast; consequently to lose the considerable freight which have been stipulated.

I do not pretend, sir, to meddle in the interior business of the French republic, and I am persuaded that the Convention or seal has been adopted in your ports; and their provisions, the restrictions of which the American captains complain. It does not the less result that that prohibition will injure, in a serious degree, the parties interested, and annihilate the commerce between France and the United States, which began to assume an appearance of activity, and to promise us pleasing returns. It is, therefore, from a sincere desire of seeing more closely bound the friendly connections between the two nations, that I request you, sir, to have the goodness to examine whether there be any means, either by an exception to the law, or by particular permissions, to allow to depart the vessels of the United States, with their cargoes, for the ports of the United States, or the colonies of France.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

The captains of vessels of the United States to the Convention of France.

Paris, 22d August, 1793, 2d year of the republic.

Citizen Representatives:

Always faithful to their treaties, the Americans, informed of your efforts to obtain liberty, have braved all danger to bring into your ports supplies of flour, rice, sugar, coffee, and tobacco.

After having fulfilled this first fraternal duty, we had imagined that there remained nothing more for us to do; circumstances had suspended your navigation; your brigs, of the French colony, who are also ours, were in want of necessaries, and saw their relations with you cut off. We went to their relief, we have supported between them and you those same relations, of which their misfortunes and your principles rendered the preservation more useful and more desirable.

The latter duty we would still wish to fulfill, and yet a decree, which, if applicable to us, would violate our treaties, and interrupt our principles.

The lading and exportation of every species of merchandise is prohibited; those even of our vessels already laden whose cargoes are comprised in the invoice, are wasting in navigability, their property, that of their children, the product of several years navigation and peril.

Citizen representatives, you will not declare enemies to you, a free people who love you; you will not, especially, give to Europe the revolting example of the violation of treaties, and the oblivion of oaths.

We who, for years past, have been your friends, in the execution of the treaties of alliance and commerce which unite us to you. We confine ourselves to ask, for the present, to carry provisions to your colonies; and we observe, that if our demand should be rejected, we shall be forced to cease bringing articles of subsistence to you, as we could exchange them only for the produce of your soil, and that exchange would be impossible to make.

HENRY JOHNSON, &c.

Deputies on the part of the commerce of the United States of America at Bordeaux.

The President Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of France to M. DeForgues, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

SALTFORD, 1st October, 1793.

Sir:

I have the honor to send you, herewith, the copies of two judgments, rendered with regard to the American vessel the George. By the first, the tribunal, in conforming itself to the treaty of 1778, declared her unlawful prize.

But, by the second, a part of the cargo is condemned, as being property; and the tribunal has found its decision upon the decree of the 27th July. Captain Richard Stevens, of the American vessel the Hope, also complains very bitterly of a sentence rendered lately against a part of the cargo of this vessel, which is incontestably American property.

This fact alone informs me, that the tribunal of St. Brien has founded its decision on the circumstance that, in the invoice, the owners of the vessel had added their commission to the price of the articles therein comprised. A thing in use among merchants, who, by this means, insuring the whole, they shelter from maritime danger the price of their labor, as they do that of their merchandises. I do not cite, sir, this sentence in the form of a complaint, first, because, I have not received an authentic copy of it, and above all, because I am persuaded that the superior tribunal, to whom an appeal must be made, will not fail to render justice.

I desire only to let you see, sir, how much discontent the execution of the decree of the 27th July must excite. Persuaded that the Convention wishes to maintain the closest connections between our two republics, I have given to our ministry the most positive assurances of it; but they will be contradicted by the injured persons, who, doubtless, will accuse the minister with supineness who does not adopt the feelings of his fellow citizens, and my efforts will fail of their effect, as soon as it can be imagined that I do not render a faithful account of the dispositions of the French republic, from the want of intelligence or exactness. I request you, sir, to pardon an observation which regards the particular interests of France. The circumstances of the moment prevent the visiting out of privateers, consequently it would cost it nothing to cause the treaty to be observed with the greatest exactitude. Then the contrast which the Americans would make, between the conduct of France and that of its enemies, could not but be favorable; but, at present, on the contrary, every time we complain of the conduct of the English, they shut our mouths by this decree of 27th July.

Nothing is more embarrassing for our minister at London, and nothing can be more injurious to the French Republic, in the opinion of the neutral Powers. I hope, sir, that you will observe, in the following facts and observations I have just made to you, the amicable and fraternal dispositions which have dictated them. I am sure at least of conforming to the views of the United States, in following my own inclination to remove every thing that might change the good harmony which exists between two nations, allied as well by the force of sentiment as by that of treaties.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUV. MORRIS.

No. 39.

Paris, 19th October, 1793.

Dear Sir:

My last will accompany this, and I enclose herein the copies of letters from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the 16th, 17th, and 18th instant, and copies of mine to him of the 11th, 12th, and 13th also, just written.

By his letter of the 10th, you will see the determination to act decisively. In a subsequent conversation he assured me that Genet should be punished. I replied that the United States had only ordered me to ask his recall,

*This clause has been put in (evidently) with a view to excuse that breach of the treaty which I complained of, and shows this piece to have been concerted with the members of the committee.

G. M.
and I could go no further. The idea is to send over a commission of three or four persons, and to authorize that body to send him over a privateer. I kept the advice boat here a week, in order to embark the commissioners on board of her. But although the instructions are all ready, there remains some little embarrassment about the appointment of one of the persons. This prevents them from being ready; and, as it appears to me very important that you should have early advice, I cannot, by any longer delay, risk the near approach of winter on the American coast.

It is probable that the successor of M. Genet may ask the interposition of our Government in the discussions likely to arise. I have given assurances to the extent of what our laws and constitution may authorize. You will be able to measure better than I can that extent, and, at any rate, this hint will be kept secret, for that is, as you will readily see, of the utmost importance.

In M. Deforges' letter of the 14th, and the decree which accompanied it, you will see the reasons assigned for violating the treaty. You will see also that it was not from the difficulty of refusing them that I declined entering into the controversy. In effect he had acknowledged and lamented the impropriety of the decree; but, unable to prevail over a greater influence for the repeal of it, he is driven to the necessity of excusing a step which it is not possible to justify. There is no use in arguing with those who are already convinced; and where no good is to be expected, some evil may follow. I have, therefore, only stated the question on its true ground, and I leave to you in America to insist on a rigid performance of the treaty, or slide back to the equal state of unfettered neutrality. Your orders will, of course, be given to me according to the determination which the President shall take, and until then I hold the matter open.

We have constantly the news of victory, but the public is incredulous. Lately, orders were expedited to attack on every quarter, and as this is a measure originating with the Government, those who pretend to judge of intelligence beforehand, say that it must be favorable. There is, at any rate, the resource of concealing it, and although it would, at first blush, appear next to impossible that, in a country flooded with gazettes, there should be no note of long and bloody battles, yet the severity of the decrees against those who discourage the exertions of the republic, and the greater severity with which all such decrees are executed, awe the boldest printers, and hush even the whis- pers of private information. You must not be surprised, therefore, to find in the Dutch and English gazettes the account of this most important occurrence which I send you.

It is unfortunate that you are thus disabled from comparing different accounts, and forced to judge from partial recital. The best remaining resource is, to contrast the ministerial and opposition prints. Among the persons best informed, it seems to be doubtful whether the allies will push on towards this city, or wear away the national resources by warping on the frontiers. The former would have consisted better with a determination to restore the monarchy, and the latter seems to indicate a projected dismemberment.

In the meantime, the expense of blood and treasure to this country is inconceivable. Already artizans and labor- ers of every kind are extremely rare. The price of mechanics is risen to twelve livres, that of common hands to five livres, and this, notwithstanding the regulation of subsistence, to something very near the ancient standard. Manufactures are becoming very dear, and the attempt to limit prices, though enforced by the dreadful guillotine, cannot but produce the reverse of what it is intended for.

The ensuing winter, unless some important changes take place, must be productive of scenes most melancholy and distressing. If the enemy possesses himself of strong holds along the northern frontier, he will undoubtedly ravage Picardy with his immense cavalry during the winter season, and thus destroy one great granary. The resources of Barther, Sicily, and Italy, are already cut off by the south. The Vendée is in train to become a desert. The army of the republic lays it waste with fire and sword. I will not endeavor to paint the various wretchedness which has been described to me as existing in that quarter. If the war continues another year, the wishes of those who meditate the ruin of France will be so far accomplished, that many years of peace will not be able to restore her wealth and population.

This will, I think, be a misfortune to the United States, and, in all possible events, the present turmoil of Europe will furnish terrible examples to the present age, and to a distant posterity.

I am, my dear sir, very truly, your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

P. S. I have paid four hundred and forty livres for packing up the statue of General Washington. Is this to be charged to the United States, or will you receive it for me from the State of Virginia?

[Enclosures in Mr. Morris's No. 39.]

The Minister for Foreign Affairs to Mr. Morris, Minister, Plenipotentiary of the United States.

PARIS, October 10, 1793, 2d year of the French Republic.

Sir:

I have received the letter which you did me the honor to write to me on the 8th of this month, as also the papers it enclosed.

I shall have the council an account of the punishable (punissable) conduct of their agent in the United States, and I can assure you, beforehand, that they will regard the strange abuse of their confidence by this agent, as I do, with the liveliest indignation. The President of the United States has done justice to our sentiments in attributing the deviations of the citizen Genet to causes entirely foreign from his instructions, and we hope that the measures which are to be taken will more and more convince the head and the members of your Government that, so far from having authorized the proceedings and criminal manœuvres (les démarches et les manœuvres criminelles) of citizen Genet, our only aim has been to maintain, between the two nations, the most perfect harmony.

I shall profit, sir, of the departure of the Detroit, which brought you the despatches of Mr. Jefferson, and I request you to inform me of the day you have fixed for her departure.

I announce to you, sir, with much satisfaction, that I have obtained from the Committee of Public Safety an ar- rêt which suspends provisionally the sale of the cargo of the American ship Hope; this arret was sent last night by a courier extraordinary.

DEFOUGRES.

Mr. Morris to M. Deforges.

PARIS, October 11, 1793.

Sir:

I have this instant received the letter which you did me the honor to write to me yesterday. It is very essential to transmit to our administration, with all possible expedition, the assurance of the amicable intentions of the council of the French republic, in order that the Congress, who are to assemble on the first Monday in December, may be informed at the commencement of their session. I have, therefore, sir, fixed on the beginning of the ensuing week for the departure of the captain, who is now at Paris. But I shall still detain him here some days, that he may have the honor of receiving your orders. I shall have the pleasure of giving to your house, sir, at an hour most agreeable to you to-morrow or Monday, to concert with you as to the moment of his departure.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

GOUV. MORRIS.

Monsieur DEFOUGRES, &c.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of France, to M. Deforges, Minister for Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, October 12, 1793.

Sir: I have the honor to send you, herein enclosed, the copy of a letter which has been addressed to me by citizen Posite, a lawyer, residing at Mollaux. It appears that, in the proceedings of which he has given an account, there are extraordinary irregularities, and I think it my duty to inform you of them, as on the justice of tribunals often depends the salvation, and always the prosperity, of a State. I request you, at the same time, sir, to permit me to make two general observations on the whole of this business; one of which applies to the organization, and the other to the proceedings, of the commercial tribunals.

The referring of questions on sea prizes to these tribunals appears to me dangerous, since they involve the interpretation of the treaties, and the application of the law of nations—consequently, of peace and of war. Now, we may be permitted to entertain some doubt as to the knowledge of the judges, and we ought, besides, to fear lest they may be interested, as owners of privateers, in the questions which are submitted to them. But, whatever may be the organization of the tribunals, it appears to me essential, sir, that, in their proceedings, they should not patronize the claims of those who have been deprived of their vessels. The tribunals should be open to all without waiting for the authority of the persons interested, who are often at the distance of one thousand leagues. The jurisdiction of the tribunals, within whose cognizance are the questions of prize, is in rem. They take possession of the thing, and, by that means, render themselves responsible for it. Now, as the tribunal, which is the depository of the thing, ought not to dispose of themselves of it, without a formal authoritative act of the true proprietor, it is their duty not only to admit, but also to seek, proofs which may establish to whom the property truly belongs. This is a double duty towards the neutral proprietor and towards their own nation: for every Government which permits its citidzens to fit out privateers, arms, with the destructive sword of war, hands which are interested to extend its ravages, and renders itself responsible for the abuses which result from so dangerous a delegation of sovereignty. For the purpose of repressing them, the Admiralty tribunals have been established throughout the different nations of Europe. In these tribunals, the Government furnishes the means of information by the facility with which it admits therein every species of claim. It preserves, besides, the accounts of the things claimed, the property of which, in the last resort, on the court of neutral rights, is to be seen, and it gives the necessary time to enlighten its conscience on thorny questions, before the pronouncing of a sentence which might extend or prolong the horrors of war. These, sir, are the reflections which experience has dictated to me. They do not make on me a more lively impression than the declarations made by my correspondents of which I have communicated to you but a very small part. I always send to the tribunals the injured persons, by giving them the most positive assurances that they will there obtain complete and prompt justice.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUV. MORRIS.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of France to M. Deforges, Minis-

PARIS, 13th October, 1793.

Sir: From every quarter, my countrymen, who have brought merchandises into France, are bringing complaints against the violation of the laws of neutrality. The indemnities of which they are deprived is the price of their bravery; and France, in justification of her conduct, which proved the cargo to be American property, the lawyer who informs you of that crime, proposes to collect the necessary proofs. It is of moment that your correspondent at Mollaux produce the proofs, that the guilty persons may be punished according to the full rigour of the laws.

You observe, sir, that it is to be feared lest the judges should be interested, as owners, in the questions which should be submitted to them. To avoid this inconvenience, the laws give to the injured parties the resource of appeal; and in the last resort, that of a direct intervention of the administration, and of the legislative body. The extreme rigor with which the English and the other belligerent Powers treat all the neutral vessels destined for France, has put the republic to the painful necessity of arresting, by way of reprisal, in such vessels, the provisions belonging to its enemies. This severe measure, clearly explained in the decree of the 9th of May, of which I enclose you a copy, is the result of the most imperious circumstances. It will continue only as long as our enemies employ against us means disapproved by the laws of humanity, and by those of war. In casting your eye on this law, you can hardly, sir, avoid the conviction that it was necessary and just; that the republic could no longer, without detriment to itself, preserve tolerable decency towards its implacable and ferocious enemies; and that the system of depriving them of foreign produce was also to dissipate its means of offence.

I am, on account of the declarations made by my correspondents of which I have communicated to you, fully convinced that, if there should be reasons of policy which prevent you from yielding to their claim, you will find some means of conciliating the interest of the French republic with that of my fellow-citizens who have delivered themselves up to its good faith.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUV. MORRIS.

M. Deforges to Mr. Morris.

PARIS, October 14, 1793, second year of the French republic.

Sir: I have received the letters you addressed to me on the 12th and 13th of this month.

By the first you complain of the fraud committed by the captors of the ship Pearsy, in carrying off the papers which proved the cargo to be American property. The lawyer who informs you of that crime, proposes to collect the necessary proofs. It is of moment that your correspondent at Mollaux produce the proofs, that the guilty persons may be punished according to the full rigour of the laws.

You observe, sir, that it is to be feared lest the judges should be interested, as owners, in the questions which should be submitted to them. To avoid this inconvenience, the laws give to the injured parties the resource of appeal; and in the last resort, that of a direct intervention of the administration, and of the legislative body. The extreme rigor with which the English and the other belligerent Powers treat all the neutral vessels destined for France, has put the republic to the painful necessity of arresting, by way of reprisal, in such vessels, the provisions belonging to its enemies. This severe measure, clearly explained in the decree of the 9th of May, of which I enclose you a copy, is the result of the most imperious circumstances. It will continue only as long as our enemies employ against us means disapproved by the laws of humanity, and by those of war. In casting your eye on this law, you can hardly, sir, avoid the conviction that it was necessary and just; that the republic could no longer, without detriment to itself, preserve tolerable decency towards its implacable and ferocious enemies; and that the system of depriving them of foreign produce was also to dissipate its means of offence.

ship Laurens; but I have met with insurmountable obstacles, in the established laws, and in the opinion of the commercial tribunal of Havre, who has not the authority to grant the commission, nor given anything to the owners of this vessel. It has been decided, among other things, to have translated three hundred and sixty sons on letters, in the most manly manner, the property of the cargo. The interested have, besides, avowed, themselves, that they had neglected an essential formality required by our laws.

We hope that the Government of the United States will attribute to their true cause the absences of which you complain, as well as other violations of which our cruisers may render themselves guilty, in the course of the present war. We have treated the subject, within just limits, the indignation of our marines, and, in general, all the French patriots, against a people who speak the same language, and having the same habits, as the free Americans. The difficulty of distinguishing our allies from our enemies has often been the cause of offenses committed on board your vessels. All that the administration could do is to order indemnification to those who have been injured, in doing so, towards the French, sensible of the manner in which the representatives of the people. I request you to make the dispositions of them known to the Government of the United States. It will then find the basis of a system connecting more and more the interests of the two nations.

DEFORGES.

P. S. I enclose herein, sir, an arrêt of the committee of public safety, which fulfills, in part, the object proposed in your letter of the 13th of this month. I shall have the honor of communicating to you the measures which shall be taken in the sequel.

Copie du Décret de la Convention Nationale du 8 Mai, 1793, l'an 3 de la république française.

La Convention Nationale, après avoir entendu le rapport de son comité de marine,

Considérant que la navigation des puissances neutres n'est pas respecté par les ennemis de la France;

Que deux cargaisons de farines, arrivées à Falmouth sur des navires Anglo-Américains, et achetées avant la guerre, pour le service de la marine française, ont été retenues en Angleterre par le Gouvernement, qui n'a voulu en payer la valeur qu'à un prix au dessous de celui auquel elles avaient été vendues;

Qu'un navire de Papembourgh, nommé La Théria, commandé par le Capitaine Hendrick Rob, chargé de divers effets appartenant à des Français, a été conduit à Dover, il y a du mois de Mai, par l'option d'arrest;

Qu'un corsaire de la même nation a amené au même port de Douvres, le 18ème du même mois, le navire Danish le Mercure, Christianlind, Captaine Freuchen, expédié de Dunkerque le 17me, avec un chargement de blé pour Bordeaux;

Que le navire le John, Captaine Shkleeley, chargé d'un six mille quintaux de blé d'Amérique, allant de Falmouth à St. Malo, a été arrêté par une frégate Anglaise, et conduit à Guernsey, où les agents du Gouvernement ont simplement pris de payer la valeur de la cargaison, parce qu'elle n'était pas pour compte Français;

Que 101 passagers Français, de différentes professions, embarqués à Cadiz, par ordre du Ministre Espagnol, sur les navires de guerre et corsaires français, Anovice et Brisco, pour être amené à Bayonne, ont été indignément pillés par l'équipage d'un corsaire Anglais;

Qu'aucune escale n'est permise, et que, par l'intermédiaire des villes maritimes de la république, anonce que ces mêmes actes d'inhumanité et d'injustice se multiplient et se répètent immanquablement jour sur toute l'étendue des mers;

Que dans une pareille circonstance tous les droits des gens étant violés, il n'est plus permis au peuple Français de s'empiler, vis-a-vis toutes les puissances neutres, en général, le vrai qu'il a soui souvent manifesté, et qu'il formulera constamment pour la pleine et entière liberté du commerce et de la navigation, décrète ce qui suit:

Art. 1. Les batiments de guerre et corsaires Français peuvent arrêter et amener dans les ports de la république les navires neutres qui se trouvent chargés en tout ou en partie, soit de cotesmières appartenant à des neutres, soit de marchandises appartenant aux ennemis, suite de marchandises appartenant aux ennemis.

Art. 2. Les marchandises appartenant aux ennemis seront libres de droits, sauf de ceux laisser aux marchandises étrangères, après un effet de prélevement; les cotesmières appartenant à des neutres, et chargés pour des ports ennemis, seront payés sur le pied de leur valeur dans le lieu pour lequel ils étaient destinés.

Art. 3. Dans tous les cas, les navires neutres seront relâchés au moment où le déchargement des cotesmières arrêtées aura été accompli, et que les marchandises, après un effet de prélevement, pour les marchandises arrêtées, et chargés pour des ports ennemis, seront payés sur le pied de leur valeur dans le lieu pour lequel ils étaient destinés.

Art. 4. Le fret en sera payé, au taux qui aura été stipulé par les chargés, une juste indemnité sera accordée, à raison de leur détention, par les tribunaux qui doivent conserver de la validité des prises.

Copy of the Decree of the National Convention, of the 9th May, 1793, second year of the republic of France.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of their marine committee,

Considering that the neutral powers are not respected by the enemies of France;

That two cargoes of flour, arrived at Falmouth in Anglo American vessels, and purchased before the war, for the service of our navy, have been detained here by the service of the Government, who would not pay them except at a price below that at which flour had been sold in France;

That a vessel from Plymouth, called the Théria, commanded by Captain Hendrick Rob, laden with divers effects belonging to Frenchmen, has been conducted to Dover, and there arrested, by an English cutter;

That a privateer of the same nation was carried into the same port of Dover, the 18th of the same month, the Danish ship Mercury, Christianlind, Captain Freuchen, expeditad from Dunkirk the 17th, with a cargo of wheat for Bordeaux;

That the ship John, Captain Shkleeley, laden with near six thousand quintals of American wheat, bound from Falmouth to St. Malo, has been taken by an English frigate, and conducted to Guernsey, where the agents of the Government have simply promised to pay the value of the cargo, because it was not on account of the French;

That one hundred and one French passengers, of different professions, embarked at Cadiz by order of the Spanish minister, in a French ship, called the Apache, Captain Ambrose Briois, bound to Bayonne, have been shamefully pillaged by the crew of an English privateer;

That the divers reports which are successively made by the maritime cities of the republic, announce that these same acts of inhumanity and injustice are daily multiplied and repeated, with impunity, throughout the sea;

That, under such circumstances, all the rights of nations being violated, the French people are no longer permitted to fulfill, towards the neutral Powers in general, the vows they have so often manifested, and which they will constantly make for the full and entire liberty of commerce and navigation, decrees as follows:

Art. 1. The French ships of war or privateers may arrest and bring into the ports of the republic the neutral vessels which shall be laden, wholly or in part, either with articles of provision belonging to neutral nations and destined for an enemy's port, or with marchandises belonging to an enemy.

Art. 2. The marchandises belonging to an enemy shall be declared good prize, and confiscated to the profit of the causing of the article. The marchandises belonging to neutral nations, and laden for an enemy's port, shall be paid for according to their value in the place to which they were directed.

Art. 3. In all cases the neutral vessels shall be released, as soon as the unloading of the articles of provision or marchandises seized shall have been effected. The freight thereof shall be paid at the rate which shall have been stipulated by the persons who shipped them. A just indemnification shall be allowed, in proportion to their detention, by the tribunaux who are to have cognizance of the validity of the prices.

PARIS, October 17, 1793, second year of the republic.

I this moment received, sir, the annexed letter from the Minister of Marine. I hope that the measures taken by him will serve to discover the persons who have rendered themselves guilty of the excesses which you transmitted to me.

DEFORGUES.

Copy of a letter from the Minister of Marine to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, dated 25th of the first month of the second year of the republic.

I have received, my dear colleague, with the letter you wrote to me the 6th of this month, (27th September, old style) copies of those articles which have been taken from the United States, in which he complains of, and demands satisfaction for, the pirates said to have been exercised by the frigate la Meduse, on the American ship Mary, and upon that of le Commerce, by the Tiger, a privateer from St. Malo.

There has not, hitherto, come to my knowledge any complaint, nor has there existed in my office any paper, relative to those crimes, which are of a species so much the more serious, as they attack a nation with whom the republic wish to preserve the most intimate and friendly connections.

I address, by this courier, to the arondonnateurs of Brest, Rochefort, and St. Malo, copies of the papers, respectively, concerning the frigate and the privateer accused. I enjoin them to take, each, within their jurisdiction, the most exact information. I shall instantly transmit you the evidences which I may receive, that you may be enabled to give to the minister of the United States the explanations and satisfaction which he demands, with justice.

The Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the republic of France, to Monsieur Deforgues, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, October 19, 1793.

SIR:

The attention which several pressing affairs required, made it impossible for me sooner to answer the letter which you did me the honor of writing to me on the 18th. I have examined, with respectful care, the decree of the 9th of May, emanating from the conduct of your enemies, and supported by some reasons to which you have given their greatest lustre. It is possible, sir, that the difference of our position leads us to see the same object in a different manner. But, although I cannot be of your opinion, I do not intend further to discuss the considerations which have produced the decision of the French Government. I confine myself to the rendering of a faithful account of it to the Government of the United States; and I am persuaded that, in considering them, liberal friendship will put in the balance the difficulties of a revolution, and of a war without example. I ought, however, to say, that the question does not appear to me to turn upon the law of nations. I make an exception to that law, by the stipulations of a treaty. This treaty, in derogating from this law in favor of merchantmen of your enemies, has derogated, in like manner, from it, to the prejudice of our merchantmen found in the vessels of your enemies. We have seen at Philadelphia the public sale of a cargo, the property of one of our citizens, taken by a French privateer on board an English vessel; all opposition was of no avail, because, according to the constitution, our treaties are the supreme law of the land. You will agree, sir, that it is hard for my fellow-citizens not to have the advantage, either of the treaty, or of the law of nations; to lose their merchantmen by the treaty, and not to be able to compensate themselves for it, under the protection of this same treaty, by the freight of enemy merchantmen. In comparing the facts of the same epoch, you will be amazed on seeing what passed at Paris, and at Philadelphia. Your good sense will lead you to anticipate the claims of our merchantmen, and the insinuations of our enemies.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

[NOTE.—No. 34 was not communicated to the Senate.]
PARIS, March 3d, 1789.

Dear Sir:—

Here is a copy of what I had the honor to write on the 23d of last month. Since that period, there are advices here, which announce the re-establishment of the King of Great Britain's health but from a letter I have just received from the Marquis de la Lazzerno, I am disposed to doubt it.

The other day I saw the Duc de Castries, who served in America, under the title of the Comte de Charlu. He desired to be remembered to you, and so did General Duplessis, who has been promoted lately. Our friend, the Marquis de Lafayette, is now in Auvergne, attending his election. This country presents an astonishing spectacle to me, and the Revolution left him in a very low estate. He is now resolved, and a desire to imitate the English prevailis alike in the cut of a coat, and the form of a constitution. Like the English, too, are all engaged in parliament-sitting; and when we consider how novel this last business must be, I assure you, Sir, it is well worthy of the farthest observation.

For General Chastellux, I have no more. I have seen his widow, an amiable woman, who is not the less lovely for the tears she sheds to her memory. A fine boy remains as the pledge of connubial tenderness. I think it would give her great pleasure if you took the trouble to mingle in a short letter condolences for one event, and congratulations for the other. You could in that case oblige me by confiding the letter to my care. Excuse me, I pray, for dropping this hint, and do me the justice to believe that, with sincere esteem and respect, I am yours,

GOUV. MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

PARIS, April 20th, 1789.

Dear Sir:—

I had the pleasure to write to you a short letter on the 3d of last month. Monsieur de Lafayette is since returned from his political campaign in Auvergne, crowned with success. He had to contend with prejudices, and the interests of his order, and with the influence of the Queen and princes, (except the Duke of Orleans) but he was too able for his opponents. He played the orator with as much eclat as ever he acted the soldier, and is at this moment as much admired and hated as his heart could wish. He is also much beloved by the nation: for he stands forward as one of the principal champions for her rights.

The elections are finished throughout this kingdom, except in the capital, and it appears, from the instructions given to the representatives, (called here les colliere) that certain points are universally demanded, which, when granted and secured, will render France perfectly free, as to the principles of the constitution: I say the principles, for one generation at least will be required to render the practice familiar. We have, I think, every reason to wish that the patriots may be successful. The generous-wish that a free people must have to disseminate freedom, the grateful emotion which rejoices in the happiness of a benefactor, and a strong personal interest as well in the liberty as in the person of that benefactor, make such an interest more powerful in the mass of mankind.

I say, that we have an interest in the liberty of France. The leaders here are our friends. Many of them have imbibed their principles in America, and all have been fired by our example. Their opponents are by no means rejoiced at the success of our revolution, and many of them are disposed to form connexions of the strictest kind, with Great Britain. It is necessary, therefore, that we have a firm Man to conduct that of France. I think I may safely say that France has an interest to maintain the imperial character of America, in order to prevent her from being reduced to a colonel or anintegral part of any other nation.

The materials for a revolution in this country are very indifferent. Every body agrees that there is an utter proscription of morals but this general position can never convey to an American mind the degree of depravity. It is not by any figure of rhetoric, or force of language, that the idea can be produced. A hundred and a thousand examples, are required to show the extreme rottenness of every member. There are men and women who are greatly and eminently virtuous. I have the pleasure to number many in my own acquaintance; but they stand forward from a back ground deeply and darkly shaded. It is, however, from such crumbling matter that the great edifice of freedom is to be erected here. Perhaps, like the stratum of rock, which is spread under the whole surface of their country, it may harden when exposed to the air; but it seems quite as likely that it will fail, and crush the builders.

I own, Sir, that I am not without such apprehensions, for there is one fatal principle which pervades all ranks—it is a perfect indifference to the violation of engagements. Inconstancy is so mingled in the blood, marrow, and very essence of this people, that, when a man of high rank and importance laughs to day at what he seriously asserted yesterday, it is considered as in the natural order of things. Consistency is a phenomenon. Judge, then, what would be the value of an association, should such a thing be proposed, and even adopted. The great mass of the common people have no religion but their priests, no law but their superiors, no morals but their interest. These are the creatures who, led by drunken curates, are now in the high road à la liberte, and the first use they make of it is to form insurrections everywhere, for the want of bread. We have had a little hot here yesterday, and the day before, and I am told that some men have been killed: but the affair was so distantly from the quarter in which I reside, that I know nothing of the particulars.

GOUV. MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

PARIS, July 1st, 1789.

My Dear Sir:—

I am too much occupied to find time for the use of a cipher, and in effect the Government here is so much occupied with its own affairs, that in transmitting to you a letter under an envelope there is no risk. This, however, I am pretty certain will go safe. The States General have now been a long time in session, and have done nothing. Bitherto they have been engaged in a dispute, whether they shall form one body or three. The commons, which are represented by number equal to both the others, and who, besides, have at least equal to the representatives of the clergy, insist on forming a single house. They have succeeded; but the nobles deeply feel their situation. The King, after siding with them, was frightened into an abandonment of them. He acts from terror only.

*At this time Ambassador in England from France.
† He served in the United States during the Revolution.
‡ Major General in Rochambeau's army, while in the United States, and author of an interesting book of travels in this country.
The soliety in this city, particularly the French guards, declare they will not act against the people. They are now treated by the nobility, and parade about the streets drunk, buzzzing for the Tiers. Some of them have in consequence been confined, not by the force, but by the arrograncy of authority. Last night this circumstance became known, and immediately a mob repaired to the prison where they were shut up and looted this asilants. A party of dragoons ordered on duty to disperse the rioters, thought it better to drink with them, and return back to their quarters. The soldiers, with others confined in the same prison, were then paraded in triumph to the Palace Royal, which is now the liberty pole, and there they celebrated. As far as this event is concerned, never have the Frenchmen, or any men, done such a thing. A return of the trade to the liberty of the kings, and to the people is to be expected for liberty is now the general cry, and authority is a name, not a real existence. The court are about to form a camp in the neighborhood of Paris, of twenty-five thousand men, under the command of the Maréchal de Broglio. I do not know him personally, therefore cannot judge what may be the results of the army, but all he can do goes to the point, that he will never bring his army to act against the people. The garde du corps are as warm adherents in general to the Tiers, as any body else, strange as that may seem; so that, in effect, the sword has slipped out of the Monarch's hands, without his perceiving a title of the matter.

As these things in a nation, not yet fitted by education and habit for the enjoyment of freedom, give me frequently suspicions, that they will greatly overshoot their mark, if indeed they have not already done it. Already some people talk of limiting the King's negative upon the laws. And as they have hitherto felt severely the authority expressed in the name of people, and to a certain extent the authority of the crown, I must be doubtful, if they are to know a broken reed, for want of some solid dependence. In their anguish they curse Necker, who is in fact less the cause than the instrument of their sufferings. His popularity depends now more on the opposition he meets with from one party, than any serious regard on the other. All of which gives him so much the more weight in counsel, which a fortnight ago decided everything.

If they were not afraid of consequences, he would be dismissed; and on the same principle the King has refused to accept his resignation. If his abilities were equal to his genius, and he were as much supported by firmness as he is supported by ambition, he would have had the exalted honor of giving a free constitution to above twenty millions of his fellow creatures; and would have reigned long in their hearts, and received the unanimous applause of posterity. But as it is, he must soon fall; whether his exit will be physical or moral, must depend on events which I cannot foresee. The best chance which royalty has, is, that popular excesses may alarm. At the rate at which things are now going, the King of France must soon be one of the most limited monarchs in Europe.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

TO JOHN JAY, Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

DEIPPE, July 31st, 1789.

DEAR SIR:

I had the honor to write to you on the 29th of April last. I shall not trouble you with a recital of events, which Mr. Jefferson has, I know, communicated to the office of foreign affairs. But being now here, on my way to Brest, I can assure you, that my voyage was not a vassalage. I have been able to make my views known to the officers, as well as in the small circles of the people, in such a manner as to contain the political, military, pecuniary, and commercial state of this country. I believe them to be tolerably authentic as far as they go.

I will also communicate a matter, which Mr. Jefferson was not yet informed of, and which I could not tell him, because I was forbidden to mention it to any person here. You know, I dare say, that the Count de Moustiers has his congé. His successor will be Colonel Terrant. At first, in the character of chargé des affaires, and, when M. de Moustiers is otherwise placed, it is highly probable that Terrant may be made minister; but that will depend on the situation of the court at the time, so that there I only state probability. As to the other, you may rely on it with the utmost confidence; because my intelligence I know to be good. The important trait in this appointment is, that he is named as a person who will be agreeable to you.

You may rely, also, on what I am about to mention, but which I pray you not to disclose. It is known to very few in this country, and may, perhaps, as it ought, be buried in oblivion. The King has actually formed the design of going off to Spain. Whether the measures set on foot to dissuade him will have, as I hope, the desired effect, time only can discover. His fears govern him absolutely, and they have, of late, been most strongly excited. He is a well meaning man, but extremely weak and probably these circumstances will, in every event, secure him from personal injury. An able man would not have fallen into his situation, but, I think, that no ability can now extricate him. He must float along the current of events, being absolutely and entirely a cipher. If, however, he should fly, it would not be easy to predict the consequences, for this country is at present as near to anarchy, as several of the states. The officers are alarmed; and that he was soar, among them would not be injured by experience, and, unfortunately, there are great numbers who, with much imagination, have little knowledge, judgment, or reflection. You may consider the revolution as complete, that is to say, the authority of the King and of the legislative is gone. But the latter is only a colour, and those romantic ideas of government, which, happily for America, we were cured of before it was too late. They are advancing rapidly. But I must check myself, or my reflections will occupy too much space, both for you and for me.

I have seen in the papers that Mr. M. de Lafayette. He had promised to trust me with a letter for you, but he must be excused, for he is as busy as a man can be. Not long since, speaking to him on his own subject, I told him some hints I had given, tending to make him governor of the Isle of France, which, you know, includes Paris. He declared that the command of the military in that city only was too much for him, and that he was fully satisfied with the latter. My views, however, have been hitherto directed to Paris, completely within his authority. He had marched him where he pleased, measured out the degree of applause he should receive, as he pleased, and, if he pleased, could have detained him prisoner. All this is strictly true. He commanded, on that day, at least eighty thousand soldiers, and the King's progress through them, to the Hotel de Ville, bore the title of: "c'est un soldat;" and only on his return, cried vive le Roi.

I do not know whether you will be informed of the critical situation in which things were placed, just before the last ministry were turned out and the old one restored. My authority is very good, but yet I will not vouch for the truth. I was resolved to reduce Paris by famine; to take two hundred for the States General; and to dissolve that assembly; and to govern in the old fashioned way. All this, you will say, was madness, and, therefore, improbable. But was it not equally mad to drive away Necker, and change the ministry at the time, and in the manner, which were chosen for that purpose? The men, weak enough for the one, were certainly mad enough for the other. Two German regiments, which were to be employed, were regaled by the Queen in the Orangery at Versailles. They received promises and largesses, and were prevailed on to shout "Vive la Reine, vive le Comte d'Artois, vive la Duchesse de Polignac." Afterwards their music played, for hours, under her Majesty's window. The Maréchal de Broglio endeavored, at the same time, to conciliate the artillery. But it was at that period discovered, that, though the troops would shout and sing, yet they would not fight against their countrymen. All which might have been known long ago. At the moment when their intrigue was carrying on by the court, the gardes du corps and gardes françaises combined to defend the members of the National Assembly. I pass over those facts, which you cannot but know, to mention, in one word, that the whole army of France have declared for liberty, and that one reason why his Majesty has not taken the steps above mentioned, is, that he does not know a single regiment that would obey him.

Aslieu, my dear sir, I write this letter in much hurry, and after much fatigues. Excuse in it every thing inaccurate or indelicate, and pardon it, on the score of that sincere and affectionate respect, with which I am, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

Dear Sir:

In my first moments of leisure, I acknowledge the receipt of your several favors. To thank you for the interesting communications contained in those letters, and for the pains you have taken to procure a watch, is all, or nearly all. I shall attempt in this letter for, I could only repeat things, were I to set about it, which, I have reason to believe, have been regularly communicated to you in detail, at the periods which gave birth to them. It may not, however, be unpleasing to you to hear, in one word, that the National Government is organized, and, as far as my information goes, to the satisfaction of all parties; that opposition to it is either no more, or hides its head; that it is hoped; and expected it will take strong root; and that the non-acceding States will very soon become members of the Union. No doubt is entertained of North Carolina; nor would there be any of Rhode Island, had not the majority of those people led asylum, long since, to every principle of honor, common sense, and honesty. A material change, however, has taken place, it is said, at the late election of representatives, and confident assurances are given, from that circumstance, of better dispositions in their Legislature, at its next session, now about to be held.

The revolution which has been effected in France, is of so wonderful a nature, that the mind can hardly realize the fact. If it ends, as our last accounts to the first of August predict, that nation will be the most powerful and happy in Europe; but I fear, though it has gone triumphantly through the first paroxysm, it is not the last it has to encounter before matters are finally settled. In a word, the revolution is of so great a magnitude to be effected in so short a space, and with the loss of so little blood. The mortification of the King, the intrigues of the Queen, and the discontent of the princes and noblesse, will foment divisions, if possible, in the National Assembly, and they will unquestionably avail themselves of every faux pas in the formation of the constitution, if they do not give a more open, active opposition. In addition to these, the licentiousness of the people, on one hand, and sanguinary punishments on the other, will alarm the best disposed friends to the measure, and contribute, not a little, to the overthrow of their object. Great temperance, firmness, and foresight, are necessary in the movements of that body. To forbear running from one extremity to another is no easy matter, and, should this be the case, rocks and shoals, not visible at present, may wreck the vessel, and give a higher toned despotism than the one which existed before.

I am, dear sir, &c.

G. WASHINGTON.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

Paris, January 22d, 1790.

Dear Sir:

Yesterday I went to dine with the Comte de Montmorin, and expressed to him my wish that France might seize the present moment to establish a liberal system of commercial policy for her colonies. I observed, that her interest was deeply at stake, because America could always dispose of the Islands, and would naturally wish to see them in possession of that Power under whose government they would be most advantageous to her. That nothing could lead so much to make the United States desirous of an alliance with Britain, as to exclude them from commerce and trade with the French colonies. That, if the metropolis wishes to preserve the affection of her distant subjects, and to derive from them the greatest commercial benefit, she ought to suffer them to draw their subsistence from that quarter where they can obtain it most cheaply. He assured me that he was fully of my opinion; said that our position rendered it proper to make in our favor an exception from their general system respecting other nations, and that he hoped, within a fortnight, something might be done. But he lamented, as he had done before, that they have no chief minister, and consequently no fixed plan nor principles. I shall see him again before I depart, and also Monsieur de la Luzerne, within whose department this matter regularly lies. He is an adherent to the exclusive system, which is unfortunate.

In the National Assembly, also, there is a considerable difficulty. Among the most violent of the violent party, are some representatives of cities on the western coasts of this kingdom, where the chief commerce is with the Islands and the West Indies. These would be the advocates for America, did they wish to offend these gentlemen; and therefore are desirous of waving the matter at present. For my own, I am very desirous that the business should be put in train at least. If successful, so much the better; but at any rate, it will give an alarm on the other side of the channel. If either of these rival nations sets the example, the other will soon follow; and although it is not very clear, that the actions and doings of the Assemblée Nationale in general will long endure, yet whatever they grant to us in this particular business, those who come after them will be fearful of retracting. Under these impressions, for a long time past, I have been endeavoring to smooth the way towards our object, and I believe in the success.

I am, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

Paris, January 22d, 1790.

Dear Sir:

In another letter of this date, I have mentioned a part of yesterday's conversation with the Comte de Montmorin. That part of it which I am now to communicate, is for yourself alone. As Monsieur de Lafayette had asked me, some days ago, who should be sent to replace the Comte de Moustiers, and upon my answering with great indifference, that it might be whom he pleased, had asked my opinion of Colonel Terrant, I told the Count de Montmorin this circumstance; to which he replied, that he had communicated his intention to Monseur de Lafayette this sometime since, in consequence of the intimacy which had sprung up between them. I asked him if he would express my sentiments to the Minister, giving him the pleasure of telling him that he should consider it as a very great kindness, and particularly if through the same channel he could learn whether that appointment would be agreeable to you. This is, you know, a compliment which the most respectable courts on this side of the Atlantic usually do. It is, in the present case, all the more important, because Monseur de Montmorin is sincerely desirous of cultivating a good understanding with the United States.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

It is not impossible that he may retreat from his present office; but he will, I think, in that case, be appointed governor to the children of France, and his opinions, while about the court, will have weight, for many reasons; amongst others, because he performs them. But I have not the least doubt that he will be as wise as he is kind, and will never do the least injury by his absence. Our friend Lafayette burns with desire to be at the head of an army in Flanders, and drive the Stadtholder into a ditch. He acts now a splendid but dangerous part. Unluckily he has given in to measures, as to the constitution, which he does not heartily approve, and he heartily approves many things which experience will demonstrate to be injurious. While all is in confusion here, the revolt of Austrian Paltzers, and the troubles existing in Britain, in the agency of Prussia, give every reason to suppose that the King of Sweden will be vigilously supported; so that provided the Turk has but a sufficient share of obstinacy to bear a little more beating, the scale, according to human probabilities, must turn against Austria and Prussia, who are the allies of France. Great Britain is, as yet, no otherwise more disposed than is an eventual party; and, according to the best opinion which my judgment can form, upon the information I have obtained, to retain the power of that country, can, by the words of Mr. Addison, "rise in the whirlwind and direct the storm." A person, however, on whose knowledge I have some reliance, assures me that Mr. Pitt, engaged in a conflict of very critical consequence, will do them what he is absolutely forced into, and I am inclined to believe that there is some truth in that assertion.

Accept, I pray, the assurances of that sincere esteem with which I am yours, &c.

GOVERNEUR MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

DEAR SIR:

It gave me very sincere pleasure to learn from you the good tidings which you communicate respecting our new Government. I know that you are not liable to the dupery of false hopes and groundless expectations; and I have frequently heard people in this country express their wish to have a government which may be calculated, sensible appeal to the interest, feelings, and common sense of our countrymen, that it must, by its own intrinsic weight, bear down all opposition. I have, from time to time, received very great pleasure at the development of its principles by the Legislature, which, in my opinion, does them the greatest honor. They have far, very far, exceeded the views of the most sanguine when the project was first put forth to the country, and I am more than ever content to carry out to my wishes.

I have not unfrequently brought myself to share in the pleasure you must feel, in the consciousness of your own useful agency. Certainly it is the sublimest sentiment of the human heart, to know that we make others happy and more especially those whom we love. How many of us, I am sorry to say, know, that no person but yourselves, and the American people, who in America, is known by the name of pettifogging lawyers; together with a host of curates, and many of those persons who, in all revolutions, stand to the standard of change, because they are not well.

This last party is in close alliance with the populace here, and derives, from that circumstance, very great authority. They have already unhinged every thing, and, according to custom on such occasions, the torrent rushes on irresistible, until it shall have wasted itself. The Aristocrats are without a leader, and without any plan or system as yet, but really to throw themselves into the arms of any one who shall offer. The middle party, who mean well, have an idea of government by the people, and, as I believe, sometimes publish it in the newspapers; but as it happens, somewhat unfortunately, that the men who live in the world are very different from those who dwell in the heads of philosophers, it is not to be wondered at, if the systems taken out of books are fit for nothing but to be put into books again.

I am, dear sir, with much affection,

Gouverneur Morris.

PARIS, January 24, 1790.

very pathetic oration, and the object was to show that no penalties are the legal compensations for injuries and crimes; the man who is hanged, having by that event paid his debt to the society, ought not to be held in dishonest; and, in like manner, by paying the compounds in years that were served on the life, the officer, he said, was again good company, as if nothing had happened. You smile; but observe the extreme to which the matter was carried the other way. Dishonoring thousands for the guilt of one, has so shocked the public sentiment, as to render this extreme fashionable. The oration was very fine, very sentients, and a coronation of applause from the audience.

When this was pretty well over, I told him that his speech was extremely eloquent, but that his principles were not very solid. Universal surprise! A very few remarks changed the face of things; the position was universally condemned, and he left the room. I need not add that, as yet, it has not received much observation; but sometimes an orator gets up in the midst of another deliberation, makes a fine discourse, and closes with a good snug resolution, which is carried with a huzza. Thus, in considering a plan for a national bank, proposed by M. Necker, one of them took it into his head to move that everything must be put into such a shape which was agreed to at once, and the honorable mover laid his hand upon the table, after which the business went on again.

It is very difficult to guess whereabouts the fleet will settle, when it flies so wild; but, as far as it is possible to guess at present, this (the) kingdom will cast into a counter of little democracies, laid out, not according to the rivers, nor south and north, nor by the nature of the soil, but according to the habitations and the power, and, according to the people, which had anciently different laws, called coutumes, as the chippings and parings of several different provinces must fall together within some of the new divisions, I think such fermenting matter must give them a kind of political choli.

Their Assemblee Nationale will be something like the Old Congress, and the Dutch Council of Magistrates. As yet they have been busily engaged in pillaging the present occupant of his authority; how much they will leave him, will depend upon the chapter of accidents. I believe it will be very little; but, little or much, the perspective of such a King, and such an Assemble, brings to my mind the saying which Shakespeare has put into the mouth of Hamlet, that... I suppose the third is up. World, thou hast but a pair of chops, and throw between them all the food thou may'st, they needs must grind each other.

At present the people are fully determined to support the Assemblee; and, although there are some discontent, I don't doubt they will very soon change the style of opposition. Indeed, it would be wonderful if there should be for: hitherto an extension of privileges, and a remission of taxes to the lower class, have marked every stage of their progress; besides, the love of novelty is a great sweetener in revolutions.

But the time will come when this novelty will be over, and all its charms gone; in lieu of the taxes, the old tax for the power, the inconsiderate, the interested, the envious, the cupidity, which will be ruinous to the state, or, in urging the collection of taxes, displace their constituents. In all probability there will be a little bit of both. Hence must arise bickerings and heartburnings among the different districts, and a great lamentation for the departure of the public funds. As they will fall short of calculation in point of time, if not in amount, (and that is the same thing where revenue is concerned) it will follow, that either the interest of the public debt will not be regularly paid, or that the various departments will be starved; probably a little of both. Hence will result a loss of public credit, and, therewith, much injury to commerce and manufactures, operating a further decrease in the means of revenue, and much disturbance of the exterior operations of the kingdom.

At this moment the discontented spirits will find congenial matter in abundance to work upon; and, from that period, all the future is involved in the mist of conjecture. If the reigning prince were not the small beer character that he is, there can be but little doubt that, watching events, and considering his present circumstances, to what extent, situated as he is, eats, and drinks, and sleeps well, and laughs, and is as merry a grin as lives? The idea that they will give him some money, which he can economize, and that he will have no trouble in governing, contents him entirely. Poor man! he little thinks how onestable is his situation in that respect! the people will love what they possess, but they must be supported by a belief of good natured pity which one feels for a led captive. There is, besides, no possibility of serving him: for, at the slightest show of opposition, he gives up every thing, and every person. As to his ministers, the Comte de Montmorini has more understanding than people general imagine, and he means well, very well. But he means it feebly. He is a good man, one who would make an excellent peace minister, in quiet times, but he wants the vigor of mind needed for great occasions. The Comte de la Luzerne is an indolent, pleasant companion, a man of honor, and as obstinate as you please; but he has somewhat of the creed of General Gates, that the world does a great part of its own business, and that the minister is but a... No man of affairs, who is the oneness of use, and the exactness of much upon the run of the dice. The Comte de St. Priest is the only man among them who has what they call caracter, which answers to our idea of firmness, joined to some activity. But a person who knows him pretty well, (which I do not) assures me, that he is mercenary and false but hopeless; a man, who may, however may come, who will never pay his debt, and who has been told by his master, the Marquis de Lator-Dupin, the Minister of War, whom I am also unacquainted with, is said to be no great things, in any respect.

M. Necker was frightened by the Enrages into the acceptance of him, instead of the Marquis de Montesquieu, who has a considerable share of talents, and a great deal of method. Montesquieu is, of course, at present the enemy of M. Necker, having been his friend.

As to M. Necker, he is one of those people who has obtained a much greater reputation than he had any right to. His enemies say that, as a banker, he acquired his fortune by means which, to say the least, were indefecitile, and they mention instances. But in this country every thing is so much exaggerated, that nothing is more useful than a little skepticism. M. Necker, in his public administration, has always been honest and disinterested; which proves well, I think, for his former private conduct; or else it proves that he has more vanity than culpability. He is that as it may, an unspotted integrity as minister, and serving, at his own expense, in an office which others seek for the purpose of enriching themselves, have acquired for him and these officers much respect, that his writings on finance, which is a sort of sensibility, which makes the fortune of modern romances, and which is exactly suited to this lively nation, who love to read but hate to think. Hence his reputation. He is a man of genius, and his will, which is a very different thing, be able to say that he has talents, or rather, if his reputation has been established as a writer, he has taught him to make tight bargains, and put himself upon his guard against projects. But though he understands man as a consummate creature, he does not understand mankind; a defect which is remediable. He is utterly ignorant of politics, by which I mean politics in the great sense, or that sublime science which embraces for its object the happiness of mankind. Consequently he neither knows what constitution to form, nor how to obtain the consent of others to such as he wishes. From the moment of convening the States General, he has been afflicted on the wide ocean of accidents.

But what is most extraordinary is, that, M. Necker is a very poor financier. This, I know, will sound like heresy in the eyes of the world. People, but it is true. The plans he has proposed are feeble and inept. Hitherto, he has been supported by borrowing from the Caisse d'Escompte, which, (being by means of what they call here an arrêt de circulation) has lent him a sum in their paper exceeding the totality of their capital, by about 20,000,000 crowns. To that fund is assigned to the extraordinary expenses of a war, at the end of which was a tax upon every member of the community of a fourth of his revenue, and this he declared to be needful for saving the State. His enemies adopted it, (declaring, what is very true, that it is a wretched, impracticable measure) in the hope that he and his scheme would fail together. This assembly, this patriotic band, took in the lump that would have destroyed and laddened the people and, as, they said but, in fact, because they would not risk the unpopular a tax.

The plan thus adopted, M. Necker, to escape the snare which he had nearly got taken in. altered his tax into what they call the patriotic contribution. By this, every man is to declare, if he pleases, at what he pays to estimate his annual income, and to pay one-fourth of it in three years. You will easily suppose that this fund was unprodu-tive; and, notwithstanding the imminent danger of the State, we are as yet without any aid from the contribution patriote.

His next scheme was that of a national bank, or at least an extension of the Caisse d'Escompte. It has been variously modelled since, and many capital objections removed; but at last it is good for nothing, and so it will turn out. At present it is just beginning. By way of giving some base to the present operation, it is proposed and determined to sell about ten or twelve millions sterling of the crown and other lands, both of which an extension of the Caisse d'Escompte are included. They have appointed a treasurer to receive what they will sell for hereafter, and they issue a kind of order upon this treasurer, which is to be called an assignat, and is to be paid, (out of these sales) one, two, and three years hence. They sell them by annual payments of one, two, and three per cent upon the sum, and the proceeds to go into the Caisse d'Escompte, and they are, at the same time, to pay some of the more pressing debts with the same assignats.

Now this plan must fail as follows: First, there will be some doubt about the title to these lands, at least till the revolution is completed. Secondly, the representative of the land must always (for a reason which will presently appear) sell for the account of a representative of money, and therefore, until the Caisse d'Escompte has reduced the five per cents are above par, these assignats bearing five per cent, must be below par. Money, therefore, cannot be raised upon them but at a considerable discount. Thirdly, the lands to be disposed of must sell a great deal below their value, for there is not money to buy them in this country; and the reason is, that they never obtained money on loan at the legal interest, but always upon a premium and at a rate of interest (as from the employers of commerce and manufactures) and as the revolution has greatly lessened the mass of money, the effect of the scarcity must be greater.

Moreover, there is a solecism in the plan, which escapes most of them, and which is, nevertheless, very palpable. The value of lands in Europe is, you know, estimated by the income. To dispose of public lands is to sell public revenue; and, therefore, taking the legal interest at five per cent, lands renting for 100 livres ought to sell for 2,000, but they expect that these lands will sell for 3,000, and that, thereby, not only public credit will be restored, but a great saving will be prevalued as the 3,000 will redeem an interest of 190. It is, however, an indisputable fact, that public credit being established, the stocks are worth more than land of equal income, and for three reasons: first, that there is no trouble whatever in the management; secondly, there is no danger of bad crops and taxes; and thirdly, they can be disposed of at a great discount. In 1794, if the former wants money, and the public creditors refuse it, therefore, the public credit will be restored, and there be a surplus of about ten millions to be invested, and if such large sales (contrary to custom) should not, from the amount, affect the price, still the lands must go cheaper than the stocks, and consequently, the interest bought will be smaller than the amount sold.

Having thus given you a very rude sketch of the men and the measures of the country, I see and feel that it is time to conclude. I sincerely wish I could say that there are able men at hand to take the helm, whom the present pilots abandon the ship. But I have great apprehensions as to those who may succeed. The present set must without the course of the year, and most of them would be glad to get fairly out of the scrape at present. The country is alike dangerous to stay or to go, and they must patiently wait the breath of the Assemblee, and follow as it blows. The new order of things cannot endure. I hope it may be mended, but fear it may be changed. All Europe, just now, is like a mine ready to explode; and if this winter does not produce peace, next summer will behold a wider extension of the war.

To George Washington, President of the United States.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

DEAR SIR:

The country I now inhabit, on which so many other countries depend, having sunk to absolute nothingness, has deranged the general state of things in every quarter; and what complicates the scene in no small degree, is a great uncertainty with regard to the future state of the empire, because a new system, calculated on the蹒s state of France, would be as effectually deranged by her recovery, as that was which leaned upon her greatness heretofore, and fell in her fall. The removals, which occurred at a greater distance from his influence, had provided for themself; but the calamity had fallen on his head, and he had been, as it were, pushed into the business of providing for what he regarded as an evil." Having once heard me speak of the business as it was, in a former letter my expectation, that a new system would arise there. In effect, a treaty concluded between what may be called the Baltic Powers, will have considerable influence hereafter upon the general system. When you recollect that they are exclusively the manufacturers of naval stores in this hemisphere, your comprehensive mind will see, that, as the great power in the Baltic, America may be its vassal, and therefore, the resources of the American commerce are indispens-able. This same Baltic is also a granary for southern Europe. Hence a new source of important reflection. I think that occasions will ere long present themselves, in which America may be essentially concerned. But to come nearer home, the causes of the present disorder in France, are this: The Flanders, will be there in the command of fifty thousand men, besides the resource which every sovereign derives from an unsuccessful revolt. The King of Prussia is no longer at the head of an effective Germanic league. The fear of Austria and her connexions has, for evident reasons, subsided, and the Baron Hertzberg, rather a pantain than a politician, but ill fills that great void which was left by the death of Frederick. In fact, Prussia seems to be just that country in shape, extent, fertility, population, connection, and relation, which one would have chosen to show what great genius can do with incompetent materials, and what a dream is human greatness.

The Emperor is in possession of proofs that the spirit of revolt through all his dominions was fostered by that court, and would have broken out in every quarter at the instant of a war. Hence the sudden pacification at Reichenbach, of which the Prussian was the dupe, though he dictated terms. You will readily suppose that Leo-pold, neither as man nor a statesman, can look on such conduct "in the calm light of mild philosophy." Here-on, of course to dominion, which his rival is possessed of, a long opposition of juridical interests, more dangerous than that cap he has just been forced to drink, must lead him to seek, and to seize the moment of vengeance. Forgiv-ness is not a family feature in the house of Lorraine, neither is it the school of Christian meekness. On the other hand, the alliance between him and the late sovereign of this country, is rent to tatters. Not formally cancelled, it is effectually annulled; and it is but a wish that the Emperor, and destitute a connection, which seems necessary to the wisest that could have been formed.

The great power of this monarchy has been for centuries an insurmountable barrier to imperial ambition. Leo-pold, having, however, in every campaign, established himself within the boundaries of France, secured to them by numerous treaties, and guaranteed by the Germanic corps, but lately violated by the National Assembly, wish the whole empire to insist on restitution, and in case of refusal to engage in a war, whose object would be the recovery of Alsace and Lorraine. Many of the discontented nobles and publicists, who are so very numerous in the more democratic classes of the empire, have resolved to engage in a war. So far a pretext, such plausible reasons, both public and private, joined to a great political interest, and personal territorial claims, might determine an enterprising prince. But he is cautious trusting more to art than force. He sees that condition, and self-interest only yet perfectly confirmed. He has the more the example of a predecessor, whose incessant toils brought only an incursion of labourious care; whose anxieties wore away the web of his existence; and whose mighty projects were but the "baseless fabric of a vision." The Germanic body itself is distracted by the duty of supporting its members and a dread of destroying the check upon its chief. So the unhappy country, bewildered in the pursuit of metaphysical whimsies, presents to our moral view a mighty ruin. Like the remains of ancient magnificence, we admire the architecture of the temple, while we detest the false god to whom it was dedicated. Daws and ravens, and the birds of night, now build their nests in its niches.
FRANCE.

The sovereign, humbled to the level of a beggar's pity, without resources, without authority, without a friend. The Assembly is but once a master and a slave, new in power, wild in theory, raw in practice, though incapable of exercising any, and has taken from this fierce, ferocious people, every restraint of religion and of respect. Sole executors of the law, and therefore supreme judges of its propriety, each district measures out its obedience by its wishes, and the great into wits of the multitude, split up into fractional morsels, depend on momentary impulse, and can neither be trusted nor controlled. Such a state of things cannot last.

But how will it end? Here conjecture may wander through unbounded space. What sum of misery may be requisite to change popular will, calculation cannot determine. What circumstances may arise, in the order of Divine providence, to cast vision dim to that will, our sharpest feelings may be found to seize those circumstances, to influence that will, and, above all, to moderate the power which it must contest, we are equaly ignorant of. One thing only seems to be tolerably ascertained, that the glorious opportunity is lost, and (for this time at least) the revolution has failed. In the consequences of it we may, however, find some foundation of future prosperity. Such are, 1. The abolition of those different rights and privileges, which kept the provinces asunder, occasioning thereby a variety of taxation, increasing the expenses of collection, impeding the useful communication of commerce, and destroying that unity in the system of distributive justice, which is one requisite to social happiness. 2. The abolition of feudal tyranny, by which the tenure of real property is simplified, the value reduced to money, rent more clearly ascertained, and the estimation which depended on foreign titles, (even from the most vicious taste, or sullen pride, is destroyed. 3. The extension of the circle of commerce to those vast possessions held by the clergy in mortmain, which, conferring great wealth as the wages of idleness, damped the ardor of enterprise, and impoverished the real industry, which there was need of increasing. 4. The establishment of a system of venal jurisprudence, which, arrogating a kind of legislative veto, had established the pride and privileges of the few on the misery and degradation of the general mass. 5. Above all, the promulgation and extension of those principles of liberty, which will, I hope, remain to cheer the heart, and cherish a nobleness of soul, when the metaphysical froth and vapor shall have been blown away. The awe of that spirit which has been thus raised, will, I trust, excite in those who may hereafter possess authority, a proper moderation in its exercise, and induce them to give to this people a real constitution of government, fitted to the natural, moral, social, and political state of their country.

How, and when, these events may be brought about, I know not. But I think, from the chaos of opinion, and the conflict of its jarring elements, a new order will at length arise, which, though in some degree the child of chance, may be not less productive of human happiness, than the forethought provisions of human speculation.

In the beginning of this year, I mentioned the conviction that, during the course of it, the then ministry would wear out. This has been literally verified, and M. de Montmorin is the only remaining shred of the old garment. As to the present temporary set, I shall say nothing just now, reserving to a better opportunity some sentiments on those who, in their short observation, the time may, in a greater or smaller degree, be forced upon your attention. I must, however, observe, that my letters present very different prospects from those which may reach you through other channels. You, who know mankind thoroughly, will be able to form a solid opinion; and, however that may vary from mine, I shall still rejoice if, even by the display of false ideas, I shall have cast any additional light upon those which are true.

I am, always, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

WASHINGTON, December 1, 1790.

DEAR SIR:

I had the honor to address you a letter on the 23d of last month, in the close of which I mentioned the intention of saying, at a future period, some few words of the people who are now on the stage. To begin, then, with our friend Lafayette, who has hitherto acted a splendid part. The King obays, but detests him. He obeys because he fears. Whoever possesses the royal person, may do what pleases with the royal character and authority. Hence it happens that the ministers are of Lafayette's appointment. A short description of their use was given the other day by Mirabeau: "We make ministers," said he, "as we used formerly to send servants to keep our boxes at the play house." I gave you the explanation of this jest while I was in London. Lafayette thinks that these his cabins are reserved for the King, and will not be taken.

You know Duportail, the Minister of War. He is said to be violent in favor of the revolution. It is more than a year since I have seen him, excepting a short visit of congratulation the other day. My judgment, therefore, should be a little weight; but I believe he is too much the friend of liberty to approve of the constitution. For the war minister, you have already discovered that simplicity of understanding which carries a man as far as his abilities will reach. He may, perhaps, remember his creator in his ministerial youth, in order that his days may be long in the land of office; but I venture to predict that his dutious observance will not endure one half of those of the greatest real ministers. I do not mention him to you, about a year ago, the intention to appoint him; but at that time I endeavored to take his place. The King has chosen Lafayette. They say he is a good kind of man, which is saying very little. The Keeper of the Seals, Monsieur Dupertutere, was a lawyer of eminence, thrown up into office by the circumstances of the moment. He is said to possess both abilities and finances in Amerique Delectari, the Minister of Finances, is rather more than below mediocrity, and possesses that kind of civil ascent which never compromises the possessor, though it seldom travels in company with greatness.

We find not a man among them fitted for the great tasks in which they are engaged, and greater tasks are perhaps impending. I have no proofs, but I have a well-founded opinion, that the leaders of the party were valiant those of the other fear, and both expect, viz. the interference of foreign Powers. One previous step would be to carry off, if possible, the King and Queen. The latter, at least: for there is every reason to apprehend for their safety, should visiting England, that they would be adopted while they are gone.

For my own part I do not believe in any such interference, neither do I think that the opposers of the Assembly have sufficient energy of character to make a civil war. Their attempts, if any, will, I imagine, be feeble, and consequently ruinous to themselves. If, indeed, they had a considerable part of the army, commanded by the Prince of Conti, or by some other person, and if they could imagine themselves destined to adopt such good things as the Assembly have done, and rejecting the evil, then, indeed, there would be different grounds of expectation. But I consider this rather as the visionary hope of a few, than as the fixed plan of persons who can carry it into execution. I am, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

WASHINGTON, March 9th, 1791.

DEAR SIR:

I am to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 17th of December, which reached me several days ago, but no good intelligence. The assembly itself to carry a revenue. The idea you formed of the British cabinet was, I am persuaded, perfectly just. This Government has lately taken some steps which cannot but be advantageous to their interests, for I am persuaded that the late decree laying a heavy duty on oil, giving a great preference of duty on tobacco imported in French ships, and declaring that none but those built in France shall be reputed French bottoms, will excite much ill humor in America. Those who rule here seem to think that, because the old Government was sometimes wrong, every thing contrary to what they did must be right; like Jack in the Tale of the Tub, who tore his coat to pieces and then, finding that the skin of his back was much kinder, went on. Or, like the old Congress, in its young days, which rejected the offer of valuable contracts, and employed a host of commissaries and quarter-masters, because Great Britain dealt with contractors.

In the debate on this subject, one of the Lamèdas gave it as his opinion that America was not in a situation to be the judge of such a question. This, which was the result of some hints in the close of the observations I sent to M. de Montmorin, and of which a copy has been transmitted to Mr. Jefferson. I hope that the Congress will not act precipitately in consequence of these decrees, for I believe that proper representations in a proper moment will produce a change; and really, in the present effervescence, very few men can come to a conclusion without some error.

There still continue to be three parties here. The Enrégis, long since known by the name of Jacobins, have lost much in the public opinion, so that they are less powerful in the Assembly than they were; but their committees of correspondence are as numerous as ever, and every day new persons are added to the list.

The military, who, as such, look to the sovereign, are somewhat less factional than they were, but they are rather a mob than an army, and must, I think, fall either to the aristocratic or Jacobin side of the question.

The middle men are in a whimsical situation. In the Senate they follow the Jacobin counsels, rather than appear connected with the other party. The same principle of shame-facedness operates on great occasions out of doors; but as the aristocrats have been forced down by a torrent of eloquence, they are as much alarmed at the inroads of the people. On the other hand, the numerous returns, some of them unnecessary, and all either hasty, precipitate, or extreme, have thrown into the aristocratic party a great number of discontented. The military, who, as such, look to the sovereign, are somewhat less factional than they were, but they are rather a mob than an army, and must, I think, fall either to the aristocratic or Jacobin side of the question.

In the midst, however, of all these confusions, what with confiscating the church property, selling the domains, curtailing pensions, and destroying offices, but especially by that great liquidator of public debts, a paper currency, this nation is working its way to a new state of active energy, which will, I think, be displayed as soon as a vigorous (government makes itself acknowledged. The intervening confusions will probably call forth men of talents to form such Government, and to exert its powers.

In a letter I had the honor to write on the 29th of November, I mentioned a treaty made between the Baltic Powers, and whether I did it from information or conjecture, but it was in my mind and still continues there. While in England, waiting at Whitehall for the Duke of Leeds, who was accidentally prevented from keeping my appointment, I had a long conversation with Mr. Burgess, who seemed desirous of convincing me that he was an efficient man in the office of foreign affairs. I asked him whether such treaty existed, insinuating that he must certainly be informed of every movement in that, as in every other quarter. He assured me positively that it did not; but that assurance did not alter my opinion. Indeed the object of my question was to discover whether they were at all upon terms with Sweden, and from what afterwards passed, I am persuaded that they are not. I must add, that my interview with him had been answered in the same way, but yet I hope that such a treaty exists. He spoke good of all of the convention with Spain, and I declared freely my opinion, which being favorable to the administration, I drew him from in support of it a history of the negotiation. It ended (as he said) in this remarkable manner: The Count de Florida Blanca, upon hearing of the revolt of the French marine, told the British ministers that he had given his consent to the revolt, and that he would never sign the treaty, unless I wished to be a witness of it, and I should be present before I could be a witness of it, and I should be present.

I am delighted with the account you give me of our public affairs. There can be no doubt that a publication of the census, and a clear state of our finances, will impress a sense of our importance on the statesmen of Europe. We are now getting forward in the right way, not by little skimming advantages of political manoeuvres, but in a solid column of well founded and active measures; like Fotherbury's screw, which you doubtless remember, by every turn we shall now gain and hold what we get. It is no evil that you should have a little of the old leaven. I have always considered an opposition in free governments as a kind of outward conscience, which prevents the administration from doing many things through inadvertence which they might repot of. By these means both men and measures are sifted, and the parties are prevented from being able to say about a matter, as of being right, confused and contradictory, by the good opinion of society. I expect, and am, indeed, certain, that this good opinion will live with you during life, and follow weeping to your grave. I know you will continue to deserve it, and I hope you may long live to vex your enemies by serving your country. I am, &c.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to enclose a letter, and sundry papers relating to it, from Messieurs Siweizer, Jeanners, & Co. I trust you will forward these gentlemen to Mr. Short, telling them that it is most fitting in many respects that they should apply to him.

As it is possible, however, that this business may come before you, I think it a duty to convey some observations which occur to me, and which may not perhaps strike you, because matters of that sort have not, I believe, much occupied your attention. Previous thereto I beg leave, however, to give you a history of my acquaintance with it. In a letter to Colonel Hamilton, of the 31st of January, 1790, I mentioned what had passed between M. Necker and me respecting the debt due by the United States to France, and I hinted the means of turning to useful account a very large sum. This public agency has been long sought for, and various persons have slighted the advantage of it. The British ministers, by which I mean the Jacobins, and although I by no means consider that in the light of an appointment to office, yet, from motives of delicacy, I determined to extricate myself from the affairs of the debt, as speedily as I could with propriety. Various applications were made to me from different quarters, to which I replied evasively; but on my arrival here, I found myself thrown into circumstances which made it appear to me necessary to hold any share in the speculation. I conversed with Mr. Short on the same subject, and communicated to him confidentially my reasons for declining an interest, as well as my opinion respecting the use which might be derived from such negotiation.

Two or three days after, the President of the Committee of Finance, happening to meet me at the Convent de Montmorin's, mentioned some proposals then before them, which to the best of my remembrance were extravagant. I declined giving an opinion without previously seeing and considering the terms, upon which he and M. de Montmorin agreed, and I told him that no one could know what the joint effect of any single clause might be. I observed that he had not submitted them to my examination. Here the thing dropped, and the enclosed papers show the reason why: for it appears from them that a bargain was made shortly after by the Contrôleur Général with a different company. Mr. Short mentioned this to me on his return letter in the end of March, telling me that the parties concerned were, as he was informed in the letter of the original of the contract, nor capital. I of course agreed with him in opinion, that, if so, it was not worth while to listen to them.

A few days after one of them called on me, and after giving a history of the affair, begged me to make use of my influence in the debt. I told him at once that it was ridiculous to ask a concession of such heights on the part of our debt. That it was quite as convenient to owe France as to owe the subjects of France; and further, that before any treaty was offered, persons of credit and capital should appear. As soon as I made this last observation, he drew out the letter of the Comptroller General, and showed me the clause of it, replied, that, after what was
First, it is questionable whether our reputation may not be a little affected: for you will recollect that about one-third of our debt to France arose from a loan made on our account in Holland of five millions of florins, for which the King paid us here ten millions of livres, without any deduction for charges of any sort. The nation is now obliged to pay this five millions in Holland, and for us to borrow that amount there, and then squeeze them into an exchange, which distresses both their commerce and finances, looks hard. There was a good deal of murmuring about it at the time; some consolation might be drawn out of it, but at present the nations are surprised at so much patriotism, by way of showing his zeal, should make a violent attack in the Assembly when the next payment is made. There are many of these patriots, who, if they can incite ministers and distress those of different sects, punish them with a jettison, are a jot for the advantage of individuals. But supposing this not to happen, it is not possible for a nation to make the advantage which individuals do in such things, because they must employ individuals, each of whom will be too apt to look a little to his own advantage. There is a difference also between the gain made upon parts, and that which would arise on the whole; for even if we could borrow all at once so large a sum at a low price, and afterwards negotiated in Europe. Neither is that all: for, if we can borrow at five per cent, and buy up our six per cent, debt at par, we gain at once by that operation one fifth of the interest, or twenty per cent, which, besides all the other good consequences, is much more than we ever shall get by any management of our debts on this side of the Water.

I have given you, my dear sir, these hints in abridgment, because my time will not admit of dilating them; attribute them, I pray you, to the true causes, and believe me always very sincerely yours,

GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

General Washington to Governor Morris.

Philadelphia, July 28th, 1791.

DEAR SIR:
The communications in your several letters, relative to the state of affairs in Europe, are very gratefully received. I am much embarrassed to them, and have been obliged to take mine eyes off the many public duties, which are at all times sufficiently numerous, being now much accumulated by an absence of more than three months from the seat of Government, make the present a very busy moment for me.

The change of systems, which have so long prevailed in Europe, will, undoubtedly, affect us in a degree proportioned to our political or commercial connections; but the severe crisis of war, to which we are too far lose sight of our own interest and happiness as to become, necessarily, a party in their political disputes. Our local situation enables us to maintain that state, with respect to them, which otherwise could not, perhaps, be preserved by human wisdom. The present moment seems pregnant with great events; but, as you observe, it is beyond the ken of mortal foresight to determine what will be the result of those changes, which are either making, or contemplated, in the general system of Europe. Although as fellow men we sincerely lament the disorders, oppressions, and incertitude, which frequently attend national events, and which our European brethren must feel, yet we cannot help rejoicing in favor of this important event. We cannot but feel that it will be favorable to this country, I have no doubt for under the former system we were seen either in the distresses of war, or viewed after the peace in a most unfavorable light through the medium of our distracted state. In neither point could we appear of much consequence among nations. And should affairs continue in Europe in the same state there is much probability of finding impressions respecting us were received, it would not be an easy matter to remove the prejudices imbibed against us. A change of system will open a new view of things, and we shall then burst upon them, as it were, with redoubled advantages.

Under the present state of affairs, form connexions, other than we now have, with any European Powers, much must be considered in effecting them, on the score of our increasing importance as a nation and at the same time, should a treaty be formed with a nation, whose circumstances may not at this moment be very bright, much delicacy would be necessary in order to show that no undue advantages were taken on that account: for unless the last are mutually beneficial to the parties, it is vain to hope for a conclusion of such a nature.

In my late tour through the Southern States, I experienced great satisfaction in seeing the good effects of the General Government in that part of the United States. The people at large have felt the security which it gives, and the equal justice with which it administers to them. The farmer, the merchant, and the mechanic, have seen their several interests attended to, and from thence they unite in placing a confidence in their representatives, as well as in those in whose hands the execution of the laws is placed. Industry has there taken place of idleness, and economy of dissipation. Two or three years of good crops, and a ready market for the produce of their lands, have put every one in good humor and in some instances they even impute to the Government what is due only to the goodness of Providence.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Philadelphia, July 28th, 1791.
The establishment of public credit is an immense point gained in our national concerns. This, I believe, exceeds the expectation of the most sanguine among us. And a late instance, unparalleled in this country, has been given of the confidence reposed in our measures, by the readiness with which the subscriptions to the Bank of the United States have been raised. In two days, during a mere book-week, the subscription for the whole of the capital of five hundred millions of dollars, for the maximum of the share, was taken up, and four thousand more applied for than were allowed by the institution; besides a number of subscriptions which were coming on. This circumstance was not only pleasing, as it related to the confidence in Government, but as it exhibited an unexpected proof of the true opinion of the public credit, relative to the number of the inhabitants, which would probably be found in the United States on enumeration, was too large. The estimate was then founded on the ideas held out by the gentlemen in Congress of the population of the several states, each of whom, (as was very natural) looking through a magnifying glass, saw in the smallest object the object which he himself had seen. The most rash of these figures has been, as there can be no doubt that the operations of the census have already been made from several of the States, and a tolerably just estimate has been now formed in others; by which it appears that we shall hardly reach four millions; but this you are to take along with it, that the real number will greatly exceed the official return; because, from religious scruples, some would not give in their lists, from the opinion held of the census and of the enumerator, others would; and, from the indulgence of the mass, and want of activity in many of the deputy enumerators, numbers are omitted. The authenticated number will, however, be far greater. I believe, than has ever been allowed in Europe; and will have no small influence in enabling them to form a more just opinion of our present growing importance, than has yet been entertained.

This letter goes with one from the Secretary of State, to which I must refer you for what respects their paper; and I shall only add to it the repeated assurances of regard and affection, with which I am, dear sir, your obedient and obliged, composed, and as they will have learnt that fear can produce what reason could not, I do expect that, at length, this Government must come into such some measure, and thereby not only the stumbling block will be taken out of the way to a useful treaty between France and the United States, but, at the same time, and by the same means, the road will be opened for solid connexion with Great Britain.

In all cases, we have the consultation, that, as the Powers of Europe, by their excluding principles, deprive of the needful vent for our produce, which becomes daily more and more abundant, we shall, from the cheapness of living, and the want of certain requisites, must be great and rapid progress. This alone is wanting to complete our independence. We shall then be, as it were, a world by ourselves, and, far from the jars and wars of Europe, their various revolutions will serve merely to instruct and amuse—like the roaring of a tempestuous sea, which, at a certain distance, becomes a pleasing sound.

Dear Sir: You may be well and happy is the sincere wish of yours, &c.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

FRANCE.

PARIS, December 27, 1791.

Dear Sir: Your favor of the 18th of September reached me a few days ago. As to the state of things here, I would convey to you, as fully as propriety will admit, but I know not yet by what opportunity this letter will go, and the post office was never more abused under the last despotisms than it is at present, notwithstanding the desertion of the authorities. Every letter I receive bears evident marks of patriotic curiosity. This anxious spirit of pettifogging villany proves the fear of those who make use of it; and truly they have reason to fear, for every day proves more clearly that their new constitution is good for nothing.

These are my feelings, and judges were prepared, endeavor, now that it is too late, to lay the blame on others by way of excusing themselves; but the truth is, that, instead of seeking the public good by doing what was right, each sought his own advantage by flattering the public opinion. They dare not now propose the amendments which they perceive and acknowledge to be indispensable. They have, besides, no confidence in each other; and every one feels a reason against it, and meets moreover with daily proofs that their copartniers are not better than himself.

The Assembly (as you know such bodies will naturally suppose) commits every day new follies, and if this unhappy country is not plunged anew into the horrid abyss, it is not by the want of a master stroke to that effect. They have resolved to attack their neighbors, unless they dissipate the assemblies of French emigrants who have taken refuge in their dominions. These neighbors are members of the German empire, and France threatens to carry into their country, not fire and sword, but la libertie. Now, as this last word does not, in the acceptance of German courts, mean so much liberty as insurrection, you will see that the pretext is given for hostilities without violating the law of nations.

Add to this, that three French armies of fifty thousand men each are ordered to assemble on the frontiers. One under the command of Moreau, the flander; one under our friend Lafayette, in Lorraine, so as to pene-

D E C E M B E R 31.

A courier arrived last night with despatches, which are to be communicated to the Assembly this morning. The Emperor informs the King that he has given orders to General Beuler, who commands in the Low Countries, to protect the electorate of Treves with all his forces. I did not mention, as I ought to have done, that the courts of Berlin and Vienna have concluded a treaty for the protection of the German Empire, and maintenance of its rights. This explained the intrigues of France, and the determination of the Diet respecting the claims of those princes who have certain feudal rights preserved to them by the treaty of Westphalia in Alsace and Lorraine, if the King. The King that the dominion of France over those provinces is conceded by that treaty. The Dutch Government has proposed a treaty with the Emperor, as sovereign of the Low Countries, for mutual aid and protection, in case of any attack on their territories, which was accepted in principle.

All this is explained by the intrigues of France to excite revolt in Holland and Flanders; and the completion of such a treaty will place the Emperor at ease, should he be operative against this country next spring.

I am, &c.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

GOUVERNOR MORRIS.
The chiefs of the jacobins were violent, for two reasons: First, that the quatre-vingt-neufs would not join withoutuberance heart and when forced to take head alone, they were obliged to use the populace; and therefore to sacrifice to the populace: Secondly, that the more the desire were much greater, though remote, than those of the other party: for these last have never sought, in the revolution, any thing else to place to place comfortably: whereas the jacobins did really, at first, desire to establish a free constitution, in the example of a free state, to the heart of the nation.

The aristocrats, you will observe, were reduced to insufficiency before the others divided. Thatayou know, is a thing of course. You will remember, that the first Assembly had decreed that their members could neither hold any office under the crown, nor yet been chosen to represent them. These decrees were partly the fruit of opposition, partly that of necessity, these resolutions in the head of the nation.

The first decree was of jacobin parentage, to disappoint their enemies, who were upon the point of succeeding to office. The second decree was carried against the secret inclinations of both. But the consequence was, that each was seriously disappointed: and, as the constitution was clearly unable to sup-port itself, they began to perceive that its ruin might involve their own; and, therefore, they formed a coalition, in which each determined to make use of the other for its own purposes.

But you will say, perhaps, that both together would be of little use; and this is true in a degree: for if the consti-tution had been a practicable thing, those alone who were in power under it could have any effect. But this was not the case; and therefore the plan of the altes was to induce a belief, in the court, that they alone had sufficient population in the nation to preserve the monarchical authority against the republic party; and, on the other hand, to convince the Assembly that (having in their hands the royal authority) all favor, offices, and grants, must be given to that body. Thus they constituted themselves, if I may be allowed the expression, the government brokers of the nation.

I have mentioned the republican party. This naturally grew up out of the old jacobin sect; for, when the chiefs, finding they could not induce a movement to go off, attempted a movement to the contrary, the whole of the human, or of his own error, many of their disciples, who believed what their apostles had preached, and many who had the establishment of order the loss of their consequence, determined to throw off all submission to crowned heads, as being unworthy of a free people.

Add to this the number of "moody beggars starving for a time of pell-mell havoc and confusion." It was this coalition which prevented the King from accepting the constitution in a mondy manner: pointing out its capital faults; marking the probable consequences; calling on them to reconsider its; and declaring that his submission to their decisions arose from his belief, that it was the only means to avoid the horrors of civil war. They saw that this fact would render them responsible; and although it was the most likely means of obtaining a good constitution, at a future day, and would have bound the King down to the principles he should then advance, yet they opposed, because such a good constitution would be established, not only without, but even against them, and for the benefit of their foes. The result was, that the King, with a spirit of that kind of acceptance which I have just mentioned, but he was borne down; being threatened with popular com-motions, fatal to himself and his family, and with that civil war which he most wished to avoid, as the necessary result of such fatal combinations.

Shortly after its acceptance it became necessary to appoint another Minister of Foreign Affairs, Monsieur de Montmorin having insisted so strongly on retiring that the King could not longer, with any propriety, ask him to stay. The state of the ministry was then as follows: Monsieur Dupont, the Keeper of the seals, a creature of, and sworn ad-venturer to the tribunat; which 동其间 비로는 another Dupont, Barnave, and Alexander Lamouret, being the chiefs of the old jacobins. I say the old jacobins, or the present.* The seals constantly communicated everything that passed in council to his coadjutors. The Minister of the Interior, Monsieur Delessart, was a wavering creature, one of whom Shakespeare says that they "stirre, affirm, and turn their heads like hares."

It was, therefore, of the greatest importance for the King to have a man of strength and ability to make his way. This was brought forward by him, and had connected himself with the tribunat; M. Necker's enemies, as being the strongest party, but still kept up a good understanding with the others.

Dupont, the Minister of War, of whom I formerly spoke to you when he was appointed, and foretold the con-sequence which must result from his adherence to the allies and as also completely subservient to the tribunat. But at that time he was so much embroiled with the Assembly, that his speedy resignation seemed unavoid-able.

Monsieur Bertrand de Moleville had just been appointed to the marines—an office which Monsieur de Bonneville himself had before held. But it was added to his jacobin rights, which he disdained in order to serve the King that he would not be a member of a ministry, many of whom he knew to be unfaithful to him. Monsieur Bertrand was brought forward by the same influence; but he is really attached to the crown: wishes ardently to obtain a good constitution for his country; is an intelligent, sensible, and laborious man, formerly of the robe, and the particular friend of Monsieur de Montmorin.

I mentioned to you, formerly, that Monsieur de Choiseul had refused the office of Foreign Affairs. While it was in question who should be appointed to succeed Monsieur de Montmorin, the King, of his own head, named the Count de Moustier, and wrote him a letter on the subject, which de Moustier has since shown to me. He had the honor to say:--"The King having written until half past eight in the evening to the Count de Moustier, the minister of the city, the King told him that he could not give him the office, because he was considered as an aristocrat. You will observe that the coalition had been at work to get rid of him, and here I must make a digression. The plan was, that, as soon as circumstances would admit, a minister at war should be appointed, faithful to the King, and that Bou-gainville take the marines; Bertrand be appointed Keeper of the seals; and Delessart either kept in, or turned out, as he should behave. This plan was not known to the coalition at all; but they well knew, that, if de Moustier got into place, it would be a step towards the destruction of their influence and authority. They therefore assured the King that he could not longer rely on Moustier; however far Moustier may have been, they brought out of touch in the Assembly, and the like; so that at last he gave up his nomination, and explained the matter to de Moustier. A long interregnum ensued in that office, and as Monsieur de Montmorin absolutely continued to refuse any longer, the King considered that de Moleville was the most proper person, and set out to the States, of which he was a member.

He accepted, in the belief of two things, in both of which he was mistaken. One, that he had the confidence of the King and Queen; but he had never taken the right way to obtain either their confidence, or that of others. The second article of his creed was, that the tribunat (his patrons) commanded a majority in the Assembly. He was much deceived; for he never pointed out the necessity of these circumstances, Monsieur de Baronne tried hard to obtain that place; and, as I have mentioned his name, and that of Monsieur de Choiseul, I will, in this place, mention that of the Abbé de Perigord, afterwards Bishop of Autun. These three were young men of high family, men of wit, and men of pleasure; the two former were men of ambition, but had spent it. They were intrusted with the charge of organizing a new army, there had been a great deal of ambition together, to retrieve their affairs. On the score of morals neither of them is exemplary. The Bishop is particularly blamed on that head; for the variety and publicity of his amours, for gambling, and, above all, for stock-jobbing, during the ministry of Monsieur de Calonne, with whom he was on the best terms; and, therefore, had opportunities which his enemies say he made no small use of. However, I think that, except his gallantries, and mode of thinking, rather too liberal, his public character and executive powers of the Minister of France that he should stay for three years longer in that city. In the beginning of the revolution, Narbonne, a great anti-Viceroyist, was not a little opposed to it, and there was, afterwards, some coldness between him and the Bishop, partly on political accounts, and partly because he (in common with the rest of the nobility) believed the Bishop a dangerous man. He was, however, length removed, by the death of his brother, a common friend, and the Bishop labored hard to get his friend de Narbonne appointed to the office of Foreign Affairs; but the King would not agree to it. M. Delessart was, therefore, appointed, he being very glad to get rid of the Bishop, who had apprehended too much, perhaps, of power, for his taste.

The next step was to bring Monsieur de Narbonne forward to fill the place of Monsieur Duportail, and to this M. Delessart gave his hearty assistance, by way of compensating for the disappointment in the other department. Finally, the Interior, or Home Department, was filled by a Monsieur Calier de Gerville, of whom I know very little. I shall not say anything necessary to the understanding of my history.

This ministry stands then divided as follows. The Keeper of the Seals and M. Delessart are attached, or supposed to be so, to the Lameth faction; Monsieur de Narbonne and Monsieur Bertrand are supposed to be attached to the quarte-vingt-neufistes; and M. de Gerville, rather leaning to the Lameth faction. This ministry, externally disappointed in itself, and strongly opposed by the Assembly, possesses, on the whole, but a moderate share of talents; for though Count de Narbonne is a man of wit, and a very pleasant lively fellow, he is by no means a man of business; and though M. Bertrand has talents, yet, according to the old proverb, one swallow never makes a summer.

It is with every precaution that the constitutionists, without any whole, are, of many, so indiscreet as to disclose that opinion, when, at the same time, they declare their determination to support and execute it, which is, in fact, the only rational mode which now remains, of pointing out its defects. It is unnecessary to tell you, that some members of the National Assembly are in the pay of England, for that is a matter not to be one side of another; and all these are in the pay of France, and of her enemies, and of other motives I know not his conduct tends to injure his own country, and benefit that of their ancient foes, in a very great degree. The sincerity of their finances is such, that every considerate person sees the impossibility of going on in the present way; and as a change of system, after so many pompous declamations, is not a little dangerous among a people so wild and ungrateful, it has appeared to them that a war would furnish some plausible pretext for measures of a very decisive nature, in which state, necessity will be urged in the teeth of policy, humanity, and justice. Others consider war as the means of obtaining, for the government, the consent and control of the nobility, the newly created force, which may be used to restore order; in other words, to bring back despotism; and then they expect that the King will give the nation a constitution which they have neither the wisdom to form, nor the virtue to adopt, for themselves. Others again suppose, that, in case of a war, there will be such a leaning from the King towards his brothers, from the Queen towards the Emperor, and such a scarcity of noble families (the very few) who remain, towards the family of their brethren, who have left the kingdom, that the sad success natural to arise from the opposition of undisciplined mobs to regular armies, may be easily imputed to treasonable counsels, and the people be prevailed on to banish them from the country. This is the aristocracy's way of defending the last of very ancient, many of them poor, and all of them proud, hope that, supported by foreign armies, they shall be able to return victorious, and re-establish that species of despotism most suited to their own cotiparity.

It happens, therefore, that the whole nation, though with different views, are desirous of war: for it is proper in such a state of affairs, when public opinion has taken a turn in the spirit of the country, which has never been better. I have told you, long ago, that the Emperor is by no means an enterprising or warlike prince. I must now, in confirmation of that, inform you, that, in the famous conference at Plunitz, he was taken in by the King of Prussia: for he came prepared to haggle about the nature and extent of the saccor to be given, and forces to be employed, but the King cut the matter short by telling him, that the difference in the extent of their respective dominions, and a variety of other circumstances, would justify him in demanding greater efforts on the part of the Emperor, but that he would meet him on ground of perfect equality. In consequence of this, the Emperor was obliged to accede, but he did so in the way most favourable to do nothing.

When, therefore, the King accepted the constitution, he chose to consider as a reason why foreign Princes should not interfere, the King of Prussia, however, gave to the King personal assurances of his good will and brotherly attachment, and, of this, offered substantial proofs. The King's true interest (and he thinks so) seems to incline him to this very policy; but it is to be seen if, by acting in this manner, he will be able to extricate the necessity of restoring, in a great degree, the royal authority. The faction opposed to him are very sensible of this, which forms an additional reason for driving every thing to extremity; and, therefore, with a view to destroy the constitution, the aristocracy have imagined to court the alliance of Great Britain and of Prussia. In consequence, the Bishop d'Auon has been sent to England, and, if any information be good, is authorized to propose the cession of the Islands of France and Bourbon, and the island of Tobago, as the price of an alliance against the Emperor.

The present opportunity to break the family compact with Spain, which has long been coveted by Britain: for it is evident that this country will not embark in a contest which is to do France any good, and, therefore, the game of Mr. Pitt is as clear as the sun, and suits exactly his temper and disposition. He has only to receive the offers made, and send copies to Vienna and Madrid, by way of supporting his negotiations, particularly with the latter. He can, by telling them, that the guarantees of their dominions, and rights against the hands of the nation, and, by this means, we should find ourselves all at once surrounded by hostile nations. The Minister of the Marine opposed violently, in council, this mission; stated the consequences, and obtained some useful restrictions. M. de Warville proposed, in the Diet, to send a minister to England, who shall make the most advantageous engagements she might take. You will judge, from this specimen, of the wisdom and virtue of the faction to which he belongs, and I am sure the integrity of your heart will frown with indignant contempt, when I tell you, that, among the chiefs of that faction are men who owe all their present personal emolument of the kingdom.

This mission of the Bishop d'Auon has produced something like a schism in the council. The party of Lameth and Barnave are strongly opposed to it. M. Delessart, who had adopted the scheme on the representation of the Bishop (with whom it originated) and his friends, abandoned it on the representation of the others, and two or three days after was sent to assure the Emperor, that, at the present moment, appearances, they meant him no harm. In effect, they were thrown in the way of the execution of the national plan which was set on foot about three months ago, by those who afterwards fell into the plan of an alliance with Britain. You may judge, from hence, how much dependence is to be placed on these new false statements. The heads of the ministry have taken the inmost part of the measures; I have from you, the last time I had any assurance of the movements to the King and of Spain. A confidential person has desired me to assure you, on their behalf, that they are very far from wishing to change the system of French politics, and abandon their old allies, and, therefore, if you make to take, of the present advantage of Spain, that you will consider them as originating merely in the madness of the moment, and not as intended any approach to them in any other shape than what is termed the truey. I shall send this letter in such a way as promises the greatest safety, and I must entreat you, my dear sir, to destroy it, for fear of accidents; you will feel how important it is to them, that this communication be not disclosed. It is merely personal from them to you, and expressive of sentiments which can have no action until they have some authority.
It is time to close this too long letter, whose object is to possess you of that interior machinery by which outward movements are directed. Believe always, I pray, in the sincerity of those sentiments with which I am yours,

GOVERNEUR MORRIS.

DEAR SIR:

I had the honor to write to you on the 4th of last month. Two days after, I was informed that you had nominated me as minister to the court of France, but the latest advices from America, which come down to the 10th of January, show that the Senate had not then made their decision. Be that decision what it may, I shall ever greatly esteem the confidence which you are pleased to acknowledge this mark of confidence from the person in the world whose good opinion I consider most estimable.

In my letter of the 4th, I gave you a picture of the French ministry, and a view of the measures pursued by different parties, including the mission of the Bishop d'Autun. As he has now got back to Paris, it may be well to communicate my receipt of that letter; in propria persona, for the news of the 4th seems actually to have preserved the same characters of the French ministry, that which I informed you of last month, and there can be no apprehension at the scenes acting in France, of which they consider him as a prime mover. Secondly, that his reputation is offensive to persons who pique themselves on decency of manners and deportment. And, lastly, because he was so imprudent, when he had the commission to prevent discontents, by keeping company with leading characters among the dissenteres, and other similar measures, he renewed the impression made before his departure from Paris, that he meant to intrigue with the discontented. His public reception, however, furnishes no clue to decide on the success of his mission, because the former might have been very bad, and the latter very much.

The fact, however, is, that he could offer nothing worthy of their acceptance, and that what he asked was of a nature not to be granted. His offer was confined to the cession of Tobago, a demolition of the works of Cherbourg, and an extension of the commercial treaty. He asked a strict neutrality in case of war with the Emperor. Now, you may have been surprised that such contempt should be shown to a minister in whose presence, so far as you can promise, in her name, otherwise than as god fathers and god mothers do at a christening; and how such promises are kept every known body.

Convinced of this, the bishop never told his errand to Lord Gower, the British ambassador at Paris, who mentioned that circumstance to me as extraordinary, but yet so far agreeable as that he was glad not to have been called on for letters of introduction.

Respecting Tobago, it makes a digression. It is now a long time since it was mentioned to me in Paris, that some of the colonists of St. Domingo had come hither to make overtures to Mr. Pitt. Since that period, I learnt that there were no persons in the French ministry, either for or against the extension of the French boundary into St. Domingo, but that he was in deep intrigues with regard to that colony. The particular proofs were not shown to me, so that I cannot speak positively. Neither can I vouch for what I have learnt further than that subject within this month, but I am assured that it is Mr. Pitt's intention to bring about, if he can, the independence of St. Domingo. Mr. Clarkson, the great negro advocate, is mentioned to me as his agent for this business at Paris, and the conduct of a part of the Assembly, in opposing succor to that island, seems corroborative of such an idea. This, then, being the case, or supposing it to be so, the offer of Tobago was too trifling to attract Mr. Pitt's notice, even if unconcerned, and certainly much less so if it was made to him in face of the adoption of his plan respecting St. Domingo. And I learn from another quarter, that he means to offer us his mediation for a peace with the Indians. If all this be true, his game is evident. The mediation is to be with a price for adopting his plans, and with the Indian tribes a means of constituting himself their patron and protector. It may be that all this was the desire of the quadrant, and the pretenses for military colonization of the upper country, and, above all, what may come from Mr. Hammond.

I return to St. Domingo. If such be Mr. Pitt's scheme, although we shall not, I presume, engage in, or countenance it, yet the success will be entirely for our advantage, and a mere preliminary to something of the same sort, which must happen to Jamaica, on the best change of wind in the political world. The destruction of the port of Cherbourg is no present object with the British ministry, because they suppose it will be ruined by the elements before it can be completed; and because the French marine is, from the want of discipline, an object more of contention than of competition. The present condition of the French colonists is, that every part of France is open to contraband commerce, and because there is little reason to believe that the stipulations in a treaty now made would be of any long duration.

Thus it happens that neither of the objects offered were worthy of notice. But the neutrality required was of a much higher importance. By leaving the Canoe Low countries exposed to French invasion, it would have been a violation both of ancient of and recent treaties. Nor is this all: for (as I have already had occasion to remark) the annexation of those provinces to the French monarchy would prove almost, if not altogether, fatal to Great Britain. And I have never considered that they are almost in revolt already, and that it is in fact the revolution in France itself which, with France, there is reason to suppose that a union might have been effected, in case of a war with the Emperor.

So much then on the ground of good faith and good policy. But there is still a farther cause, which, as the world goes, may be equal in its operation to all others. It seems to be a most point whether it is the British or the Prussian cabinet which directs the other. Perhaps there may be a little of both; but be all that as it may, it is certain that neither feels disposed to counteract the views of its ally, in any open manner. Now, putting aside the personal feelings which naturally agitate the sovereign of this, as well as of other kingdoms, in regard to the French revolution, it is notorious that, from the very dawn of it, agents were employed to foment a spirit of revolt in other States, particularly in Prussia. The King of Prussia, therefore, feels for the French revolutionists all the enmity of a proud, passionate, and offended German Prince. Add to this, that the Elector of Hanover, as such, cannot wish for a change in the government of Germany. If, therefore, it had been the interest of Great Britain to establish such a government in France, (which it certainly is not) I am perfectly convinced that this court would never have made a single effort for the purpose.

I stated to you, in my last, that the French ministry are extremely disjointed. It was too much so for any durable existence besides which, the members took effectual means to precipitate each other's ruin. M. de Narbonne wished to get into the office of foreign affairs. This was desirable to him, it is said, on many accounts, but particularly so because it gives the command of large sums without account. Whatever may have been his motives, the following seems to have been his conduct: He stood forth the advocate of all violent measures. This was naturally the appearance amongst the party of men, not so with the Asterley. He associated himself to the partisans of democracy; and while, by these means, he secured himself against their fanatics, he took great care of his pecuniary affairs. This, at least, is affirmed to me, and with the addition that he had the impediment to pay off his debts, although it is notorious that his estate (which is in St. Domingo) is among those which are laid waste. It is probable that according to thisj the court now conspired to displace him, or at least to make himself as useful as possible to themselves in the road to ruin, he agreed to compensate the depreciation of the assignats. In order to remove a great obstacle to his proceedings, he joined in the intrigues against M. Bertrand; and, at the same time, fostered other intrigues against M. Delessart, with a view of getting his place. The proofs of all these things are said to be in the King's hands.

M. Delessart's conduct I have already, in part, communicated. I must add that, afterwards, imagining that Brissot, de Warville, and Condorcet, were omnipotent in the Assembly, he violated their engagements made with the Tramvire, and wrote some despatches confederally to the views of those two gentlemen. In consequence whereof, it was resolved to displace him, and they were looking out for a successor. The person applied to was actually dehberating whether he should or should not accept, at the moment when Brissot brought about his impeachment and arrest. In this same moment M. de Narbonne was dismissed, and with him was to go M. de Gerville. The Chevalier de Graeye succeeds M. de Narbonne. When I left Paris he was attached to the Triunvirate. He does not want understanding, but I think it almost impossible that he should succeed. Monsieur Bertrand, against whom an address from the Assembly was at length carried, has, I find, resigned. There is something at the bottom which I cannot discover, without being on the spot, but you may rely on it he goes out with the full confidence of the King and Queen.

My informations from Paris are previous to the news of the Emperor's death, which has probably occasioned the violent proceedings against poor Delessart, by removing the fears of those who, in the midst of all their big words, were confoundedly frightened. What may be the consequences of this event, it is impossible to determine, or even to conjecture. Much, very much, depends on the personal character of his successor, which I am not yet acquainted with.

It is supposed by some here that Mr. Pitt is not strong in the cabinet at present, although the majority in Parliament was never more decisive, and this is said to arise from his refusing to ask money for the payment of the Prince of Wales's debts, which the King, it is said, was desirous of, and which his minister declined with some offensive expressions. Mr. Pitt's friends insist, on the other hand, that the whole story is false from beginning to end. For my own part, I do not think he will be turned out, because I believe him to be very cunning and, although he has conducted foreign affairs but poorly, he manages all the little court and parliamentary intrigues with consummate address.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

LONDON, March 21, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

Yesterday I was informed that the Senate had agreed to your nomination of diplomatic servants. If I knew my own heart, this intelligence is far less agreeable to me on my own account than on that of the public. I am sure that a rejection, from whatever cause it may have arisen, would have been attributed to disunion in our counsels.

I find that the King of France has appointed to the Office of Foreign Affairs a Monsieur Dumouriez, and that it is considered as a sacrifice to the Jacobins. He is a bold, determined man. I am not acquainted with him personally, but I know that he has long been seeking a place in the administration, and was, about six months ago, determined to take the peril of his life, the Jacobins and all other clubs, and to effect a change in the Government. How far he may have changed his opinions since, I will not pretend to tell you, I mention this to you now, because, when I know more, I can refer to this letter, and say, that, by coming into office, he has not changed his sentiments, if he persists in those his ancient determinations. If not, I will tell you, that he is more prudent than was supposed. And these words will, in either case, mean nothing more than is here set down for them. The King consulted him (as I was told by my confidential friend, in the middle of last October) on the state of affairs, when M. de Montmorn went out; but the high-toned measures he proposed were not adopted.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

PARIS, June 10, 1792.

MY DEAR SIR:

Although I have been above a month in this city, I have not been able, until within a day or two, to make up my mind as to the sentiments of the person mentioned to you in mine of the 31st of March, or rather I could not obtain that certainty which was needful, before I could properly mention them to you. I can now venture to assure you, that by coming into office he has not changed his sentiments.

My former letters have mentioned to you the discipline of the French armies, and the public prints will give you such facts on that head as may tend to making up in your mind a sound judgment as to future events. The first step towards bankruptcy has already been made, by extending to seventeen hundred millions the sum of assignats, which may be in circulation. A further extension must take place in a few days. The Powers combined against France have it, therefore, in their choice to wear her out by a war of resources, or dash into the heart of the country. This last will best suit with their own situation; but I do not think they will advance before the beginning of August.

Your letter to the King has produced a very good effect. It is not relished by the democrats, who particularly dislike the term "your people," but it suits well the prevailing temper, which is monarchical. The Jacobins approach to its dissolution, as you may perceive by its agitators. In fact, the deliberations are so absurd, and so extravagantly wild, that they daily furnish new arms to their enemies. You will perceive, at a glance, that this is not a moment for making commercial treaties. I shall however, do all that I can, without seriously compromising our future interests.

I am, &c. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

General Washington to Gouverneur Morris.

PHILADELPHIA, October 20, 1792.

MY DEAR SIR:

Although your letter of the 14th of June, which I have received, did not paint the prospects of France in the most pleasing colors, yet the events which have since taken place gave a more gloomy aspect to the public affairs of that kingdom than your letter gave reason to apprehend.

A thousand circumstances, besides our distance from the theatre of action, made it improbable that we should have intelligence of any important facts and causes through the medium of the public prints; and I have received no other accounts than what have come in that channel. But, taking up the most favorable of these, glorified indeed, appears the situation of France at this juncture. But it is hardly probable that even you, who are on the spot, can, with any precision, how these things will terminate; much less can we, at this distance, pretend to augur the event. We can only repeat the sincere wish, that much happiness may arise to the French nation, and to mankind in general, out of the severe evils which are inseparable from so important a revolution.

In the present state of things we cannot expect that any commercial treaty can now be formed with France; but I beg of you to embrace the proper moment of arrangement, and of doing whatever may be in your power for the substantial interest of our country.

The affairs of the United States go on well. There are some few clouds in our political hemisphere, but I trust that the bright sun of our prosperity will dispel them.

The Indians on our western and southern frontiers are still troublesome, but such measures are taken as will, I presume, prevent any serious mischief from them; I confess, however, that I do not believe these tribes will ever be brought to a quiescent state, so long as they may be under an influence which is hostile to the rising greatness of these States.

From the complexion of some of our newspapers, foreigners would be led to believe that invertebrate political disensions exist among us, and that we are on the very verge of disunion; but the fact is otherwise. The great body of
MY DEAR SIR:

Yours of the 21st of June is at length safely arrived. Poor Lafayette! Your letter to him must remain with me yet some time. His enemies here are as virulent as ever; and I can give you no better proof than this, that the King's papers was found nothing of what his enemies wished and expected, in correspondence with M. de Lafayette, which breathes from beginning to end the purest sentiments of freedom. It is, therefore, kept secret, while he stands accused of designs, in conjunction with the dethroned monarch, to enslave his country.

The respect I owe this correspondence is communicated to me by a person to whom it was related confidentially by one of the parties who examined it. You will have seen in my letters to Mr. Jefferson, a proposition made by Mr. Short respecting M. de Lafayette, with my reply. I had very good reason to apprehend that our interference at that time would have been injurious to him, but I hope that a moment will soon offer in which something may be done for his relief. In reading my correspondence with Mr. Short, you must consider that I wrote to the French and Austrian Government, as each would take the liberty to read my letters.

You will have seen, also, that in my letters to Mr. Jefferson, I hint at the dangers attending a residence in this city. Instant regrets, hurried expectations, unutterable anxieties, and the taking part in affair, which are parts of voice, are all point to a natural interpretation thereof; but these were not what I contemplated. Should we ever meet, I will entertain you with the recital of many things, which it would be improper to commit to paper, at least for the present.

You will have seen that the King is accused of high crimes and misdemeanors; but I verily believe that he wished sincerely to maintain the enjoyment of liberty; and that the degradations are, in some degree, his, that he has suffered. He wished for a good constitution, but unfortunately he had not the means to obtain it, or, if he had, he was thwarted by those about him. What may be his fate, God only knows; but history informs us that the passage of dethroned monarchs is short from the prison to the grave.

I have mentioned to Mr. Jefferson, repeatedly, my wish to have positive instructions and orders for my Government. I need not tell you, sir, how agreeable this would be to me, and what a load it would take from my mind. At the same time, I am fully sensible that it may be inconvenient to give me such orders. The United States may wish to temporize, and all States have a right also to the sing me at large, with the view which they are supposed to have to the weal or the woe of the country.

Mr. Jefferson, from the materials in his possession, will be able to give you an accurate account of the military events. I discover three capital errors in the conduct of the Duke of Brunswick. First, his proclamation arrogated rights which on no construction could belong to him or his employers, and contained threats which no circumstances could warrant, and which in no supposable success could be executed. They tended, however, to unite the nation in opposing him, seeing that no hope remained for those who had taken any part in the revolution; and the conduct observed towards M. de Lafayette and his companions was a severe comment on the cruelty of the rest. Thus, at the same time, he wounded the pride, insulted the feelings, and alarmed the fears, of all France. And, by his threatening menace to protect the royal family, he plunged them into the situation from which they must extinguish them.

The second error was, not to dash at Paris the instant he received the news of the affair of the tenth. He should then have advance, and all States fixed and adjourned in their assembly to the same place at large, with the view which they are supposed to have to the weal or the woe of the country. He should then have expected their assistance to restore their dethroned prince and violated constitution. I am persuaded that he would have met with as much support as in the revolution, when the interest of the state was involved. But when the revolution was over, and new letters of credence are given, it will be proper to know to whom they are to be directed, because the Convention, a mere temporary body, is to be succeeded by some fixed form, and it may be a long time before any such form will be employed.

GOUVERNEUR.

My Dear Sir:

I did myself the honor to write to you on the 33d of October. Since that date the exterior affairs of this country have assumed a more steady appearance. My letter of the 21st instant, to Mr. Jefferson, will communicate my view of the present situation of affairs, which your good sense will easily expound. Let it be compared with Mr. Jefferson's public papers, as well as the memoirs of the foreign affairs, and the country, in which they may have influence in destroying it, a subject of which the many has given three strong proofs, since his accession, that he is by no means nice on this subject of public faith. The invasion of France has been declared, also between Britain and Holland, but whether they will confine themselves to court intrigue, or come into the field, is doubtful.

Thus you will perceive, sir, that nothing can be predicted with tolerable certainty respecting the affairs of this country, either internal or external, at the present moment. I am, &c.

intrepidity. Like Caesar, he believes in his fortune. When the business drew towards a point the conspirators trembled, but Westermann declared they should go on. They obeyed, because they had trusted him too far. On that important day his personal conduct decided in a great measure their success. Rewards were due; and military rank, with opportunities to enrich himself, was granted.

You must, sir, be aware that Dumouriez opened in council distrusted him. Westermann was commissioned to destroy him, should he falter. This commission was shown to the General. It became the bond of union between him and Westermann. Dumouriez opened a treaty with the King of Prussia. The principal emigrants, confident of force, and breathing vengeance, shot the royal ear. Thionville was defended, because a member of the Constituent Assembly was there; and that the present administration is to be overthrown, beginning with Pache, the Minister of War. You will have seen a denunciation against these members of Assembly for a letter they wrote to Thionville, the King's valet-de-chambre. This affair needs explanation, but it can be of no present consequence.

The King's fate is to be decided next Monday, the 14th. That unhappy man, conversing with one of his counselors on his own fate, calmly summed up the motives of every kind, and concluded that a majority of the Convention would vote for referring his case to the people, and that in consequence he should be massacred. I think he must die or reign.

My Dear Sir: I have received yours of the 20th of October, which was very long on its way. You will find that events have blackened more and more in this country. The present prospects are dreadful. It is not so much perhaps that the Administration has done great as that may be, for there are many as means of defense in so vast a nation. The exhausted state of resources might also be borne with, if not remedied. But the disorganized state of the Government appears to be irreparable. The venality is such that, if there be no traitors, it is because the enemy have not common sense. Without the aid of venality, there are not a few who, from mistaken zeal, and from ignorance, contribute to the success of those Powers who are leagued against France. Many, also, under the garb of patriotism, conceal their attachment to the former Government. In short, the fabric of the present system is erected on a quagmire. The new constitution has not yet made its appearance, but it is easy to conjecture what it will not be. In the mean time, I learn that the Ministers of War and Marine declare it impossible for them to go on. How all this will end God only knows, but I fear it will end badly.

I will not speak of my own situation; you will judge that it is far from pleasant. I could be popular, but that would be wrong. The different parties pass away like the shadows in a magic lantern, and to be well with any one of them, would in a short period, become the cause of unquenchable hatred with the others.

Happy, happy, America! governed by reason, by law, by the man whom she loves, whom she almost adores. It is the pride of my life to consider that man as my friend, and I hope long to be honored with that title. God bless you, my dear sir, and keep and preserve you. Your cool and steady temper is now of infinite consequence to your country. As soon as I can see the end of any thing decisive, I shall inform you of it. At present, I weary myself with unwavailing reflection, meditation, and conjecture. A partition seems the most probable event at present. Adieu.

To George Washington.

My Dear Sir: I think that you should be acquainted with a fact which it is very important to communicate to our Secretary of State as soon as may be. I am informed, in a way that precludes doubt, that the Executive Council here sent out, by M. Genet, three hundred blank commissions for privateers, to be given clandestinely to such persons as he might in America incline to take them. They suppose that the avowal of some adventurers may lead them into measures which would involve alterations with Great Britain, and terminate finally in a war. This appears to me, waiving all question of honesty, no very sound measure, politically speaking, since they may, as a nation, derive greater advantage from our neutrality than from our alliance.

But, whatever light it may be viewed in as to them, it is, in respect to us, a detestable project. I learn that some seamen have lately been captured, by British cruisers, who claim to be Americans. I presume that the claim will not be admitted, but, if the Government should cause them to be executed as pirates, a knowledge thereof would go a great way to prevent our citizens from engaging in a war, contrary to the wishes of our Government, especially if, as I doubt not, the President should, by proclamation, enjoining the observance of a strict neutrality, declare that all those who contravene shall be at the mercy of the party by whom they may be taken, and not entitled to the protection of the United States.

I am the more solicitous on this subject in that we may well expect a back game of the same kind by Britain, and, in such case, it would be impossible for the French to distinguish among their prisoners between those who were and those who were not English. As there is nothing more destructive to morals than the spirit of gambling, especially among men who have sedulously conspired against the ensnaring the property of others, and as the security and happiness of the United States depend so essentially on the morals of their citizens, I feel a more than usual solicitude to prevent a practice inconsistent with all good principles.

I have no late news from America, and none, of any date, which you would wish to know. Our Secretary of State seems to have acted theenery. Metz remains in a state of near the largest of his predecessors, that last said is recommended. The length of this letter will show you that I have not only profited by such wise lessons, but it will also show you, I trust, the confidential esteem with which

Gouverneur Morris.

To Thomas Pinckney.

General Washington to Gouverneur Morris.

My Dear Sir: It was not till the middle of February that I had the pleasure to receive your letter of the 23d of October. If you are at the fountain head of those great and important transactions which have lately engaged the attention-tion of Europe and America, cannot pretend to say what will be their event, surely we, in this distant quarter, should be presumptuous indeed in venturing to predict it. And unwise should we be in the extreme, to involve ourselves in the contests of European nations, where our weight could be but small, though the loss to ourselves would be certain. I can, however, with truth, aver, that this country is not guided by such a narrow and mistaken policy as that of a prudent statesman under an idea that our importance will be increased in proportion as that of others is lessened. We should rejoice to see every nation enjoying all the advantages that nature and its circumstances would admit, consistent with civil liberty and the rights of other nations. Upon this ground the prosperity of this country would unfold itself every day, and every day it would be growing in political importance.

Mr. Jefferson will communicate to you such official information as we have to give, and will transmit the laws, public papers, &c.

I have thought it best, my dear sir, not to let slip this opportunity of acknowledging the receipt of your letter, lest no other should occur to me very soon, as I am called to Mount Vernon by the death of my nephew, Major Washington, and am on the point of setting out for that place to-morrow. I need not tell you that this is, of course, a very busy moment with me. It will therefore account for the conciseness of this letter, by which, however, you must not infer any regard.

You see me again entering upon the arduous duties of an important office. It is done so contrary to my intention, that it would require more time than I have allowed myself to assign the reasons; and therefore I shall leave you to your own suggestion, aided by the publications which you will find in the gazettes.

I am your sincere friend and affectionate servant,

G. WASHINGTON.

SAINTPONT, near PARIS, June 31st, 1789.

My Dear Sir:—I have just received yours of the 29th of March. Not having had time to read the gazettes, which are but just (and but in a part) arrived, I cannot from them derive the information you allude to, but my first glance at them shows me what I am sure you will see, that I am induced to quote a sound maxim from an excellent book, 'No house divided against itself can stand.'

As to your re-acceptance, sir, you know my sentiments, which on that, as on some other subjects, are, I think, unchangeable. It will be time enough for you to have a successor when it shall please God to call you from this world's theatre. At the present moment I can form a competent idea of the office; but during your life I consider the thing as utterly impossible. And do not imagine, my dear sir, that you can retire, though you may resign. You will in such case become the man of the opposition, your good sense may differ from their madness, and your virtue from their villainy. Depend on it, they will cite you as being of their sentiments. If you are silent you assent, and if you speak you are committed. In the mean time your poor successor is obliged to struggle under all the weight of your reputation, as well as that of the office; and he must be a strong man who can carry either; of course a very rash man who would attempt to take either.

I am very happy to find, that the determination to maintain a strict neutrality is so general in America. I shall not dwell on that topic, because my several letters to Mr. Jefferson contain enough of it to weary your patience. By the by, I am mortified more than I can tell at the delay my letters experience in their passage. I task my mind to the idea of a common prejudice in the writers of foreign letters that the post-office can be relied on) you may be duly prepared, and after all you hear of the event before my almanac comes out. This is provoking, and would be much more so, did I not find from experience that the things I wish are done as well, and perhaps better than if my conjectures had reached you.

I trust that long ere this, you will have received what I had the honor to write on the 28th December, 6th and 10th of January, and the 14th February. You will have seen that, in the end of last month, and beginning of this, the long expected insurrection took place, by which a new set of men are brought into power. Should the present society be able to establish themselves, I think M. Genet will have a successor; and if, the revolution completed, things return to the point from whence they started, I am sure M. Genet will have a successor. As to those who rule, or rather the few by whom they are directed, you may depend that they have just ideas of the value of popular opinion. They are not, however, in a condition to act according to knowledge, and should they be able to influence the people, there will be quite as much of good luck as of good management in it. At any rate, a part of the crew will be thrown overboard. It is my opinion that the members of the Convention lately arrested will do nothing, for the greater part of them have only parole energy; and if I were called on by any cogent motive to act, it should be in conformity to that idea. In my letter to Mr. Jefferson of this day I tell him that I shall implicitly obey his orders; by which I mean, according to the request and hint that my embarrassments may have arisen from imprudent reliance on partial friends, or from the principles of free Government. You may rely, sir, that I shall be cautious to commit the United States as little as possible to future contingent necessities. In my last letter I gave you my idea of popularity.

There are three governments任何一个国家都存在, and therefore it seems to me that one of those into which they call themselves democrats are divided, must join the royalists. I do not inquire what negotiations are carried on to that effect, for I have no desire to meddle with such affairs, directly or indirectly, and should be very sorry to have the appearance of siding with any one party or faction whatever, being convinced that the best do the business of the United States by keeping aloof from them all.

Those who command the royal or Christian army, as they call themselves, on the Loire, are good officers. Their enemies, in my mind, passed the highest eulogium on them, in saying that the soldiers are brought to such a pitch of folly and madness, as to rush on, armed only with clubs, and possess themselves of the artillery to whose fire they were exposed. As far as I have been able to learn, they profess themselves the friends of order and justice, and act conformably to such professions, protecting both persons and property wherever they arrive, and paying for whatever they take. Hence it happens, that their dominion is constantly extending itself, and if they should get possession of these Gazette, which seems to be their present object, they will in truth formidable, because than, by means of the Loire, a passage will be opened into the heart of the kingdom for so many troops as foreign Powers may choose to send thither, if they should prefer fighting the battle with Frenchmen, they need only furnish money and war-like stores, and they would have as many men as they please, and the most fertile part of France to subdue.

Farewell, my dear sir, may God bless and keep you, not merely for your sake, and still less for that of your country.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To George Washington, President of the United States.

Paris, October 16th, 1793.

My Dear Sir:—You will see, by the official correspondence, that your orders are complied with, and that your intentions are fulfilled. Permit me on this occasion to remark, that had the people of America been well informed of the state of things on this side of the Atlantic, no one would have dared to adopt the conduct which M. Genet has pursued. In reading the few gazettes which have reached me, I am surprised to see so little sound intelligence. The present Government is evidently a despotism both in principle and practice. The Convention now consists of only a part of those who were chosen to frame a constitution. These, after putting under arrest their fellow, claim all power, and have delegated the greater part of it to a Committee of Safety. You will observe, that once the ordinary measures of government is to send out commissioners with unlimited authority. They are invested with power to remove officers chosen by the people, and put others in their places. This power, as well as that of imprisonment, is liberally authorized to a liberal revolutionary tribunal established here to judge on general principles, gives unbounded scope to will. It is an emphatical phrase in fashion among the patriots, that terror is the order of the day. Some years have elapsed since Montesquieu wrote, that the principle of arbitrary governments is freedom.

The Queen was executed the day before yesterday. Insulted during her trial, and reviled in her last moments, she behaved with dignity throughout. This execution will, I think, give to future hostilities a deeper dye, and unite more intimately the allied Powers. It will silence the opposition of those who would not listen to the dismemberment of this country, and, therefore, it may be concluded that the blow by which she died was directed from a distance.

But whatever may be the lot of France in remote futurity, and putting aside the military events, it seems evident that she must soon be governed by a single despot. Whether she will pass to that point through the medium of a triumvirate, of a single chief or a better understood dictatorship, I think it most probable that she will. A great and awful crisis seems to be near at hand. A blow is, I am told, meditated, which will shroud in grief and horror a guilty land. Already the prisons are surcharged with persons, who consider themselves victims. Nature recolls, and I yet hope that these ideas are circulated only to inspire fear.

I am, &c.

TO GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

PARIS, October 18th, 1793.

MY DEAR SIR:

I had hopes until last evening, that the persons, who are to go out as commissioners from hence, would have embarked with Captain Culver, but circumstances have delayed the appointment. The plan which was in agitation, and which will probably be carried into effect, is to send over three or four commissioners, who will be charged with letters of credence, but instructed to conform to the directions of the Board. It is probable that the new minister, immediately on being presented, will ask you to aid in securing the person and papers of the old one. My public dispatch of this day contains a remote hint to lead the investigation of the Secretary of State. I did not choose to be more particular, because you can both give and take the informations you think proper.

I have favored, or rather excited the idea of this procedure, for the following reasons: First, such a public act will place in a contemptible light the fiction connected with M. Genet. Secondly, the seizure of his papers, by exposing his connections with prime meers, will give a lesson to others. And thirdly, the commissioners who exercise this high handed authority will, on reflection, feel the necessity of respecting your Government, lest they should meet a similar fate. Having alarmed their apprehensions, as to the effect which M. Genet's imprudence might produce, and knowing the public and private views of the parties, I have insinuated the advantage which might result from an early declaration on the part of the new minister, that as France has announced her determination not to meddle with the interior affairs of other nations, so he can know only the Government of America. In union with this idea, I told the minister that I had observed an overruling influence in their affairs, which seemed to come from the other side of the channel, and at the same time had traced the intention to excite a seditions spirit in America. That it was impossible to be on a friendly footing with such persons, but that at present a different spirit seemed to prevail. This declaration produced the effect I intended. The minister has himself the wish to go out to America as plenipotentiary, and M. Otto, his principal secretary, having the same wish, they will, I believe, endeavor, while they stay, to put things in good train here.

It may be an important judicial question, how far the minister is protected by the law of nations, after the arrival of his successor. In my opinion the same principles which exempt him from the municipal law, subject him to the will of his sovereign, and of course the aid given to the new minister is not an act of the judiciary but of the executive, performed as an ally and friend, and is merely discretionary. I find that this commission will endeavor to get hold of the debt from America to France by anticipation. If no other reasons militated against the advancement, the advantage of a pledge to satisfy damages, which our citizens may sustain during the present violence, is considerable, and will not, I presume, be overlooked.

I am, &c.

TO GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.
GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

TO GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

SAXIPORT, November 16th, 1793.

Dear Sir:

My last was of the 90th of October. Captain Culver did not, I find, get out of the port of Havre till the first instant. He took with him the medal dies.

The counsel charges me with a balance of nineteen hundred and ninety-three livres, eight deniers, nine sous, totaling me, as you think, by your knowledge, that you would choose that he should draw on you, but that it would be very difficult, and, therefore, prefers receiving payment from me. I shall accordingly advance this sum; and, as I understand from Captain Culver that he paid a considerable part of the disbursements for his vessel by dollars sold to me, I suppose that the owners of the vessel will charge you for the whole. The amount is three livres, eight deniers, nine sous, at that rate being one hundred sixty-six dollars and seventy-nine cents. Wherefore, I will carry to the debit of the United States the sum above mentioned at the same rate, being one hundred sixty-six dollars eleven cents, so that you will owe only two hundred fifty-six dollars and sixty-eight cents to them.

In my last, I had the honor to inform you that the rate of depreciation had continued nearly about what it was on the twelfth of September, viz, two and a half to three for one. But since that time, it has been approaching, and the New Orleans, at Paris, two dollars and ninety-three livres and silver at about one and one-tenth. The reason of this difference will go far to explain the phenomenon of a paper money rising in value, while the sum omitted goes on increasing. Gold is more easily concealed than silver. Whatever is discovered hidden is confiscated, and that which is not hidden is taken to the treasury, to be paid in assignats at par hereafter.

There is, however, another reason; the war tax on the rich, added to the other taxes, disables them from placing their contingent of the forced loan, and, therefore, they are reduced to the necessity of selling what they possess most valuable, and the city of which can alone purchase war safety, fixes their own port as its. Therefore, loan d'ors should at length be under par. I should not be surprised. The list of precious metals and materials in the treasury and joint is already very great; (they say a milliard, or forty millions sterling) it is, I suppose, exaggerated, but it is daily increasing. And, at the rate things go on, Government will have accumulated in the city of Paris, millions of dollars, pearls, precious stones, which will be in a condition to dismiss the assignats from all further employment, and to begin a new system fully handed.

They seem to think, that in this way, provision will be made for two campaigns, and that their enemies, astonished at such an immense resource, will be inclined to treat. A previous difficulty is, however, to be removed; that is to say, some one person, a small number of persons, must be named, who shall hold the unlimited power of treating and of executing the treaty. This will, I suppose, be speedily effected. It will remain to be discovered, whether those who are so sanguine, as to the dispositions of some, if not all of the allied Powers, do not reckon without their teeth.

I hast, by the way, drop one word as to the overthrow of the Catholic religion. It is now expiring under wounds from the true French weapon, ridicule. The people who, five years since, fell down in the dirt as the consecrated matter passed by, now dance the carmagnole in holy vestments, and perform other mummeries, which it might be improper to mention. The late Fruit of Ravenna is a very striking feature in the concomitance of the revolution. You know the opera girl, Sunnier, who is, though very beautiful, next door to an idiot, as to her intellectual gifts. I am told, also, that she is any thing, except what the French call sage. It is she, who lately asked the painter, David, to invent for her (to appear in the Hallet of Paris) some dress which should be more indecent than nakedness. And the painter, it seems, had genius enough to comply with her wish. But I speak only from hearsay, not having been at any of the theatres for nearly two years.

Well, sir, it so happened that this actress, remarkable for fine attitude in dancing, was pitched upon to represent Rameau's Dardanus, and, in the course of the play, stood in the head of the chorus, as a most holy, and was there adored on bended knees by the President of the Convention, and other principal characters. At this spectacle, the devout will unquestionably be scandalized, and it seems, in effect, to be a strong experiment of the burning of legs, arms, and grinders of saints, male and female, with relics from the wood of the original cross. It is an example of undeceiving those who still maintain, that qualities inherent in those crumbling materials. But the dismission of all the bishops and curates is a matter of more serious import. A national economy of near four millions sterling will be thereby effected; but what degree of earthquakes from the diminishing of those ecclesiastical regiments, to give a picture of the whole, I now proceed to state to you the grounds on which different advocates erect their fabric of probabilities. To begin with those who calculate on the success of France. They say that, along the northern frontier, from the ocean to the Ardenois, the campaign is null. That the enemy must winter in his own country, which, not being covered by fortresses or by natural defences, must be open to invasion all winter. That the army in Alsace, at Lautenau and Strasbourg, be not taken, will find it difficult to retreat, and impossible to stay; so that a Burgunegue may ensue. That, from the hills of the Rhine to the Mediterranean, the untouched frontier is now guarded by impassable snows in the winter quarters of the Alps, leaving the republic in fact possession of Savoy. Two Toulois will soon be attacked, with such vigor that it must fall. That the Pyrenean mountains now render all attempts on the part of Spain abortive. And that the flame kindled in the Vendee must be speedily extinguished, so that they will be able with unaltered force to oppose, may attack, their enemies next spring, should they persist in hostility, and hence is added the probability of a peace, on such terms as France may dictate.

On the other hand, it is said that Vaubancies and other adjacent places will cover the heart of Flanders and open that of France. That the sluices, especially in winter, form a sufficient defence for the maritime Flanders, and that a great superiority of cavalry will enable the army to lay waste Picardy, as well as the interior. But, in this case, the troops shall leave the field and go into winter quarters; that Lautenau and Strasbourg surrendered, as it has neither garrison nor magazines; in which case Alsace is irrecoverably lost, and the enemy, who can occupy the passes of the Vosges, will have an easy task to enter Campaign next spring; that in the mountains of Franche Comte a great evil side to be incurred, and that it is only the favorable moment to check out; that the Lorraine are inpatient under the yoke, to which they have been compelled to submit, and will, of course, take arms whenever an opportunity offers; that Toulon cannot be taken by a coup de main, and the same causes, which render the Alps and Pyrenees difficult of approach, can render the same offensive. If Toulon can go to Toulon; that a numerous French army cannot long be sustained there, inasmuch as the great city of Massa, where it was formerly supplied from the coast of Barbary and thence it is inferred, that the attempt on Toulon failing, Provence must be the object of Paris, because the French troops must retire to a more plentiful country, so the duration will cover the possession of the empire. It is not possible by him to carry the accounts of such great discontent and expense, as the dispositions for revolt that, should the Franco Contous engage heartily in the royal cause, the Swiss may be brought into the league, and, pressing towards Lyons as soon as the campaign opens, oblige the French to retreat from Savoy, and perhaps to abandon all to the eastward of the Rhone; but at any rate, to hold a precarious possession of it until the troops, which winter in Piedmont, can advance into Dauphine. I believe that, on almost any hypothesis, it must be admitted that the Dauphinois can dispose of their own country.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

It is contended further, that the insurgents in the Cevennes and Auvergne could easily over-run the country along the Garonne and as far as Bordeaux, because the people are already indisposed, and only kept under by the fear of instant death.

On the Vendee much is said. Fire and sword have been carried through that unhappy country of course, the passions of the inhabitants rising to their highest points, as soon as the immediate danger is removed. It is here that the strong principle of religious fanaticism is to be calculated on. The future conduct cannot be defined, or even conjectured, on the ground of reason merely human. The firm persuasion, that death in the cause of God comes into a mind, is capable of converting madness into heroism. Already the effects have been wonderful, and we observe that very few of the men, who have been sent to subdue the Vendee, have ever returned.

A large party, which, at the lowest estimation, is not less than fifteen thousand, have crossed the Loire, and marched into Lower Normandy and Brittany. That, in this quarter, they will find many congenial spirits, is considered as certain, and also that their measures are combined with the British cabinet. At a distance from their home, nothing remains for them but victory or death. It is in this quarter that the destruction of the Catholic religion is supposed to be most obvious. The clergy being driven to despair, it is supposed that such persons, who possess personal courage, will march in the ranks. The insurgents are commanded by a man, and the troop is composed of the remnant of many battles. Hence, it is concluded that no opposition made to them by the raw levies from Normandy and Brittany can have any effect, and, of course, that the troops in the Vendee must go in support of them. In such a case, the Vendee would rise, like a phoenix from its ashes, far more formidable than ever. That there is a corps of twelve thousand men still remaining on the island of Noirmoutier, and that neighborhood, which will come forward immediately, and recover all that has been lost, and more.

Lastly, it is said that, however splendid may be the financial arrangements, it will be impossible to hold out, unless the people can be taught to eat silver and gold, for that famine, already partially felt, must become general. This assertion is exaggerated, but I think much distress will be experienced on that account.

Having thus given you the pros and cons, I leave you to make up your judgment. For my own part, I have observed that the ministry, generally deceived, both by their hopes and by their fears, and I persist in believing that the fate of so great a country as this must ever depend much more upon interior sentiment, than on exterior operations.

As to the operations of the insurgents, who are supposed to have in view either the town of St. Malo, or an irruption into Normandy, or a march to Paris, I consider the last as the easiest and safest operation; among other reasons, because there are infinitely more savages in that direction, and we know not the courage of the insurgents.

The second, which would look like a serious combination to terminate the war, by re-establishing the monarchy, seems to me somewhat beyond the degree of talents which has hitherto directed the allies; and, on the whole, I conclude that Britain, looking with an eye of caution at the port of Brest, wishes to get possession of St. Malo, and effects the peace along the border, in order to the carriage and safety of the forces, and the winning of the country, whether by force and persuasion towards the possession of that country.

Whether this be the plan is one question; whether it will succeed, is another. Time will discover the answer to one, and, perhaps, to both.

I am, &c.

GOUSNEUR MORRIS.

TO THOMAS JEFFERSON, Secretary of State.

PARIS, November 26, 1792.

DEAR SIR: In mine of the 16th, I omitted to mention the fall of the Brissotin party, and of the Duke of Orleans; but it was a thing so much of course, that you had, doubtless, anticipated it.

I mentioned to you that silver was nearly at par; in effect, it is now under par. Crowns, I am told, sell at two pounds, and I find, and I am informed, that fifty-two livres per mille, and the price, for many years preceding the revolution, was fifty-four, as I am told. For some days past there has been no foreign exchange. There are no buyers, because the person who takes a bill is considered as suspected, and persons suspected are put in prison, and persons in prison are so numerous, that none can get out, because, in the multitude of applications, there is no time to examine the particular complaint.

You will form some more accurate idea of this situation, when I tell you that a young American, by the name of Griffin, having lost at Havre my certificate that he was an American citizen, was taken up. I declined interning for him, and, when he discovered that place certificates had been given out, in that quarter, that all the papers of certificates, when all matters were cleared up to my satisfaction, I applied to the minister, and lie to the Committee of Safety. I have repeated my applications for a month past, and he has repeated his, and as yet nothing satisfactory is done, although I have no doubt of the disposition of Government to give us satisfaction.

In my last letter, at the time of bringing their sores a little more into form, and the minister tells me that, as soon as that is effected, I shall have less frequent reason to complain, and more speedy and effectual redress. I hope this may be the case, for at present it is terrible.

We have, as Mr. Fenwick informs me, ninety-two sail of vessels at Bordeaux. I have formerly mentioned to you the embargo had in that port. It has, at length, produced the greatest distress. The crews have consumed their provisions. The merchants will be saddled with heavy loss and cost. I have made reiterated applications, but the situation of that city has prevented the Comité de Sûreté Public from a direct interference. The comités have persisted in their measure of shutting the port. They promise Mr. Fenwick redress from day to day. The minister cannot promise redress to me, but he promises to try it, and I believe he does try; but I am sure that it is as yet without effect.

In my last conference on the subject, two days ago, after having advanced the various reasons arising from the justice of the demand, and after stating to him the very great hardship of the case, I hinted the extreme bad policy which would deter any American vessel from coming to France, unless reparation were made. I know not, as yet, the effect; but I am sure that all commerce between this country and America must soon terminate, unless a more regular redress is promised. I shall soon make known to all the ports of America will be filled with re-complaints; and, from what Mr. Fenwick writes, I suppose the public servants will be criminated, because France is without a regular government. This, to be sure, is not very just, but it is very natural. A choleric man beats the post which he has struck his head against.

I am, &c.

GOUSNEUR MORRIS.

TO THOMAS JEFFERSON, Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 9, 1793.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your letters of the 7th, 14th, and 17th instant. I thank you for your attention in expediting the expatriation of the Sieur de la Motte, and in obtaining the liberation of the American citizen, Mount- florence. Citizen Griffin is still detained.

In every day, letters which present to me the sad picture of what the commerce of the United States suffers at Bordeaux. Our vessels came out of the feast of treaties; some carried provisions there, others went to take, as freight, cargoes for the French colonies, or foreign ports. Many were to return loaded with corn, flour, salt provyons, and other cattles. All are detained there.

I will not repeat to you, sir, the various observations which I have had the honor to make to you at different times, on this subject: for the principles of justice are so evident, that it is useless to speak of them. I will only mention, therefore, a motive of a different kind, but yet deserving attention. The advantage, not to say the necessity, of obtaining supplies of provision for France, from foreign sources, is readily acknowledged. Every thing, then, which opposes this, is prejudicial to the most important interests of the republic. Now, how can you persuade neutral states, so far from Paris, will it be evident to them that they incur the risk of being detained there? I should ill fulfill my duty, as the representative of a friendly and allied nation, did I not point out to you the danger to which the provisioning of France, and especially the capital, is exposed.

It is true, interest is the moving spring of commercial operations, but the American owners, who have made voyages to France, and who have fallen in with Barbary privateers, and other countries of Europe, have the same local system of feeling, which always influences the judgment, and, consequently, the calculations. Those of your friends, then, who are most attached to you; are the sufferers from this detention. I leave it to your good sense, sir, to infer the consequences, and flatter myself that a just indemnification for this detention, and speedy permission to depart, will soon efface the unpleasant impression of the losses which they have sustained, and that the vessels, which are in the port of Bordeaux, will return loaded with flour in three or four months, and thwart the designs of those who wish to starve the city of Paris.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To M. DEFOUGRES, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, December 19, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

I transmit to you, enclosed, a letter received open from Mr. Cathalan, who has been disappointed in giving the needful surety for the due execution of his office, by the delay of his letters during the siege of Lyons, and other circumstances resulting from local situation. It seems probable that my correspondence with him may be soon cut off: for, if the French army does not speedily get possession of Toulon, I think they will be obliged to abandon the enterprise, from the difficulty of obtaining subsistence. In that case Marseilles will fall of course, as well as the coast of Nice, and my correspondence may not cost much blood and treasure.

The insurgents of Vendée, who had broken into Lower Normandy, seem to have divided themselves into various bands, and to have been attended with a varied success; but, on the whole, the theatre of their operation is considerable. It is natural to suppose that they have received considerable reinforcements by sea. I persist in believing that to be the tender part of the French republic, for certain things are collected together from a very large portion of the people are disposed to a counter revolution; but they dare not stir until a sufficient force shall appear; for they are without arms, or union, or any means of understanding each other, while the examples are so striking and terrifying, that every individual, whatever he may be his political views or principles. It is exercised of that authority which, whether willingly or unwillingly is a matter of indifference, he contributes to support.

Since my last, the new organization, or rather regulation, of the Government sys em has taken place; but, to my poor conception, it appears as inefficient and discordant as ever. If I am not mistaken, it must soon undergo further changes.

I enclose, also, herein, a copy of my letter of the 9th to the minister, by which you will observe that I endeavor to obtain, by a sense of their own interest, the release of our ships from the harbor of Bordeaux, since the sense of justice has not yet possessed, in effect, to an extent at a distance, and in general, it would seem impossible, that this outrageous grievance should be continued; but yet I do not dare to flatter myself with a removal of it. The representatives of the people sent into the departments are vested with unlimited power. In the exercise of it they suspend decrees of the Convention, fine, imprison, in short, do every thing, which to them appears needful for the public safety. They assign their reasons afterwards, if called on by the Convention for that purpose. It seems to be understood, that their acts must not be reversed until after their return, unless they should, indeed, be charged as contre-revolutionnaires, and then every thing is overturned.

I need not dwell on such a state of things, for you will readily draw all the perplexing and vexatious consequences. Happy they, who contemplate them at a distance. A view of what our countrymen suffer, in this respect, so torments me, that it is very difficult to be patient. I am, &c.

To THOMAS JEFFERSON, Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 29th, 1793.

SIR:

A letter which I have just received from the citizen Griffith, informs me that he has been two months in prison, without any charge whatever being exhibited against him. It is a long time since I solicited the liberty of this citizen, with the persuasion of his innocence; but his long detention induces me to apprehend that I may have been mistaken. I pray you, sir, to favor me with the cause of his detention, that I may render an account of the same to the United States.

Daily complaints are addressed to me from Bordeaux, where the embargo is still in full force. Some exceptions in favor of those vessels, said to be loaded on account of that republic, have produced the effect which might have been expected. Some, from a principle of respect for the Government, suppose that these are individual speculations made on the general misfortune, in the hope that the markets of the United States, unembarrassed in consequence of the embargo, will offer an early and advantageous sale for the cargoes, which have lately been despatched to them. Others insist that the speculations in question are on the account of Government, and you may easily conceive the sensations which this idea produces.

However it be, it seems to me necessary, on every possible account, to remedy the evil as soon as possible. I demand justice for my countrymen from the French republic, not only from a sense of duty to the United States, but also from regard to France. Be assured, sir, that your enemies could not mark out for you a course of conduct more to your disadvantage than that which I have just laid before you.

I have the honor to join to this letter, the copy of a petition sent to me by the American citizen John Gray. He informs me that, on his arrival, on the 13th of December, a guard was placed on board his brig, and that a member of the Committee of Subsistence told him that he would be personally responsible if any portion of the rice were discharged, even to nourish his own countrymen. He states that he is a member of the committee, which orders payments of purchases to be made to the committee appointed to purchase goods arriving in neutral vessels. This latter committee told him that they were not provided with the powers requisite to grant to any person whatever the conditions set forth in his petition, and that he must apply to the representatives of the people in this city. These are too much occupied to pay the least attention to his business. He therefore says to me, as I can sell my consignments to the nation nor to individuals, as I am forbidden to distribute it among my countrymen, who are in a state of extreme suffering, let me at least be permitted to depart, and seek commerce and liberty elsewhere.

You will, sir, in the opinion of many things concur to show that I am forbidden to distribute it among my countrymen, who are in a state of extreme sufferings, let me at least be permitted to depart, and seek commerce and liberty elsewhere.

You will, sir, in the opinion of many things concur to show that I am forbidden to distribute it among my countrymen, who are in a state of extreme sufferings, let me at least be permitted to depart, and seek commerce and liberty elsewhere.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To M. DEFOUGRES, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Vol. L
Sir: I do myself the honor of enclosing to you a letter from Mr. Jefferson, announcing my succession to him, as Secretary of State. His resignation, which took place on the 31st ultimo, was accompanied with a general regret, founded on his acknowledged qualities for that department, and the important services rendered by his labors. The President, I am informed, is shortly to be notified of the appointment, by the President to defer all animadversions upon the decree to which it relates, and indeed upon any of the affairs of France, until the temper of that country towards the United States shall be disclosed by your communications, subsequent to the receipt of Mr. Jefferson's letter to you, of the 29th of December last. The journals and pamphlets now sent will inform you of the progress made by Congress on the very interesting subjects which have hitherto occupied them.

Suffer me to tender you, on this first occasion of our correspondence, the great and sincere respect with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

PHILADELPHIA, January 10th, 1794.

TO GOVFRNEUR MORRIS.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have resigned the office of Secretary of State, and that Mr. Randolph, late Attorney General of the United States, is appointed by the President, and approved by the Senate, Secretary of State. He will be so good as to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters not yet acknowledged by me, and will answer in detail such parts of them as may require special answer. I beg leave to conclude this last of public correspondence with you, with very sincere assurances of the great esteem and respect with which I have the honor to be, dear sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH. JEFFERSON.

PHILADELPHIA, January 3rd, 1794.

DEAR SIR: I do myself the honor to transmit herewith duplicates of mine, of the 16th and 26th of November, and the 12th of December last. I also enclose copies of my letters of the 29th of December, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and of his answer; of mine of the 4th of January, introducing the deputation sent up from Bordeaux, and of his of the 26th of November, in reply to it.

The young man, Mr. Griffith, whom I mentioned in mine of the 26th of November, is at length out of prison; but he is still in the State, under the name of Hoskins, still remains in confinement, and this merely because the multiplicity of business before the committee prevents them from attending to any thing.

I learn that the number of persons arrested in this city amounts to fifteen thousand, and that through the republic is more than tenfold more numerous. The petitions before them could not be read through in less than two days, supposing ten hours a day appropriated to that purpose; and, as the arrestsations are daily continued, those who are confined are in a sad and hopeless condition.

The wiser part of those who are at the head of affairs are sensible that such severe measures must prove injurious, perhaps fatal; but they do not appear so as the advocates for the unfortunate, lest they should partake of their situation. Late experiments justify their apprehensions, and, if I may judge, the outs, who wish to be in, will use this as a lever to overturn the power of their opponents; so that the general good delivery, if effected, will come from those who inveigh against, and those who are thought to be, the leaders of such a measure, exposes to the charge of moderatism and you will observe here, that as Bristosisme succeeded to Feveistisme, which has succeeded to aristocratisme, so moderatism is now heir to all the odium of Brissosisme. Robespierre has luckily hit on the term ultra-revolutionnaire, and brought it with good success into the field against the term centre-revolutionnaire; but it seems likely that moderatism will prove too hard for ultra-revolutionnaire.

I cut short these observations to give you a sketch of the state of parties. Previous to which, however, lest I should forget it, I must mention, that Thomas Paine is in prison, where he amusing himself with publishing a pamphlet against Jesus Christ. I do not recollect whether I mentioned to you that he would have been executed along with the rest of the Brissosims if the adverse party had not viewed him with contempt. I incline to think that, if he is quiet in prison, he may have the good luck to be forgotten. Whereas, should he be brought much into notice, the long suspended axe might fall on him. I believe he thinks that I ought to claim him as an American citizen but, considering his birth, his naturalization in this country, and the place he has held, I doubt much the right, and I am sure that the claim would be, for the present, at least inexpedient and injurious.

There seems to be at present three parties among the doers of the day: for I except those who are entirely indisposed to the order of government. The first may be called the Democratic party, with whom Robespierre is connected, apprehending that the people, so often disappointed in the expectations held out to them, may, at length, by a kind of general effort, arising not from any particular plot or conspiracry, but from the universal sense of oppression, overturn the whole affair, which, whatever may be its future and national effect, must necessarily occasion their immediate and personal ruin.

The second may be called the Partisan party, being those who wish, by a new blow from the populace of this city, to make a second edition of the piece acted on the 31st of May last, and thereby put themselves in the places of such as may be then sent to the gallows.

The third may be called the Ministerial party; and although the ministers are, at present, no more than a kind of clerks, subject to the imperative, and too often the impertinent, mandates of a committee, yet, as they are supported privately by those who wish to bring forward the constitution, as they are acting in the interest of men doing business with committees, to see how much is sacrificed, and how much neglected, and thence show the great abuses inseparable from that sort of government, they have more weight and consistancy than would, at first sight, be imagined. As the present actors have more energy, as well as more experience, than those who suffered them selves to be elbowed off the stage on the 21st of May, I presume that things will be brought much sooner to a crisis.

There is at present a plot in petto, which may, perhaps, blow up the Dantonists. I have heard different versions of it, and, therefore, will not give you any of them; because it is well known that matters of that kind undergo many changes, and may be exhibited, and, besides, the whole affair may die away, especially if any general danger should oblige the parties to be friends for a month or two longer. Let parties rise or fall as they may, I do not think the present form of government, by committees, can long stand. We have seen such a system fall by its own weight, when exercised on a much smaller scale, and any one who has any thing to do with committees here comes, which is the case, to step towards the democratic party.

The successes of the republic will give pleasure to all those who are attached to France; for, whatever may be the opinions as to a government, which may undergo a dozen changes, it seems to be demonstrable from facts, that the plan of dismemberment, which I long since communicated, really exists, and it is that plan which has foil ed the allies. Admitting what has been asserted by persons in a situation to know the truth, and deeply interested to prove the contrary of their assertion, that nine-tenths of the nation are inimical to the Government, it is an undisputed truth that ninety-nine hundredths are opposed to all ideas of a dismemberment, and will fight to prevent it. Hence it happens that the few who are attached to any part of the frontiers, except the inhabitants of Alsace, who have, in their hearts, Germans; and hence, also, it happens, that the Vendée has been so vigorous.
in its operation, as in that quarter they fought simply to restore the ancient government and religion. If the allies had given them aid, God knows what would have been the consequence; but as the clear object, when aid was at length offered, consisted only in possessing themselves of strongholds for their own use, the whole plan has fallen through, and a great deal of the human sacrifices and the destruction of the people in that quarter at near a million of souls. It certainly has been very great, though not, perhaps, more than half that number. I am much mistaken if the spirit of revolt be quelled, although, for want of opportunity, it may not again perhaps break out.

I am gratified rather than pained. Perhaps, if the evacuation had not been decided on, it would have been kept; but certainly the brisk attacks of the French precipitated very much the measures of the enemies. In my opinion, it was a great blunder not to throw successers into that place: for, if it had been held a little longer, the French army must have been forced to retreat to save the state.

In like manner, it is now evident, that if Bordeaux, Marseilles, Lyons, and Toulon, had all declared at the same time, instead of showing their evil dispositions one after the other, the whole southern part of France was irrevocably lost to the republic. And if the good faith of the enemy had not been suspected, this union of measures would have been the case. The war would have been delivered up, if the Emperor had not been desirous to take it in his own name, instead of that of Louis the Seventeenth. The allies, not being able to possess themselves of this place, (in which the plan of surrendering was discovered and its effects prevented) and failing at the same time in their blockade of the town, were put out longer than they had hoped to be long; they were not known, of course they were attacked on all sides, and by a vast superiority of numbers. At first, the French were repulsed everywhere; but the repetition of attacks, (for there were in the whole between thirty and forty) wearied the defendants, who, by no resource of the military art, could bear up against the bodily fatigue of constant fighting. The physical constitution of the French is more adapted to this service than perhaps any other on earth. To retreat became necessary, and a retreat once began was continued from necessity, because the French kept pouring in fresh supplies of men when opposed, and continued their rapid advance wherever they were victorious. Mayence and Fort Louis could alone stop their pursuit.

Nor is it to be supposed that they had not already formed designs of that kind, but the consumption of provisions must diminish in the same proportion. The fear of famine seems to be general; and although I flatter myself that its greatest ravages may be avoided, yet I do not readily see how the resistance of the next campaign is to be effected, if the whole force engaged against France should continue its operation.

I am promised daily, that the embargo laid on our ships in the port of Bordeaux shall be taken off, and an indemnification be granted for the losses which it has occasioned. I have never been able to learn why it was laid; but have some reason to believe that just ground of suspicion had been given as to the voyages, the cargoes, and even the character of the men by whom the deputies were sent to the committee. But these committees, and will, I trust, be successful, as it had already been resolved on to give adequate redress, and I presume that they will not impair the favorable intentions which existed previous to their arrival.

The ratio between paper and the precious metals remains about the same as it was when I last quoted it. Foreign exchanges have received a sad stroke. Monsieur Cambon had declared, last June, that, by the first of January the exchange should be at par. As the measures of policy, on which his prediction was founded, had not met with all the success desired, it became necessary to supply the deficiency by force. You will learn with some surprise, perhaps, that all the funds belonging to French citizens in foreign countries have been put in requisition. Every man is called on to declare not only his own property abroad, but also that of others, which may have come to his knowledge the whole under the usual penalty of the guillotine. Such sums as are in a manner put in requisition is prohibited from being exchanged for money, so far as they can serve to pay expenses whatever. If this measure furnishes the expected resource, which I doubt, it cuts off all future hope. And if it does not furnish a very great resource, there will exist, in the national affairs, a deficit of serious magnitude; for they must face the demand abroad, or reconstitute the hope of supplies from hence; and on the expectation of such supplies depends the issue of the whole, and not of absentees.

It is a long time since I had the honor to mention to you Mr. Francis Coffyn, acting at Dunkirk as consul of the United States. This worthy man’s interference in the affair of the Little Cherub (which, by the by, remains yet undecided) has, through the intrigues of those concerned in the previous project of a French naval officer in prison as a spy, and Calonne’s talk about cases, brought it to the court of Calonne, while minister, on the affairs of the town of Dunkirk, which had, it seems, some demand on the court. I have, in his absence, desired his son to attend to the affairs formerly in the hands of his father, and as he is a man of business, and by no means deficient in understanding, I trust that he will be able to conduct them well.

I cannot, however, avoid repeating my wish, that consuls and vice consuls were appointed everywhere for, there is great need of them. It would have been happy had some one been named in this city, as consul, or by any other name or title, who might have followed up the committees, waited day after day in their ante-chamber, and the like, so as to puzzle them into decisions. The ministers, as I have already mentioned, stand in such a situation that they dare not push the committees very hard. You will easily see that I cannot quit the regular line of application through the channel the Government has thought proper to institute for the purpose. And, indeed, besides the impropriety of putting a person of this description in a situation of intriguant, or, at best, of a solicitor, I know that it would be a useless, as well as pernicious sacrifice of the national dignity.

I have been requested by some one to state the reason for that purpose; but I have many objections to that measure, among which is it so small one that I have not the right to it; and, moreover, the state of things has long been, and still continues to be, so critical, that every man having even the shadow of a public character, is liable to the danger of compromising himself every instant.

Hitherto, therefore, I have left every one to choose his own agent for the conduct of his business, because the blame, which must inevitably fall, will then lie on the individual. I say that blame, because I am not prepared to say from appeals to any good intentions, I venture to think there is no such thing, but that we are led by speculations, and imagine that nothing more is necessary, in order to realize them, than to bring forward something in the shape of an American. Facts are very different from such appearances.

I suppose that the new minister has, or shortly will have arrived at Philadelphia. I did not see him: for, just as he was about to take me into a dispute which put them all out of humor, although they were as possible they were wrong. It is not worth while to go into the history of it, because the affair is blown over, and because the conduct of men in the midst of a revolution is not to be judged so severely as under a regular government.

It is a long time since I learnt the attack of the Algerines, but as I knew that advice had been sent off to you, I did not mention it, not having an immediate opportunity. I shall have occasion to say something on the subject shortly.

I am, &c.

GOUGNEVER MORRIS.
DEAR SIR:—

This day last was of the 21st January. I am still without any advices from you since your letters by Captain Culver, which I attribute to the interruptions to which all communication with this country is exposed, and which, for that, among many other reasons, I much lament. Amid the political storms which vex this hemisphere, the opinion of the United States is the polar star which should guide my course, but which is totally concealed from my view.

Hokins, my imprisonment. I mentioned in my last, has been liberated. I mentioned also that there had been some feeble attempts to adopt lenient measures, and substitute a government of law to the present system; but hinted, at the same time, my apprehensions lest they would prove unsuccessful. I have been justified, for the late decrees, that this prediction was founded on a mistaken opinion, and that entire reliance is placed on severity and the resulting fear. This may, perhaps, succeed, but is exposed to a double danger. First, it facilitates the intrigues and the operations of the foreign enemy, by exciting attachment to the former, and aversion to the present Government; and, secondly, it is a manifest violation of the principles laid down for an abject submission to an usurper, should any such arise in the course of successful war, either civil or foreign.

I have mentioned Mr. Paine's confinement. Major Jackson—who, by the by, has not given me a letter from you, which he says was merely introductory, but could not frame it with the care and accuracy required de Sûrèté Générale, as a letter addressed to a foreigner, and must, if he were to get Mr. Paine out of jail, and, with several other Americans, has presented a petition to that effect, which was referred to that committee and the Comité de Salut Public. This last, I understand, slighted the application as totally irregular; and some time elapsed before the petitioners procured an answer for an active submission to an usurper, should any such arise in the course of successful war, either civil or foreign.

The minister's letter to me, of the first Vendee, of which I enclose a copy, contains the answer to my reclamation. I sent a copy to Mr. Paine, who prepared a long answer, and sent it to me by an Englishman, whom I do not know.

I told him, as Mr. Paine's friend, that my present opinion was similar to that of the minister, but I might, perhaps, see occasion to change it, and, in that case, if Mr. Paine wished it, I would go on with the claim, but that it would be well for him to consider the result that, if the Government meant to release him, they had already a sufficient ground; but if not, I could not permit him to embark on his own business abroad, as a Frenchman, or as an American, he must be amenable to the tribunals of France for his conduct while he was a Frenchman, and he may see in the fate of the Brissotins, that to which he is exposed. I have heard no more of the affair since; but it is not impossible that he may force a decision, which, as far as I can judge, would be to his advantage, for he had a more reliable character than the individual lately the intertempore use of ardent spirits has, I am told, considerably improved the small stock which he originally possessed.

The plan communicated to you of requisition on all bankers, merchants, and others, to furnish bills for their funds on demand, and receipt payment in assignats at par, has totally failed, as might have been supposed. It was the boy in the fable who killed the goose which laid golden eggs. As a succedaneum, they have obliged the same people to execute joint and several obligations (bullets solidaires) payable to the bearer for fifty millions of livres, say a forced loan of two millions sterling. These are to be negotiated in foreign countries, and the nation agrees to take them up again hereafter. What is somewhat extraordinary is, that a few of the moneyed men seem to believe in the success of this measure; but I own I can scarcely conceive of it: for, if foreigners believe in the ultimate success of the republic, and in the integrity of her future government, the intervention of private credit would be unnecessary; and, if not, it would be strange that such a large public overture should meet with such indifference from the individuals who have signed, must defeat all hope of recovery; and because, if the republic, succeeding, should be deficient in her integrity, the individuals would be, of course, covered by law against all judicial pursuit. Add to this, that there is a kind of popular prejudice against assignats, by which the richest men bind themselves for four times as much as it is worth. On this pin, however, is suspended, for the present, all hope of facing numerous and pressing engagements for indispensable supplies from abroad.

I told you in former letters that I apprehended a great scarcity of food for the present, or rather the coming campaign, should the allied Powers persist in their hostility. They do persist, though the King of Prussia, taking advantage of circumstances, insists on being paid for the blood of his subjects. Food is already very scarce. Flesh is hardly to be obtained in Paris, and the drought of last summer reduced the crop of garden produce so low that it is now nearly exhausted, and will require addition to be expected for three long months.

The enemy is collecting himself for an immense effort on the northern frontier. The troops of the republic have long been assembling in the same quarter. Will the supplies be sufficient for the army and for the capital? That is a question of serious magnitude. If Paris runs short, the revolution is done. If the army disbands, the game is over. I apprehend, in the year 1792, that matter will have been settled for it in vain suppose that that terror was, by superior force, to receive a counter direction, the Austrians or any other regime, would, I think, be submitted to without the slightest struggle.

The Vendee, so often and so totally destroyed in reports made to the Convention, seems still to exist, and to wax more formidable every day. The accounts of the revolt, for instance, that five thousand men should collect an army in that quarter, I believe it will become, on both sides, a war of extermination. Torrents of blood have already been shed there, and, if the accounts from thence be not greatly exaggerated, another campaign like the last would convert the country into a desert. Barère, in assigning, at the bar of the Convention, a terrible severity, said, that the Vendee, which up to this time is weekly with six hundred large barge, now wants provisions!

I have often had occasion to mention the embargo laid at Bordeaux, and the sufferings of our countrymen conse- quently. It is said that the departure of a large third-rate will restore the embargo.

The day preceding their arrival the minister told me that every thing should be settled to my satisfaction in two or three days. The deputies, to whom I communicated this intelligence, seemed very apprehensive lest their claims for damages should be referred to persons on the spot, which, I own, appeared to me both fair and natural; but fancied at the same time, that they were determined to have every thing adjusted in their own way, and were well convinced that their representations must have the desired effect: as they seemed, moreover, to be filled with suspicions of Mr. Fenwick, which seemed to me ill founded, and therefore very liable to adopt them in respect to any other of the public servants, I thought it best to leave the matter to their own management. I asked them, therefore, what they wished me to do, after having shown what had already been done. They hesitated a little, as is usual when men have not thought of any course of procedure before they begin to act. They desired an introduction to the minister, which I immediately gave, and they to him next day, but came back much out of humor. They afterwards presented a petition to the Convention, which was referred to the Committee of Public Business, and there the affair seems to have ended: for all their urgency to that committee has not got them one inch forward.

I apprehend that they may have injured their own claim, by interfering unnecessarily in other matters one instance of which I shall presently have occasion to mention. They have at length called on me to make new demands, though they are not aware of the change in the dispositions of their masters. I expect that they would have gone back, but find that they determine to remain still longer in Paris, which may, I fear, prove detrimental.

However, on the 27th of last month, the day after I received their letter, I wrote to the minister on the subject. I sent with the copy of the letter a postagent's receipt, remarking that the demand had been made by French frigates, contrary not only to our own treaty, but to every principle of the law of nations. These captures create great confusion, must produce much damage to mercantile men, and are a source of endless and well founded complaint. Every post brings me piles of letters about it from all quarters, and I see no remedy. You had perhaps some difficulty in getting out a ship during the late war, but you may be very long before it can be obtained. And, in the mean time, if I would give way to the clamors of the injured parties, I ought to make demands very like a declaration of war.

What are the affairs of such captures to me to guess the intentions of Government, and, indeed, sir, the responsibility is great and distressing. Our countrymen here find that it is the easiest thing in the world to carry any point with the committees, until they have tried. In the mean time, I am exposed to their clamors in this country, and most probably to their censures in my own, for not performing impossibilities. In order to complete the business, nothing more is necessary than that the rules of this republic, wearied with my complaints, should apply for my recall, in order to get rid of a troublesome fellow. I think it is very likely to happen, if it be not already done. I beg your pardon, sir, for saying so much of myself, but it is a troublesome thing to navigate in the dark between Seylly and Charybdis, without chart or compass.

I send you enclosed the copy of a letter I received on the 5th of last month from a number of Americans here, (including therein some of the Bordeaux deputies) with a copy of my answer of the 6th. I sent copies of both to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and called on him shortly after to mention several things, some of which I have already mentioned. Among them was the long depending affair of the Laurens, at Havre, which was made in her case, violating our treaty. I took occasion then to mention again, what I had said in answer to the letter from my countrymen, viz. that I was in hourly expectation of instructions respecting those decrees. I told him that, until they arrived, I should forbear any formal application; but, under the existing circumstances, I would, in a friendly spirit, wait an interval in which the Government might have time to better anticipate the arrival of those instructions, and by a voluntary step preserve an air of dignity and good faith. But it, on the contrary, they meant to insist in the violation, then it would be well to consider the events likely to take place, and to provide for them in season. He felt much obliged by this mode of treating the affair, and told me that he would give me a more favorable opportunity in the case of the Laurens, and that he would endeavor to procure a speedy and satisfactory decision.

You will find herein the report made by Jean Bon St. Andre, which is fully confirmatory of the treaty. Some little matters (errors) of form have imposed the execution of the final decision, and the communication which he is to make to me; but I thought it a proper moment to bring forward the case of the Enterprise, which is the subject of the above mentioned letter from Ingraham and others to me. I, therefore, having previously concerted measures with the minister prepared a short petition from Captain Ingraham to the Comité de Salut Public, as an appeal from the decision of the executive council, and sent it to the minister, who forwarded it to the committee, and intends to support before them the principles of the petition, and labor for a reversal of the judgment.

I send you enclosed the copy of my letter to the minister, of the 25th of last month, respecting the imprisonment of our vice-consul at Havre, and of his answer. I shall pursue this business to obtain his liberation. Poor Cadyn is still confined.

While on the subject of violations of personal liberty, it is proper to communicate a step, which late circumstances induced me to take. I have already hinted at a little dispute I had with the Comité de Sécure Générale. It arose about the arrest of a person in my house. Particular reasons prevented me from pushing the matter to a serious issue then. I shall, perhaps, take occasion to communicate them hereafter, when I am sure of my conveyance.

The committee were made sensible that they had done wrong, and that was all which I thought necessary.

They have since (though not towards me) gone greater lengths, by arresting the chargé d'affaires of Malta. This rendered it proper to make a more pointed animadversion on their conduct, and produced the enclosed pieces of the 27th of February. The minister's answer, of the 11th Ventose, is also enclosed, and I find by the gazettes, that on the report of the Comité de Salut Public, a decree has been passed in the premises, of which I have not yet received the information from the minister.

The Comité de Salut Public and the Comité de Sécure Générale are not, I am told, on the best terms together, and will probably come to something more overt than words ere long. It is of little importance under what forms parties or factions may present themselves; their real origin is in the political form of the society; and if any thing prevails, it is in the long run of party advantages. It is in that character that the approaching famine will be the signal for hostilities between the contending parties; but it would seem not over prudent in any man, or set of men, to aim at power under present circumstances.

I am, &c.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

SAINT-ONGE, April 10th, 1794.

My Dear Sir:

In a letter which I had the honor of writing to you on the 10th of January, 1793, I gave you some traits respecting M. Westermann, and as my public despatches had already communicated the plans of Danton, you will not have been surprised at what has lately happened to them. I wrote to you on the 25th of June, that those who ruled the Government then, that is to say, that those who were supposed to have the power, that those who were supposed to have the confidence of the people, were such as I should have wished to see in government; and among those, M. Westermann, with good luck as by good management, and that, at any rate, part of the crew would be thrown overboard. Those I had then particularly in view were Chabot and company, of which company a part still exists.

I observed that the nature of the event was bad, and added what seemed to be the probable termination. I therein observed that, whether France would pass to that point through the medium of a trumvirate, or other small body of men, seemed as yet undecided; but that I thought it most probable she would. At that period things were wound up very high, and, ever since, the utmost uncertainty has prevailed, as a strong state, as on the point which we are come.

I enclose herein a copy of what I wrote on the 12th of last month, since which, both the Dantonists and Hebelists are crushed. The fall of Danton seems to terminate the idea of a trumvirate. The chief who would in the beginning, by the union of the rights of the Idea and of the People, would seem that the high road must be laid through the Comité de Salut Public; unless, indeed, the army should meddle. But, as to the army, no character seems as yet to have appeared with any prominent feature; neither is there so much discipline as would give an aspiring character just ground of hope. It is a wonderful thing, sir, that, four years of convulsion, among four and two millions of people, has brought forth no one, either in civil or military life, whose head would fit the cap which fortune has woven.

Robespierre has been the most consistent, if not the only consistent. He is one of those of whom Shakespear's Caesar speaks to his forlorn companion: "He loves no spars as thou dost, Antony." There is no imputation against him for corruption. He is far from rich, and still farther from appearing so. It is said that his idios is ambition has led me to think that the establishment of the republic would, all things considered, be most suitable to him. Whether he thinks so practicable, which I will not pretend to answer, nor how far such establishment may appear to him practicable. If it be supposed that a man in his situation should absolutely despair of the republic, and have recourse to the only other foreign alliance, as a means of maintaining, much less of preserving, the supreme power, then it might be supposed that Danton's plan would be by such person carried into execution. Yet all this supposition is but conjectural formation of new conjecture.

And what are the allies about? Forming schemes to be executed, if they should continue to be allies. I am, &c.

GOUGUENEUR MORRIS.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

My Dear Sir:

This letter will accompany the duplicate of my last to Mr. Jefferson, of the 6th of March. Be so kind, I pray you, as to let him know, which of my letters are missing. I presume there must be great claus in my correspondence. I have received the acknowledgment of very few of my letters; and yet I have written always by duplicates, frequently by triplicates and quadruplicates.

Permit me, my dear Sir, to congratulate you on your appointment. It is honorable to you, and, I believe, useful to the United States. The more so, as your convictions respecting our form of Government will restore that harmony to our Executive departments, a want of which gave much pleasure to the enemies of America. I flatter myself, also, that your habits of attention to business will produce a more active correspondence with the public servants abroad.

The senator did me some time ago to mark the state of depreciation to him; which I continued to do, but omitted in my last, because it continued nearly in the same situation as when I last communicated it. The fact is, that there is now no certain or steady rate, because, as you will see by the gazettes, dealers in that business are frequent changes of rates, put in, and pull out, and change them on different days, which makes any thing to be paid on payment in specie; and yet bullion is higher than it was before the assignats were issued. The exact rate I do not know. Louis d'ors, I am told, are much higher than they were, owing, as I have formerly mentioned, to the greater facility of conveying or transporting them.

I can only point out that there is something very like a famine, which has indeed in many parts put on its most distressing forms. Men have literally expired for the want of food, with the means of buying it in their possession. It can be bought. Luckily, or rather providentially, the season advances with a rapidity which might have been expected from the very season; and, what is more, I receive information of a phenomenon. Apricots as large as a pigeon's egg, in the middle of April, and that in the latitude of forty-eight to forty-nine. These facts, which, in common cases, would be more properly communicated to an agricultural than to a minister of State, are of vast importance: for the great bulk of this nation live chiefly on vegetable substances; and in the south, where the scarcity was greatest, I presume, from what I see here, that the earth begins to furnish a tolerable support to its inhabitants. A frost, such as we experienced in the end of last May, would do more towards the starvation system than all the armies and fleets in Europe.

In my last letter I concluded that the present situation of America, persisted in this state, would ruin his plan for his country. I am still of the same opinion, though it is confidently asserted that he means to withdraw, leaving only his contingent as a co-state of the empire. His past conduct gives no room to suppose that a sacred regard to his engagements taken would prevent him from abandoning his allies; but I think there is a stronger tie of a common interest, Austria and England, particularly the latter, are more pointedly interested than he. I conclude, therefore, that the business will wind up by a good round subsidy, (perhaps a million sterling) and in consequence of it a very large body of Prussian troops added to the army in Flanders.

By garrisoning a few posts along the Rhine, and leaving the country exposed to incursion, the allies will force the German militia to defend themselves; and as to the ravages which may be committed, a few casual phrases will, perhaps, be the only compensation which the sufferers will ever receive. If this conception of the business be just, the Prussian cabinet will keep up the idea that it means to recall its armies, until the last moment, and those armies will then turn off, or, in the Low Countries, or perhaps be transported by water. Something or other of an extraordinary nature in agitation on both sides: for the armies have been long looking at each other, without striking, or even aiming a blow. I have no doubt but the allies conniv at the public discontents here, and certainly they have some foundations but as, on their side, there is no one chief who can act decisively, or form solid engagements in a way that it is not probable they will take the advantage of those discontents which certainly would not escape the intelligent mind of a Caesar or an Alexander.

In the course of my correspondence with your predecessor, I have endeavored to communicate to him my views of men and things, and to prepare his mind for events which I feared might have a course of time taken place. This is what I conceived to be one of the most important duties of my station; and if I have not been more full and particular, it is because the names of those who, in their turn, were to rule and to perish, seemed to me of secondary moment; and because, judging, in my lamentable dearth of intelligence, from such feeble lights as I could collect in scattered rays from different quarters, it seemed to me that my letters would, therefore, be more acceptable, had I been deceived as to facts and probabilities, or capable of communicating sentiments and opinions I did not entertain.

It has appeared to me that Paris decides for the whole of France, and that the sans culottes (alias populace) decide for Paris; that, of course, factions would continually arise, waging inexplicable war with each other, and that the momentary influence of each, being founded on fear only, could not take on any stable form, or possess any durable existence; that each new stroke of the guillotine would weaken the force of liberal sentiment, and, consequently, the advantage of the forces of a free and constitutional state.

I must repeat here, that plots and conspiracies are not to be attributed to the genius and temper of those who plot and conspire, but to the state of society: for it would be, I think, inconceivable, to imagine that, in a given number of individuals, born in different conditions or places, there should be a very great disproportion of talents and qualities. It seems more regular to believe that, in a virtuous and just society, the good qualities are drawn into action, and the bad repressed by despair of success; while, on the contrary, in a depraved and vicious society, the good must remain inactive for the want of confidence and support, while the bad, released from the fear of observation, find a fine and populous field for the exercise of insidious power, of which each individual pursues his personal interest unrestrained by moral principle.

After this preamble, which might better, perhaps, have been spared, I proceed to mention, that many different schemes have been, I think, carried on to destroy the existing Government. As to the idea that foreign Powers excited the parties, I am not disposed either to adopt or reject it. I do not consider it as being at all necessary to the formation of a conspiracy, although very necessary to the destruction of those engaged in it. I explain: The pride of the people anciently at all times gave rise to factions, and the perfidies of their vassals, which would be called rebellions, and all its committees, thrown into the river; and therefore it is useful to oppose that pride, by stating every attempt to overturn the Government, as originating with the foreign foe. And I remark here, that, in the different reports made respecting these conspiracies, and the accusations against those engaged in them, it is as it were taken for granted, that the people would quietly submit to those who, by a coup de main, should put themselves in possession of self-created power.
I do not say that this is true, but I have no doubt that a certain duration of general terror, as the basis of a system of government, must inevitably produce that effect. The period of duration, required for any particular nation, with regard to its particular character, but more on the morality of the people. To reason, therefore, a priori on this subject, our ideas must take on as much of an algebraic as logical form.

In examining historical facts, on the contrary, we are too apt, I think, to ascribe to individuals the events which are produced by general causes. The two factions lately crushed may be called the Dantonian and Hebertist. I hope that you have seen, in the former a combination with foreign Powers, in the latter a collection of enthusiasts, to produce a victory over the government, which they were glad to believe that Danton feared from them, and hoped from those who destroyed him. The Hebertists, however, may be considered, I think, as the anti-Conventional, and the Dantonists as the Royal faction. I except always for the various changes which have taken place; if I am disposed to make a little, if any, share. The more ardent spirits among them flew off long ago, either into foreign countries or the Vendé. I speak in generals, not universals. Those who remain are of that waxen substance called the men of property, who in foreign wars count so much, and civil wars so little.

Danton always believed, and, what is worse as to himself at least, always maintained, that a popular system of government for this country was absurd; that the people were too ignorant, too inconstant, and too corrupt, to support a legal administration; that, habituated to obey, they required a master; and that, even if they had been educated in the principles of freedom, and joined to the energy of sentiment the force of habit, yet, like ancient Rome, they had reached the period in which Cato was a madman, and Caesar a necessary evil. His conduct was in perfect union with these principles when he acted; but he was too volupturn for his ambition, too indolent to acquire supreme power. Moreover, his object seems rather to have been great wealth than great fame. He has fallen at the feet of Robespierre.

As to the Hebertists, whatever may have been the ultimate view of some, I presume that the greater number had nothing more in view than a second edition of the 21st of last May. The destruction of all these chiefs has given great power to the Comité de Salut Public, whose monthly renewal is so much a thing of course, that they may be considered as a permanent body. Hence it follows, that the next considerable party ought to arise there. The Hebertists believed the Convention to be so low in public opinion, that they could overturn it without the aid of its own members. They were deceived, or at least they were anticipated. The Dantonists supposed, that, in the want of respect for their chiefs, the farmer of his neighbors would, if I am permitted to say it, have a little, if any, share. The more ardent spirits among them flew off long ago, either into foreign countries or the Vendé. I speak in generals, not universals. Those who remain are of that waxen substance called the men of property, who in foreign wars count so much, and civil wars so little.

Danton always believed, and, what is worse as to himself at least, always maintained, that a popular system of government for this country was absurd; that the people were too ignorant, too inconstant, and too corrupt, to support a legal administration; that, habituated to obey, they required a master; and that, even if they had been educated in the principles of freedom, and joined to the energy of sentiment the force of habit, yet, like ancient Rome, they had reached the period in which Cato was a madman, and Caesar a necessary evil. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

Paris, May 6th, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

This will accompany duplicates of my letters of the 15th and 18th of last month. The season continues fine and forward, with every appearance of an abundant crop; and, judging from the productions now at market, the harvest will precede the usual time near a month.

You will see in the gazettes the taking of Landrecy, and the foreign papers, particularly the English papers, will give you the details on that subject which we want. There has been much fighting in that quarter, and although, as is usual, the success may have been varied, it appears definitively to have rested with the allies, seeing that they have not been forced to raise the siege, but have taken the town.

I am told that the republic now feed ten hundred and thirty thousand infantry, and ninety-four thousand cavalry. This is an immense army, even on paper; and although we may easily suppose that there is some exaggeration in the numbers given, and that some abuses in the administration, and that casualties diminish considerably those numbers really on the rolls, still it will appear that the force is very great. The daily expense of the provision department is about a million of dollars.

I learn, also, that the Comité de Salut Public have agreed to be unanimous, so that the minority always were to the majority, and that of Sureté Générale must, I think, be either melted into one, or else have a contest for superiority. At present, the efficient power of the State is lodged with those committees, and the former begin to publish their decrees, which have the force of laws, modifying, adding to, and repealing, those of the Convention, which for the most part have not yet fully appeared in the extent of the new authority that has been given by the wide and deep effect of the terror which has been exercised by such frequent and abundant executions as take place throughout France. I think they may do what they please, provided the revolutionary tribunals remain in their places. We shall see what system is to follow therefrom.

I am told that Robespierre's wish is to return to private life, so soon as the peace shall have established that form of government which may be finally adopted here.

Enclosed you will have the copy of a letter of the 23d of April, from Mr. Anderson, at Nantes, to me, and of my answer.

I am, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To EDMUND RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Sandymount, May 31st, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

This will accompany a duplicate of my last of the 6th instant, also copies of my letter of the 10th instant to the Commissioner of Foreign Relations, of his answer of the 4th Pririal, or 3d instant, and of my reply of the 8th.
You will perceive that Mr. Warden had been so imprudent as to lodge the despatches entrusted to his care with the justice of peace at Morbax. This was done by the advice of John Dicot, acting there as consul agent. Whether that advice is to be attributed to ignorance or design, I know not but it might easily have been foreseen that he despatch would not be safe. I hope your despatches are in cipher, if they contain any thing which is not of a very public nature.

The gazettes will communicate to you such intelligence as we have here, and you will obtain from other channels much fuller and earlier intelligence, as to what is called news, than which it is in the power of man to give you. This letter may be long ere it reaches you, for I have not any present opportunity; and such is the state of things that, unless letters be committed specially to the care of some trusty person, there is very little chance that they will ever reach you.

I have not received a line from you, nor from your predecessor, posterior to the despatches by Captain Culver, desiring M. Genet's recall.

We have had a sort of novel, or farce, lately, the subject of which was, that certain commissioners had arrived from America, and gentlemen of the name of Jefferson, Monroe, and Madison, in the garden of the Louvre. Mr. Jefferson is one of them, that he has been in Paris, and is gone to Switzerland, where a Congress is to be held of the neutral Powers. And, what is more extraordinary, this intelligence comes through a confidential channel, in general well informed. Now, as I do not conceive it possible that any commissioners from the United States should arrive in Paris, or that any of those gentlemen, with one exception, should have arrived in France, I, who know the character of that gentleman, doubt the invention lies, and also what can have been the object: for, as to foreign Powers, they cannot be the dupes, and, as to the people here, they think more of the guillotine than of any thing else.

In my last, I mentioned to you the omnipotence of the two committees. Apparently, this term is applicable only to that of Saint-Public; but the inquisitorial powers lodged with the other (and by means of which they can arrest whom they please) give them great weight in the general scales. It is, I presume, needless to repeat what is mentioned to me, that the Convention, as well as all those other authorities, who once could influence its deliberations, view with jealousy, but with apprehension and deep awe, those colossal pillars of the republic, which they have raised, or permitted to be raised. This, as well as the ferment inherent in the nature of all such bodies, you will certainly perceive at the first glance, and your judgment will seize the remote consequences intuitively. On my part, therefore, it is more fitting to observe that these consequences are more remote than might be supposed. A conspiracy which took place in 1792, against the liberty which all fortant nations believe especially such as is founded on fear, and the certainty of complete ruin, should they be overthrown, will long smother all minor discontent: moreover, the apprehension from the foreign enemy will, in my opinion, both promote their concord and support their power. You must imagine that my state of mind is such, that I may be a little of the last, for I am the last, in respect to France, to be intercepted by Lord Howe; it might cause a great commotion, because it would undoubtedly affect the subsistence of Paris, and no individual will take on himself any responsibility respecting that object. Hence might arise criminalization and recrimination, of course discord, and all its consequences. If no exterior causes should preserve union, a very little experience of human affairs would enable you to see how it could not last.

This leads me to say one word about the northern army, premising that all the other armies, taken together, are but trifling diversions. The late arrangement made by Mr. Pitt with the King of Prussia, by concentrating the interests and objects of the two chief Powers, Britain and Austria, given in more correspondence to the war on the part of the former, and to the measure put out, it might have been the Convention had pleased, at all times, that all the magic of the revolution is contained in the single word Paris. Now, the high road to that city is from Flanders, by Valenciennes, Landrecy, Cambrai, &c. If matters are to be decided in the plains of Picardy, numerous, in truth, but little in the way of a formidable cavalry. You will see that this is the sphere of the British and Hanoverian troops. The Austrians are already but little disposed to give quarter. The corps of emigrants and deserters will naturally sell their lives as dear as they can. This campaign, therefore, will be one of the bloodiest in the annals of history.

I am, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To EDMUND RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

SAnFORD, May 31, 1794.

DEAR Sir:

I have already written to you a letter this day on the current affairs. This will be devoted to a different object. I have lately seen in a gazette your report on the inquiries received from the belligerent Powers, and also some of the despatches of Le Roy, in which he mentions the promised commercial treaty, and those with whom we have none. I observe that some frigates are to be built, for the protection of our trade. These things have suggested, or rather recalled, ideas which I will venture to communicate, at the same time giving you my particular reasons.

While I had the honor to sit in Congress, during the war, it was my lot to oppose what then appeared to me a rage for treaties; and yet the respectability which our cause was supposed to acquire by the acknowledgment of European potentates, ministered in favor of those who wished to extend our diplomacy. At the peace, however, that ground of argument was removed. Moreover, we found ourselves in a situation unfavorable to the forming of such treaties, because there was no constitutional authority to enforce the observance of them. Those Powers, therefore, who might contract with us, were exposed not only to the common danger of a wilful violation on our part, but to that also of general non-performance, and of individual injury, without the permission, and beyond the control, of the Government. The obligations, therefore, being equal, it was not deemed prudent by some to enter into engagements with the United States; and thus we felt ourselves sinking beneath the level of national character.

Our new constitution made ample provision on that subject; and, if I mistake not, a steady adherence to its principles will place us first in dignity, as in good faith, among political societies. Our treaties now amount to the supreme law of the land, and, therefore, our situation in respect to foreign Powers is reversed: for they can violate their contracts with us, but we cannot violate our contracts with them; neither have we, perhaps, any constitutional means of annulling our obligations, when they shall have broken their engagements. I will not here inquire how far we are now justified to make a provision of that sort, as an amendment to the constitution of the United States; but I need not in effect destroy the clause which has rendered treaties on our part inviolable; but I will venture to infer from this, our relative position, that we should be cautious what treaties we form, and with whom. What treaties, because much more than a mere contract, they are, or at least appear, to us in the same manner, as other treaties are to those with whom we have contracted, they may release themselves. We should be cautious also, with whom we treat, because, in the contingency last stated, some nations will release themselves, and others will not. Now, in political, as in natural bodies, decisions of the will depend, so far as good faith is concerned, on moral character.

We have at present to complain that both Britain and France have violated their treaties with us. Yet I can by no means consider the cases equal; for, as to Britain, the act proceeded from cool meditation of regular government, and is so calculated as to be of no effect on the other nations. Without dwelling further in this distinction, I shall endeavor to state those objections to the multiplication of treaties which formerly swayed my opinion; and, first, it is no small one that we should be thereby drawn into the vortex of European politics, which we should, I think, avoid as much as possible. Not that we should be wholly uninfluenced by its consequences; but this has been proved forcibly that the American people, in consequence of the common wishes, to their common concerns, to their own advantage, might be so far influenced by the influence of the common law, in that all cases heretofore doubtful have been settled by able judges; whereas, each treaty, like a new statute, gives rise to intricate questions, and the ultimate mode of determining them makes a good mind shudder.
Thirdly, it has also appeared to me that in most contrivances between European Powers, we should preserve an exact neutral character, and having entered into this treaty, I am safe to leave them to adjust their balance of forces, even to the death, because it is my opinion that the scales should prove too heavy for us, the means of lightening it are at hand, and completely within our grasp. Now I am convinced that a neutrality may be most easily preserved, when no belligerent Power can rightfully claim any privilege; because, by conferring such privilege at our pleasure, we can sufficiently punish either of the parties for the injuries and insults we may then conceive them to commit.

Lastly, I cannot but think that our present, compared with our future situation, is such that, in treating now, we must make bargains, even were there any tribunal to enforce the performance in a peaceable way. The panic of our affairs, the apparent necessity of forming and restoring the want of naval and military force, even the extent of our domination, which is, from that circumstance, of doubtful efficacy to defend, and even to prevent others from gratifying us, as I have before said, in ten years, or tolerable in twenty. Whatever may be the intrinsic worth of these reasons, certainly they might train that morality of our national constitution, which has been proved to be most useful, for the sake of its great and natural qualities. This constitutions was made subsequent to our existing treaties, and even after the violation by Great Britain of that which concluded the war. Happily she has hitherto eluded a compliance, and thereby prevented the formation of a commercial treaty. I say happily, for I am persuaded that, in a few years, we shall have occasion to rejoice, and perhaps may have occasion to regret for ever, the occasion we have prevented her taking advantage of it.

We complain justly, also, that France has broken her treaty with us, more especially to confiscate goods of her enemies on board our ships. This decree is evidently against her own interest; but, in my opinion, the clause, that it be so, is the means that free ships make free goods. The argument against and for are familiar to us, and therefore, I shall not enter into them. But the fair conclusion of that favor to it goes to a protection of all commercial property on the ocean. Therefore, the maxin, even were it just, would not be generally admitted until the practice of making prizes were wholly abandoned. Then all such clauses in treaties would be superfluous, and until then, unless enforced by a strong marine, they will be nugatory.

But it seems to me, from the view which I am enabled to take of our commerce, that, however the transportation, in our ships, of goods belonging to subjects of a belligerent Power, might prove a momentary advantage to our merchant, it is injurious to our great interests. I take it for granted, that our shipping is not sufficient to pursue by the sea the dealings of our respective states. But it is not sufficient to pursue our own commerce. We have therefore to employ others. I would reason thus: By putting half of the navigation employed in transporting our own productions into this neutral carrying trade, half of those productions must remain on hand, or be transported by the belligerent navigator, who promises to sell them to us, at a liberal rate. And is it not possible, to him to ship the produce of our farms, and the produce of our fisheries, and employ the others in the same neutral carrying trade. Now, if this reasoning be just, on the grounds of our shipping, the want of shipping, of how much more forlorn is it in the fact of an insufficiency. But it may be said, that the neutral carrying trade, by giving encouragement to our shipping, would greatly increase the amount. I answer, of our fictitious shipping, the mercantile navigation, under the protection of the state.

Moreover, I state hypothetically, either we have the tonnage needful for our commerce, or we have not. If we have not, the increased freight of our own commodities will, in time war, be a sufficient encouragement, and draw into that channel as much of the national strength and wealth as is consistent with the general welfare, and more, if we enchain our views to all the moral effects of a commercial interconnection, and I should reason thus: By putting half of the navigation employed in transporting our own productions into this neutral carrying trade, half of those productions must remain on hand, or be transported by the belligerent navigator, who promises to sell them to us, at a liberal rate. And is it not possible, to him to ship the produce of our farms, and the produce of our fisheries, and employ the others in the same neutral carrying trade. FOREIGN RELATIONS.

General Washington to Governor Morris.

My Dear Sir:

The sole object of the enclosed letter was to evince to you, that notwithstanding your recall, you held the same place in my estimation that you did before it happened. I expected to have got the letter to Colonel Monroe’s hands last week, in the vessel, in which he sailed, left the Patapsco river; but a fresh fair wind coming up, prevented its reaching him.

Since my arrival at this place, I have been favored with your private letter of the 12th of March, enclosing the duplicate of the 4th of February. For both I thank you. To common accidents, or to the interception of letters necessary for purposes that may be guessed, are to be ascribed those disappointments of which you complain: for I am almost certain that information of what was going forward in this country was regularly transmitted to you; probably, but not by duplicates; which ought to have been the case, for the greater certainty of getting it to you.

The 1st of May is, I believe, the real date of these communications. I have had one copy of Mr. Jay’s letter, but, in my opinion, the other is more essential. It would be of the utmost importance that of their coming to hand, will restrain me from going into detail at this time. I shall only add, therefore, to the acknowledgment of the receipt of above letters, that I am entirely ignorant of the source from whence, or the foundation on which, Major Jackson has erected his propositions, &c. &c. Never directly nor indirectly could he have derived them from me, for the best of all reasons; viz: That, not until some considerable time after M. Fauchet had arrived in this country, did I entertain an idea of the former, or contemplate the latter: for, until then, I had supposed you stood well with the persons in power. Sure I am, nothing short of evidence to the contrary, with the request that accompanied it, would have induced the measure. To Major Jackson I have never written a line, since he left this country, nor received one from him.

The prospective you have drawn is not very pleasing; but it serves to make one more anxious for a nearer view.

The affairs of this country cannot go amiss. There are so many watchful guardians of them, and such infallible guides, that one is at no loss for a director at every turn. But of these matters I shall say little; if you are disposed to return to it, I will leave you to judge of them from your own observation. My primary objects, and to which I have steadily adhered, have been to preserve the country in peace if I can, and to be prepared for war if I cannot; to effect the last, upon terms consistent with the respect which is due to ourselves and with honor, justice, and humanity, to all the world.

Mr. Jay, and not Mr. Jefferson, as has been suggested to you, embarked as envoy extraordinary for England, about the middle of May. If he succeeds, well; if he does not, why, knowing the worst, we must take measures accordingly.

I am yours affectionately,

G. Washington.

Sainport, July 93, 1794.

Dear Sir:

This will accompany a duplicate of mine dated the 31st of May. For the reasons mentioned in the beginning of that letter, I have not since written to you as I could have wished; but in the interim I have received yours of the 10th of January, covering one of the 3d from your predecessor. Having already expressed my congratulations on your appointment, I shall not here repeat, but only confirm, what I then wrote respecting it. But I will mention to you here, that by perusing Mr. Jefferson’s statement of our dispute with Great Britain, which is, in my opinion, a masterly performance, I hope his abilities will not be lost to the public.

At the same time, however, and with the same sincerity, I declare my belief, that the United States will gain by the change made in your Department. Without balancing different qualities and qualifications, a difficult and unpleasant task, it is sufficient that we may now hope for a union of counsel and action among the different members of the Executive; a thing which appears to me essential, and the want of which, or at least the idea that it was wanting, has, I know, been injurious.

If my several letters have reached you, they will have communicated from time to time the best view which I could form of parties, temper, and opinions, here. All these, however, are from the nature of things changeable, and it is only upon the final organization of a permanent Government, and view of the territory over which it is to extend that we can decide as to the prevailing interests, and the system which may thence originate. In all events, it appears to me, that Mr. Jefferson’s statement of our dispute with Great Britain, which is, in my opinion, a masterly performance, I hope his abilities will not be lost to the public.

The gazettes will communicate, ere this reaches you, the great success of the French arms. As far as can be judged here, the King of Prussia has, according to custom, played a double part, and his troops, instead of joining those of the other allies in Flanders, have remained where they were, while the French armies filed off to the left, and broke with irresistible impetuosity the Low Countries. These being quite open, belong always to the party superior in the field. As yet, this republic seems disposed rather to lay them under contribution, than to hold the possession; but, if Valenciennes should submit, a different determination might take place. However, the sieges needful to secure them as far as the Rhine would consume more time than remains in this campaign; for, besides Luxemburg, Maestricht, and the citadel of Antwerp, which are on central situations, the whole frontier of Juliers, Gelderland, Cleva, Dutch Brabant, and Dutch Flanders, are stack full of fortified towns.

I have in the course of the French arms being victories, of which I learn from common report. The justice of the British cabinet (whose sincerity the President is well acquainted with) will, I am persuaded, submit to the forcible arguments, which Mr. Jay is directed to use, for the nation is not now in a temper to instruct the world. As much more so to gain our assistance. But I will dwell no longer on this chapter, postponing all further remarks till the Government of this country shall have adopted a plan for her ci-devant colonies.

As to the interior affairs of France, one prominent and pleasant feature is an early and most abundant harvest. The weather has been uncommon, and, what is singular, is the ripeness of wheat, barley, and every kind of grain, and at the same time. In a few days, the whole of them will be ready for use, and they will begin to eat it; for there remains scarcely any thing of last year’s produce; so that if the present had not been fit for use till towards the end of the next month, as is usually the case, God knows what would have become of us all. The abundance of the present year extends to every object, forage, pulse, roots, and other vegetables, as well as grain. The vineyards also promise more liquor than the vessels to put it in. I conclude that we shall find little vent for our productions here, excepting our salted provisions, which must be in great demand. Moreover, I incline to the opinion that our vessels will not meet, hitherto, with the same vexations which have been hitherto experienced, so that exportations of salted fish and flesh may, I think, be safely encouraged for this country. To these may be added pot and pearl ashes, some flax seed and rice, also fish oil; and in payment our merchants will receive wines and brandies.

There is at present a considerable ferment of parties, whose object, on the one hand, is to overturn, and, on the other, to preserve the colonial power of the two great committees. Sooner or later that ferment must lead to an explosion, and the apprehension from the foreign enemy being greatly lessened, men turn more easily to the consideration of their domestic system. By a late decree the committee of Salut Public has secured to itself the promotion of one-third to all places in the army, which is a strong hold of that unwieldy instrument, and let it alone or later it must, unless dissolved, escape from the grasp of a multidinous body. Such is the law of nature; but that catastrophe is yet at a distance, and depends, I think, on the continuance of the war. Probably, before it happens, the committee will no longer exist in its present form; for the mass of power there collected will, in the natural course of events, get away. Men will have no longer the inclination to abuse that power to their own ends, to increase it by severe and frequent exercise, so as to destroy all opposition, will generate in its bosom the causes of change. These are evils resulting from that state of violence in which society now exists, because in such a state nothing can obtain a firm foundation, and how long this may continue, God only knows. Hitherto power and property are at war, and the latter is a daily victim; whereas it is their union which can alone establish permanent systems of Government.

Mr. Jefferson's letter of the 13th of June, 1793, reached me above a year after its date. Immediately on receipt of it, I wrote to the Commissioner of External Relations the letter dated the 21st of June, of which I enclose a copy, as also a copy of his answer of the 19th Messidor, or 7th instant, from which you will learn that the million oflivres, hitherto unaccounted for, was received by M. de Beaumarchais, and, of course, ought, in a new statement of his accounts, to be carried to his debit at the date. The operation will then, in all probability, be such as to eat up the balance reported to be due to him. I hope this information may reach you yet in season. It would have been transmitted long ago if, by good fortune, a copy of that letter of the 13th of June, 1793, had been sent by Captain Culver. I trouble you, sir, with copies of my letters of the 23d and 29th of last month to the Commissioner of External Relations, his of the 16th Messidor, or 4th of July, and of one just received from him of the 20th Messidor, or 15th of July, from which it would seem that my numerous complaints are at length to be attended to. I am inclined to think that this will happen, and I am persuaded that, in proportion as our administration is firm and united, it will be powerful at home and respected abroad. I am, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS

To EDMUND RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

P.S. In making up my letter it occurs to me that I had no notice of the strange complaints made against me by M. Genet, in his letter of the 15th of last September to the Secretary of State. I do not think it worth while to enter into the investigation of them; and the more so, as the falsity of some, and the folly of others, are evident from facts in possession of your office, and from the style and nature of the complaints themselves. But, while on this subject, it may not be amiss to mention that, during the last winter, in conversation with the then Minister of Foreign Affairs, (who, I am pretty sure, had instructed M. Fauchet to solicit from me, in the person of messieurs, for my removal) I told him that, if this Government wished for any person in my place, the best way would be to tell me so, and I would apply for my own recall. He answered by assurances of esteem, &c, &c.

SAINPORT, June 31st, 1794.

SIR: During the last war, France furnished several sums of money to the United States of America, both under the head of loans and that of gratuities. The first of these advances was a million of livres, and it appears to have been made on the 10th of June, 1776. It is entered among the gratuities, but it is not known to whom it was paid, nor how it was appropriated. Doctor Franklin, in settling the accounts of the United States with the French ministry, neglected to ask for these papers which relate to this subject; and afterwards, when the banker of the United States applied (in the months of August and September, 1780) to M. Durival, in order to obtain them, he assured him that he had communicated the request to the Comte de Vergennes, who said that the receipt in question could be of no use to the banker, since he was not entrusted with the pecuniary affairs of the United States till January, 1777, and that this payment was made on the 10th of June, 1776.

Our ministers were also given to understand, that it was useless to urge the demand for a paper in proof of a payment, which would be of no account in the reimbursements to be made by the United States, Dr. Franklin concluded from this, that the advance had been lodged in the hands of M. Beaumarchais, and that it was a cabinet mystery, whose elucidation ought to be a matter of indifference to us, at least till it became necessary to set this sum against the demands of Beaumarchais for the supplies which he had furnished to the United States.

This occasion has now arrived; but without this you will perceive, at the first glance, that the payment having been acknowledged by the United States, the receiver, whoever he may be, is ought to give them an account of the manner in which he employed it. Besides, mysteries serve too often only to cover wasteful expenditures, of which the people are the victims. It is therefore given me in charge to solicit the papers acknowledging the payment of a million of livres, as a gratuity made by France to the United States of America on the 10th of June, 1776. I think they will be found among the accounts of M. Durival, then head of the Treasury Department for Foreign Affairs, and I apply to you, in these circumstances, with the more confidence, as I am fully convinced of the good will of the French Government towards the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

To M. BUCHOT, Commissioner of External Relations.

M. Buchot to Gouverneur Morris, Minister of the United States.

SIR:

In your letter of the 21st ultimo, you request of me the communication of the papers which explain in what manner the million, advanced to the United States, on the 10th of June, 1776, was paid by my hands. I sent your request to the Comite de Salut Public, to whom it appeared just, in this respect, to render to the United States the satisfaction, which was denied to them by the ministers of the ancient regime: In consequence, I enclosed the necessary researches to be made; and I here subjoin a copy of a receipt, dated the 10th of June, 1776, which appears to be necessary for the United States to regulate for their own use.

As you have well observed, there is no occasion for mystery between two nations united by all the ties of friendship, and of common interest.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

PARIS, July 7, 1794.

My Dear Sir:

I shall write but a few lines by this conveyance. The resources of this country will hold out till the end of April, but then things will appear in a situation truly deplorable. Orders are given to push into Spain with all the force which can be collected. The object is to obtain a separate peace. Attempts will also be made to obtian peace with Savoy and Italy. These failing, to supply the south with food is impossible. Spain offered peace some time ago, but met with a contemptuous refusal. As yet the enemy seem to be unacquainted with the true state of things.

I am, &c.

GOVERNEUR MORRIS.

To EDMUND RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

HANOVER, December 30th, 1794.

My DEAR SIR:

At this late hour, and from this remote corner, I am to acknowledge your favors of the 19th and 28th of June. I did not reply from Paris, because I wished for a safe conveyance; and although none offers itself at present, yet I will write what occurs for communication, and take a future chance for transmission.

The assurances of friendly esteem, which your letters convey, are very pleasing but, indeed, I never doubted of the sentiments you express, and even go so far as to flatter myself that the same superiority after two I have returned to you. It was highly so to me and although I am persuaded that you will believe me, on my word, I will nevertheless assign some reasons why a change of situation was desirable.

And first, you will see, from what is publicly known respecting those who administered the French despotism, how painful it must have been to represent our country to such. After the 16th of August, because I thought the interests of America required it, and I did not ask my recall at a subsequent period, because it would not have been honorable to abandon a post which, if no longer unsafe, was at least very unpleasant. I felt that I was useless, and indeed that nobody could be useful, until some permanent system should be established. I saw misery and affliction every day, and all this, without power to mitigate, or means to relieve; and I felt myself degraded by the communications I was forced into with the worst of mankind, in order to obtain redress for the injuries sustained by my fellow-citizens.

During that state of things, I was generally respected by my neighbors, and by the people of the town in which I resided. By order of the Committee of General Safety, I could not resist this, as I sought to have done, by quitting the country, because a great number of our citizens were then stationed in France, with much of their property, and I knew the violence which those who administered the Government were capable of. Moreover, I saw, with regret, that the temper of America was not such as her best citizens could have wished; and the conduct of Britain rendered a temporizing conduct with France indispensable. My representations obtained a half apology and promise of satisfaction, but occasioned the order to solicit my recall; of which I was apprised within four and twenty hours after it was given, and might easily have shown whence it originated; but, to tell you the truth, I was inclined to wish that I might be removed on their application. I really believe it was necessary to my reputation. So long as they sought in the success of their demand, they treated my representations with indifference and contempt; but at last, hearing nothing from their minister on that subject, or indeed on any other, they took it into their heads that I was immoveable, and made overtures of conciliation.

At this time I began to apprehend that we should be plunged into a war with England, in which case it would have become my duty to aid the French as far my abilities might go; but as I knew their temper, I replied to the advances made, that I was not to be affected by smooth words, so that they must begin by complying with the various demands I expressed, and then go so far as to flatter myself that the same superiority after two I have returned to you. It was highly so to me and although I am persuaded that you will believe me, on my word, I will nevertheless assign some reasons why a change of situation was desirable.

In reply to what you say about my return to America. I must tell you, that I could not depart in such season as that, and as distinguished by the cold of this season. Also, as I must have exposed myself to the inclemencies of a winter's passage, I deferred my voyage; and the rather, as I have some affairs in London which I wish to wind up. I should have gone thither for that purpose direct, but the French would have harbored jealousies respecting my journey, which for many reasons I wished not to excite, and, therefore, I came round through Switzerland to this city, in which I am now weather bound. So much for my history.

As to the state of political affairs, the Polish insurrection is, as you know, completely subdued, and, of course, the attention of Europe is all turned to France, which has lately triumphed in every quarter by the extreme misconduct of her enemies. It seems at present that they are coming to their senses, and if I am rightly informed, they have at length abandoned the idea of a disembarkation and mean to pursue simply the re-establishment of the throne. If they act wisely and vigorously in that direction, it seems to me that they must succeed, for the French are wearied and exhausted by the contest. They detest and despise their present rulers, and as far as I have been able to judge, they ardently desire the restoration of their Prince.

You will ask, perhaps, why then do they not restore him? It is because they dare not act, nor even speak, so that they do not know each other's opinions, and, of course, each individual apprehends from the general mass; but that which has taken place leaves them to look back with regret to their ancient situation. In judging the French, we must not recur to the feelings of America during the last war. We were in the actual enjoyment of freedom, and fought not to obtain, but to secure its blessings. The people elected their magistrates during the continuance of the war. The property of the country was engaged in the Revolution, and the oppressions which it occasioned were neither great, extensive, or of long duration. But the French they have been lured by one idle hope after another, until they are plunged in the depth of misery and servitude—servitude so much the more degrading, as they cannot but despise their masters. I have long, you know, predicted a single despotism, and you have seen how near they have been to that catastrophe. Chance, or rather the want of mettle in the usurper, has alone saved them to the present moment; but I am still convinced that they must end their voyage in that port, and they would probably reach it, should they make peace with all their foreign enemies, through the channels of a civil war. Adieu, my dear sir. I wish you many and happy years, and am, very truly, yours,

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States.

GOVERNEUR MORRIS.
SPAIN AND ALGIERS.

3d CONGRESS,
No. 82. [1st Session.

SPAIN AND ALGIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 3, 1794.

Message from the President of the United States communicating additional information concerning our affairs with Spain and Algiers.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you an extract from a letter of Mr. Short, relative to our affairs with Spain, and copies of two letters from our minister at Lisbon, with their enclosures, containing intelligence from Algiers. The whole of these communications are made in confidence, except the passage in Mr. Short's letter, which respects the Spanish convoy.

G. WASHINGTON.

Extract of a Letter from Wm. Short to the Secretary of State.

ST. LORENZO, November 6, 1792.

On our learning that the Portuguese Government had granted the first convoy for American vessels, and mentioning this circumstance to M. de Gardoqui, he advised the making a request to this effect here; and this with a kind of assurance of success, so different from his usual manner, as showed he was confident thereof. Mr. Carmichael accordingly did it; and he informed me yesterday that he had received an immediate answer from the Duke de la Alcudia, notifying him of Government having already come to that resolution. This will add also to the security and certainty of Mr. Blake's embarkation, and enable us to determine his departure with less regard to the port, although as yet we do not know what time is fixed for the Spanish convoy. We shall regret less the delay he has met with here if it should enable us to send by him the answer expected.

Mr. Carmichael informs me that, in his audiences of the duke, (since he has taken into his hands this subject, which had been communicated by us very fully in our letter of October 1st, to M. de Gardoqui) he has regularly pressed him for the answer, and as regularly been promised that it should be given with the least possible delay. He mentioned that a recurrence to papers was necessary, which, added to the present crowd of business, had rendered some delay unavoidable.

This shows that he had not judged proper to reduce the answer to its simplest terms, which might have been that they would or would not interfere between the United States and their Indian neighbors. The mind of Government must be fully made up on that subject, except as far as depends on future circumstances; and if their answer is to be delayed for them, it would certainly not be proper for us to detain Mr. Blake on that account.

I have already had the honor of writing you an account of the ordinance with respect to the commerce of New Orleans. M. de Gardoqui has for a long time past had the intention of introducing several changes there. He has lately informed us, Mr. Rendon (formerly chargé des affaires de Spain at Philadelphia) was appointed intendant of that place, with very extensive powers, and independent of the Baron de Carondelet. He desired us to announce this to America, and conceives it will give much satisfaction there, as an indication of the sentiments of this court towards the United States. His conversation thereon would give an inference that he now contemplated a communication with New Orleans by our citizens, which the ordinance above mentioned and his former conversations did not admit of. So far as the injuries the United States have hitherto received have proceeded from the conduct of the Spanish agents, or are to depend in future on the manner of executing the orders sent hence, I conceive, from M. Rendon's character and knowledge of the United States, that his appointment is a favorable circumstance to the harmony of the two countries.

D. HUMPHREYS, Esq. to the Secretary of State.

ALICANT, November 18, 1792.

Sir: I had the honor to write to you on the 16th; and in a postscript to my letter of that date, to Mr. Church, requested him to inform you that the largest of the Algerine frigates was then coming into this harbor. It proved not to be the largest, but one of the others, which had returned some days since from a cruise in the Atlantic. The Captain reported to Mr. Montgomery (who at my request went along side of the frigate) that he had taken seven American vessels, and carried three of them with him into Algiers. The only names of the Captains which he recollected were, Captain Newman, from Cadiz to Amsterdam, with sugar, Captain Morey, from Cadiz to Hamburgh, with hides, &c. and Captain Jackson, from Malaga to America, with wine and raisins. In the midst of these distressing events, it think it a duty incumbent on me to be as particular as I am able, in my correspondence.

On the 15th instant, the brig Marion, Captain Rossiter, from New York, arrived at Carthagena. He saw no cruisers until he was entering the bay, when he had a very extraordinary escape; as there was a sebeck in the harbor at the time.

I have as yet heard nothing in answer to the memorial and letter mentioned in my former despatches. With sentiments of perfect esteem, &c.

D. HUMPHREYS.

P. S. The Algerine frigate sailed yesterday on another cruise.

P. S. I open this letter to let you know the Dey has refused giving a passport. I will write the particulars by the next post as I shall lose the opportunity if I do not close this instantly.

There are 12 masters, 16 mates, and 87 mariners, prisoners at Algiers.

D. HUMPHREYS, Esq. to the Secretary of State.

ALICANT, November 23, 1793.

Sir: In a second postscript to my letter of the 19th I informed you of the refusal of the Dey to grant a passport. I have now the honor to enclose to you copies of letters from the Swedish consul at Algiers, from his brother Pierre Eris Skjöldbrand, Esq. and from Captain O'Brien. By the tenor of these you will clearly comprehend the actual disposition of the Dey, and the real state of affairs in that regency.

From these communications it will also be but too evident, that no choice is left for the United States but to proceed to a redress, with all possible expedition, for the protection of their trade and that there is but too much reason to fear, the contrabandists, under a perfect sense of security from danger, elated with impunity and success, will infest the channel of England, and even the coasts of America, in another season, unless the most vigorous and decisive measures be instantly adopted on our part.
I shall advise with Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Short on any ulterior plans to which recourse may be had in this critical state of affairs on this side of the Atlantic.

The care of Mr. Montgomery, until Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Short can be consulted to know whether it can be landed by an order from court without duty, or in what manner it will be advisable to dispose of it.

The copies of my letters to several persons in Algiers cannot be prepared to be transmitted to you by this conveyance, but I propose to have them enclosed in my next despatches.

As there remains nothing further to be done here at present as there has been an Algerine frigate cruising off this coast for several days past, in such a manner as to excite suspicions of her object; as it was judged by Mr. Montgomery and Mr. Cutting, altogether unsafe for my person to be intercepted by an Algerine cruiser, even on board a neutral vessel; and as there were several subjects of great importance to the public, on which I wished very much to confer with Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Short, I could not now undertake to take measures for procuring direct dispatch to Madrid. It will not, however, be practicable to obtain the means of conveyance before the middle, or perhaps before the end of next week.

But I hope, sir, you will pardon me if you should not receive letters dated between this time and that of my arrival at Madrid.

With sentiments of perfect respect, &c.

D. HUMPHREYS.

P. S. In confirmation of the opinion of Mr. Montgomery and Mr. Cutting, respecting the invalidity of the protection afforded by a neutral vessel, I forgot to cite an expression of the Dey, as related in a letter to Mr. Montgomery: "Let the American ambassador take care how he comes here, under the pretence of any flag whatever."

In order to make you acquainted with the extent and particulars of our vessels captured, so far as I have been able to learn, I enclose to you the copy of a letter from Captain McShane.

* The Swedish Consul to D. Humphreys, Esq.
ALGIERS, November 13, 1793.

Sir:
I have had the honor of receiving your obliging letter of the 6th of this month, and am extremely flattered with the confidence and favorable opinion you have been pleased to entertain of me; I am, nevertheless, in the disagreeable situation of not being able to follow the inclination and sincere desire I have of meriting your noble and open confidence, worthy of a citizen of a free and respectable nation.

There are in Algiers so many jealous observers, at this critical epoch, when the Dey is about concluding two treaties of peace, and when every one of his ancient friends fear being sacrificed to those treaties of peace with a nation whose only policy is that of war; when, therefore, you are left to the mercy of his caprice, and without the prospect of prudence and plunder, it will soon make some revolution which may cost the Dey his life: therefore, the least step I might make here in favor of the Americans (that is to say, in political affairs, because to assist poor slaves, of whatever nation they may be, is an act of humanity, for which a consul cannot be reproached with propriety) would not fail being instantly reported to the principal court of hop.e, who would complain to the court of Sweden, which would place me in a very unpleasant situation, for having acted against that foolish and imagined commercial interest of nations, and without the order or permission of my court. For the same reasons, sir, I have not ventured even to deliver your letter of credence and memorial to the Dey but, at the same time, being cordially attached to the prosperity of the Americans, and sincerely desirous of the welfare and happiness of all my countrymen from slavery, (now amounting to one hundred and fifteen) and endeavoring to merit, as far as in my power, the good opinion with which you honor me, I engaged my brother, who, not being here in any official capacity, having no appointment from our court, has allowed me to retain, from the most grateful douceur of Mr. Short, hitherto received several particular marks of favor and distinction from the Dey, to undertake all that you have been pleased to confide; and I can assure you, sir, that every thing that is possible to be done for you and your nation he will do, and that he, as well as myself, will be happy in finding opportunities of being useful to a nation whom we both respect and love.

But, sir, I am sorry that you are come at a moment when which none could be more disadvantageous. Of this I leave my brother to inform you in the letter which he will have the honor to write to you. It remains for me only to testify to you, sir, the lively desire I possess to have the honor of your personal acquaintance, as I sincerely wish you the best under God in your countrymen in every line of letters, and to your honest and suffering countrymen.

I hope for the most favorable circumstances, and, in the mean while, request you to be assured of the most sincere sentiments of respect, &c.

M. SKJOLDEBRAND,
Consul General of Sweden.

* The Brother of the Swedish Consul to D. Humphreys, Esq.
ALGIERS, November 13, 1793.

Sir:
In consequence of what my brother, the Swedish consul, has had the honor of writing to you, I take the liberty of presenting myself to you, sir, as a free man, and ready to sacrifice myself in every instance in which I conceive myself able to assist suffering humanity.

I have several times, with that probity which tears is seen your honest countrymen here sinking under the cruel yoke of slavery, I have availed of having them complain, and suppose themselves forgotten by their country, for the liberty of which they had fought against a strong and imperious nation. I have myself, as well as my brother, done every thing in my power to alleviate their misfortunes, and leave to themselves the certifying of it to you. The only external trouble I am now in the least capable of anything that will disturb the circumstances very different from those which you and your nation have expected, and very different from what they were even two months ago. What Captain O'Brien (if you have seen his correspondence with Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Montgomery) some time ago presented, is come to pass; and I am now going to explain, with all the freedom of an American, not at all, on the subject, from the sentiments of respect, friendship, and obligations of gratitude, which appear in every line of your letters, and to your honest and suffering countrymen.

On the arrival of your despatches the day before yesterday, and after having consulted with my brother, as he has had the honor to inform you, I immediately obtained an audience of the Dey; and, on presenting him your letter of credence and your memorial, I did not neglect interpreting to him their contents with every persuasive consideration and reason, adding thereto all that I thought capable of leading him to favor your demands and propositions. He replied to me, with an unshaken firmness, that he would not make peace with the Americans, or any other nation whomsoever, at any price whatever; that there had been a time when he was well disposed to support the engagements, at half price, made by his predecessor, the Dey Mahamet Beshaw, with Mr. Lamb, an American negotiator, which you are probably acquainted with. But now, since the conditions of a peace with Holland require only to be ratified; since the Portuguese have demanded 20,000, and the Dey has fixed his pretensions with the Portuguese commandant, who was some days ago, (which amount to near three millions of pistarms) which the Dey expects here in a few days; since the Algerine corsairs have made ten American prizes, and one hundred five slaves more, and the Dey has again sent his corsairs out of the straits, expecting still to add to the number; he declared to me that his interest does not permit him to accept your offers, sir, even were you to lavish millions upon him; "because," said he, "if I were to make peace with every body, what should I do with my corsairs? They would take my head, for the want of other prizes, not being able to live upon their miserable allowance."

In vain did I represent to him that the peace of Portugal was not yet concluded; that they would not, perhaps, accept his demands; that, besides, the Portuguese nation had, at all times, endeavored to injure the Algerines, many of the corsairs were formerly inhabitants of Portugal, and the contrary, the United States, who, in a war, as bloody as it was glorious, with England, have sufficiently shown that they neither want strength nor bravery, have never as yet armed a vessel against the corsairs of the Dey; that their peace, having been a long time proposed, would now have some weight; and lastly, that permission, had it been accepted by the Dey, would have given peace, he had only to break with some nation of those who are probably less useful to him than the United States might become, considering the wood for ship building, and many other productions of America, necessary for marine.

All my remonstrances were ineffectual, even to your so reasonable demand of a passport to come here. The Dey said "that he would not allow any American ambassador, under any flag whatever."

Now, sir, I have had the honor of communicating to you the disadvantageous dispositions of the Dey. It remains for me to give you my opinion on the subject. Were I less acquainted with this country and the Dey, his ignorance would not have surprised me; but, I am afraid, the Dey has been misled by the spirit of the Swedish nation here, a Jewish house (by which people all secret negotiations are carried on at Algiers.) This house was not on terms with the courtier of the Dey. Another Jew, who calls himself Bacci, a house which found the reputation of being more handsomely employed (and more of the Navigation) has actually agreed upon, and fixed with the Dey, the conditions of the peace with Holland, and who enjoys the common degree of grace with the Dey—this house, being at variance with our ancient courtier, secretly disposed the Dey towards us and our peace, until we were obliged to make an offer to this same Bacci, that, by procuring us the liberty of coming here, and opening negotiations for the purposes that I have the honor of advising, you will no longer address yourself to Messrs. Bassara and Co. And, to convince you that there is no merit, no mutual influence, I shall inform you that, on this occasion, also, (being afraid of failing in the business, when they thought it so near a conclusion) they have labored and supplicated the Dey on the subject of your propositions, but have been answered with a grace so cold and temperate refusal that I shall not underrate.

Now, sir, having openly and freely spoken my thoughts of this subject, I come to another, not less delicate. I have a confidence in demanding of you, for your utility, to inform me with freedom and sincerity, the extent of your powers.

1. What is the highest sum you can give for peace?
2. To what amount can you promise to bring, annually, presents of war, stores, and ship timber? Because this is the practice with the Swedes, Danes, and Hollanders, which costs them each year near thirty thousand piasters. We have the reputation of twelve captains, sixteen pilots, (mates) and eighty-seven mariners, at a price of near two thousand piasters each.

4. Whether you can promise that, every two years, the consuls who may reside here shall pay, in like manner as those of the three above mentioned nations, and of Venice, a present of jewelry, watches, muskets, pistols, golden bracelets, rings, and other jewels, according to the price of the postage.

It is for you, sir, to determine whether what I demand of you be more than you can communicate to me. It is for me to know that it should remain a secret between us, and to make you that promise; and to tell you to what purpose you will make the conveniences of peace. The corsairs of Algiers with the Dey, who is constant and always changing, are conducted in such a manner, that at favorable moments, such as I have suggested to you, ought, in five minutes, propose and decide upon business of the greatest consequence; but again, after those five minutes, or after a day, the Dey would infallibly change his opinion and pretensions; and if he should tell me to write to any person, and declare to him upon what conditions he would give peace, I would not venture to do it, without having the conditions upon paper, and in presence of the divan, subscribed by his Secretary of State. For otherwise, it might happen that he would demand twice as much on the arrival of the negotiator. So that, desiring only to be useful to you, sir, I propose to you the most plain, and I venture to say the only means. You are still, sir, capable of doing as you please, and as far as your instruction permits. In all events, I request you, sir, as soon as possible, to give me whatever answer you may be pleased to honor me with.

Should there be anything to be done in the mean time, (supposing the above case of the Portuguese, who must in a very short time give their answer) or the peace which Portugal takes place, and insurmountable obstacles to your peace for some considerable time be discovered, I conceive it in either case, (without obtaining your approbation hereafter) and which is very pressing, is an advance of a little money to your naked and unfortunate countrymen in slavery, in order to prevent their dying from want and the severity of the season.

I commit this to your knowledge, sir, every thing which occurs to me on this occasion.

Believe me, sir, to be a man of honor. All assurances of discretion and secrecy, your respect, superfluity; and if I am not, assurances avail nothing. From these considerations I shall say no more; but should you be pleased to honor me with your confidence, I request you, sir, to be so good as to remember to give me also a power to execute what is said of it.

Not having a sufficient knowledge of your language, sir, to venture to make use of it, (in affairs requiring to be clearly explained) I request you to excuse my writing to you in French. You may always, when you honor me with any favor, continue to write in English, if you think proper. Penetrated with sentiments of respect, attachment, and zeal,

I have the honor of subscribing myself, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

PIERRE ERIC SKJOLDENBRAND,

Mon. HEMMAPPS, Ambassador, &c.

Brother of the Swedish Consul in Algiers.
P. S. Bacciar has this moment informed me that he had already succeeded in disposing the Dey to your favor; but it will be necessary, sir, for you to follow the counsel which I have had the honor of giving you in this letter, never to write to Mr. Barrasso, and to give me a speedy answer.

Captain O'Brien to D. Humphreys, Esq.

ALGIERS, November 12, 1793.

Honored Sir:

The Swedish consul, Mathias Skjoldenbrand, Esq. favored me with the perusal of your letter, dated Alicante, the 5th instant. I must observe that in all you wrote I much approve of your sentiments, as becoming the representative of a great people. You can easily imagine what was my feelings on this occasion.

Mr. Montgomery wrote to Barrasso and said that he and they, without waiting to receive a favorable opportunity, immediately gave their consent to your offer, and settled the Algierine peace. The Dey agreed to the terms very abruptly that he would not receive you, and would not make the peace with America, as he had the Portuguese peace to settle, and the Dutch; and that, when he wanted the Americans, for nearly two years, to make the peace, they would not give him an answer, without telling them of his desires.

The Jews were jealous of your writing to the Swedish consul; and depend, they will not try to befrieh the United States. Indeed, they have no influence with the Dey and ministry.

Ten days more, I should, if I might be in a position to serve the Americans; but, sir, you will consider that for him to interfere publicly in the American business, that he should first have the orders of his court; but you may depend on his interest in all that can be done with propriety. Therefore his brother, a gentleman of the first rate abilities, and a strong friend for the United States, has become a strong and faithful advocate in the favor of the United States; he is expected by the President's letter, and he is made use of very winning, &c. requisites, for the Dey to consider favorable of a peace with the United States, and permit the American ambassador to come to Algiers but the Dey has not seemed inclinable, but gave Mr. Skjoldenbrand, jun. nearly the same answer as he gave Barrasso. I believe the Dey was prevailed upon by the Americans, by the English consul, who was sent to Algiers, and with the caprice of the Portuguese frigate, and by Mr. Wallpole, British resident at Lisbon, as the British brought about the Portuguese truce, and will try for the peace, all in order to hurt the Americans; but, sir, you will know all the enmity of the British cabinet against the United States.

Barrasso and Skjoldenbrand, would not create a scandal, offering Algiers a very advantageous trading sum to relieve their necessities: therefore those people that would not put confidence in the United States, should have no confidence put in them. And as they have done hitherto, relative to ascertaining the terms of our peace, has become void by the Portuguese truce and their prospects for peace, I think, sir, it is requisite that the United States should try other channels to lay the foundation of the American peace; and depend, sir, your endeavors will be crowned with success.

As you are fully empowered, and you see the great necessity of something decisive being done, I, therefore, with the greatest respect and with the real dictates of my thoughts, propose to you, sir, to immediately empower Mr. Skjoldenbrand, jun. to adopt such plans as you think proper to effectuate your design. Therefore, when you expect how much money the United States will pay for the peace, what are their presents in making the peace, whether in maritime stores, in money, in cruisers framed and sent in cargo, or in money, and by all means what the United States will pay annually, and in what articles or money, &c. after all this explained, and made known to Mr. Skjoldenbrand, jun., what follows, in short, is this: Mr. Skjoldenbrand, as one of the principal men of the house of Joseph Coven Bockerie, the great Jewish merchants, of Algiers, and head banquers, that has the greatest influence with the Dey, and that hardly any negotiations can be well brought about with their influence and assent.

The influence in two matters, and as we are unfortunately circumstanced, we must apply to the people of influence that can befrieh us. This house of Coven Bockerie laid the foundation of the Swedish peace, and by their influence settled that peace on a solid basis, which is worthy of attention. And the Dey being of a wavering unsettled disposition, that people I have mentioned being empowered, they would, when opportunity offers, embrace it effectually. Therefore, the 2d instant, America, the ambassador come and put a finishing hand to the whole affair. This Dey, he studies his own interest; that of his regency is his second consideration. Indeed it would not be prudent for you to come to Algiers until the foundation was laid, and the terms known; for you must consider that the Portuguese truce, as the Americans, will be trying at one time for the peace, that it will occasion a great clashing of interests in all concerned and empowered.

The Portuguese frigate arrived here the 2d inst. and sailed the 7th inst. with the Dey's terms for the peace, which I understand is as viz: one million two hundred thousand dollars for Mexico for the peace. Eight hundred thousand for Algiers, and the Dutch for the,nona takers of the island of the Azores, and for the indemnities for the 250,000 captures.

On the 8th inst. the Dey called on the British consul, who is charged relative to the Portuguese peace, and desired him to write to Portugal, that he must have three hundred thousand dollars for his family, independent of the above mentioned sums.

The Spaniards are very jealous relative to the Portuguese obtaining a peace with Algiers, and they are using their greatest influence to prevent its taking place. Indeed, the majority of the Algerine politicians are of opinion that it will not take place, as they consider that, by the bigotry (but not good policy) of Portugal, that she will not agree to pay such exorbitant sums. However, the Portuguese frigate is expected to return to Algiers in twenty or thirty days from this date, and will bring the definitive answer, which will determine peace or war between the Portuguese and Algerines.

The commandant of the Portuguese frigate told the Dey that, if the terms were not agreed on by the 1st of January ensuing, that the truce was void. Therefore, sir, if we wait the issue of the Portuguese affairs, and that Portugal will not make the peace on the above mentioned terms, you may depend that the United States will then obtain their peace on favorable terms. The Dutch, I believe, will have more difficulty in settling their affairs than is generally considered, as they have a cessation of hostilities, but no terms agreed on. The Dutch commandant or ambassador is expected here in a few days. The house of Joseph Coven Bockerie obtained and settled the Dutch truce with this regency. Monsieur Faure is also a little interested on Dutch affairs.

It is generally considered that the Danish will shorthly lose their peace. The Dey has given the Danish consul some assurance on this subject; and the Dane has lately paid two thousand dollars for two hundred sequins as a present. This day it is reported that the three Algerine corsairs, which are at sea on their second American expedition, that they have orders to take the Danish vessels, as the Dey charged the Danish consul in the Hamburgh, Liebeckens, London, and other places, to supply them with necessaries.

The Dey said this day that those he wanted to be at peace with he was necessitated to be at war with; and those he that did not want to be at peace with he made a peace with: that is, I am at war with friends and at peace with my enemies. Indeed, sir, the situation of the United States is different from that of other nations that is at peace with the United States, as if we were at war with Tunis, the Dey would not agree to the terms, and the Dey would be the means of our obtaining a peace very favorable with Tunis, as Tunis is a tributary state to Algiers, and is much biased by its influence.

You well know that to this date the peace with Algiers has cost Spain in money and present, nearly 12,000,000 dollars. Spain changed her national flag and gave her people more than 1,000,000 dollars, and the Dey wants his three thousand sequins, which, with presents, amount to annually thirty-four thousand Mexican dollars. The Danes pay full the same. The Venetians twelve thousand Venetian sequins, but full two thousand dollars for presents. In fact, since the Spanish peace, those nations pay full in presents one-third more than they used to pay.
The Dey cares little about the different nations ransoming slaves: for he could not well fit out his cruisers independent of slaves. What a foolish idea the United States have that the ransom of a few men concerned the peace. We have suffered on this and many other accounts by our country. God forgive our persecutors. I had wrote you that the Swedish consul, on the arrival of these one hundred and live captives, advanced them two hundred Mexican dollars. Indeed, they are in a very distressed and naked situation. I need not say more on this subject.

You stay in Alicante; give out you are going to depart for America; act as becomes a distinguished citizen, and as the representative of a great and rising empire; and take the advice of your most obedient servant.

O'BRIEN.

Algerine Maritime Force, the 12th Nov. 1793, as viz:

One frigate of 44 guns, built in Algiers by Spanish King’s constructor.
One frigate of 32 guns, English built.
One frigate of 28 guns, built in Algiers by Spanish builder.
One frigate of 24 guns, Levant built, at sea.
One polacre of 18 guns, Genoa built, at sea.
One brig of 20 guns, built by Spanish constructor, at sea.
One xebec of 20 guns, built by Spanish constructor.
One xebec of 12 guns, built on the coast.
One xebec of 14 guns, built on the coast.
One xebec of 12 guns, built in Spain.

One brig of 58 guns, will be launched and ready for sea in thirty days.

N. B. They carry, each corsair, at the rate of 12 men to each gun, fully. Sixty gun-boats.

Oman has three galliots, carrying 4 guns each.

Tunis, I am credibly informed, has twenty-three corsairs, mounting from twenty-four to four guns.

The corsairs of Algiers and Tunis combined may make a formidable fleet of sea robbers; and as the Algerines have become masters of the Western Ocean, the Tunisiens will do the same; and if they meet no success they will go into the English channel, and on to the coast of the United States. Then, honored sir, what will be the alarm? I am afraid they will in this their second expedition take eight or ten sail more of American vessels. The enemies of the United States tell the Dey much is to be got by being at war. Indeed a full demonstration is taking ten sail in one little cruise.

I would advise you, sir, by all possible means in your power, to try for the peace. The same time immediately write Congress to send four complete frigates and two brigs to Gibraltar, and stop the depredations of those sea robbers. These six sail, well appointed and manned, will keep the Algerines in greater awe than the whole marine of Portugal did. These six will give security to our commerce to Europe. They will act of course on the defensive. But in order to convince those people of the activity of American corsairs, and to make them sensible of the force and justice of the United States, we should have full sixteen sail of frigates, four brigs, and two schooners, to carry on, for one or two years, an offensive war; and if they were well conducted, we may destroy all the corsairs of Algiers. This is saying more than the Spaniards or Portuguese ever did; but be assured I know it could be done easily by Americans. Try and hunt for Captains Barney and Murray, and take care that our ships are commanded by experienced and brave Americans, that will lead their countrypeople on to victory and glory. Show those people, the English, Spaniards, and Portuguese, that we are not a dastardly effeminate race, but are necessitated to arm to maintain the honor and dignity by United States.

A camp on the frontiers towards Canada; another towards the Mississippi; and Spain prays the United States will let them make their peace with all the Barbarous States.

We would advise you, sir, to do every thing interesting, to the letter of Mr. Skjoldebrand, jun. Depend you may confide in him; and be assured, honored sir, of truth from your unforfeiture fellow citizen.

O'BRIEN.

Hon. David Humphreys, Alicant.

Please to favor Mr. Montgomery in the perusal of these particulars.

J. McShane to Colonel Humphreys.

Algerian, November 12, 1793.

I have taken the liberty to inform you that I was captured on the 18th of October, by a chebek of twenty guns, in sight of Rock of Gibraltar, who spared our lives, but nothing else. I was taken in the ship Minerva, belonging to Mr. William Bell, merchant, Philadelphia, bound to Barcelona, with cargo of what belonging to Mr. Wise- man, of the aforesaid port, with sixteen men besides myself. I am kept in the marine, at hard labor, and my allowance is bread and water. Sir, place we the fullest confidence in your doing every thing in your power to relieve us from this unfortunate situation, and restore us from slavery to the land of liberty.

I have the honor to subscribe myself, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN McSHANE.

At the request of the following masters, I take the liberty of informing, that they are in the same situation as I have mentioned myself in before.

William Wallace, master, schooner Despatch; Messrs. Gallas and Freeman, Richmond, Virginia, six men besides the master.

Moses Taylor, master, brig Jane, owned by himself and Samuel P. Kiddier, Newburyport, seven men besides himself.

Michael Smith, brig Polly, owned by Bailey and Noyes, Newburyport, eight men besides himself.

William Penrose, ship President, owned by Messrs. John and James Craig, Philadelphia, ten men, one passenger, and himself.

James Taylor, brig George, owned by Gibbs and Channing, Newport, Rhode Island, seven men besides himself.

Samuel Calder, schooner Jay, owned by Ebenezer Pass, Gloucester, six men besides himself.

John Burnham, ship Hope, New York, eighteen men besides himself.

Timothy Newman, ship Thomas, Boston, owned by Thomas Adams, ten men besides himself, who were all captured in October last, between Cape St. Vincent and the Rock of Lisbon.

In consequence of the Portuguese obtaining a cessation of hostilities with this regency, the Algerine corsairs have captured ten American vessels; the masters and crews, amounting to about one hundred and five subjects of the United States, are employed as captive slaves on the most laborious work; they are in a distressed and naked situation.

Captain O'Brien to the President of the United States.

Algerian, November 5, 1793.

Most Excellent Sir:

In consequence of the Portuguese obtaining a cessation of hostilities with this regency, the Algerine corsairs have captured ten American vessels; the masters and crews, amounting to about one hundred and five subjects of the United States, are employed as captive slaves on the most laborious work; they are in a distressed and naked situation.

Vol. I.
Mathias Skjoldbrand, Esquire, the Swedish consul, has befriended them by advancing them money to relieve their present necessities. We hope you will order him to be reimbursed, and also paid for his generous advance in the ransoming of George Smith, one of the subjects of the United States, and the natural and inveterate enemies of the United States, has brought about this truce, or half peace for Portugal, in order to alarm our commerce, and prevent the United States from supplying the French in their present glorious contest for liberty.

The Algerine corsairs, at present at Algiers, relative to their peace. I have reason to believe they will obtain their peace for one million of dollars, not including presents, or the redemption of sixty-five Portuguese captives. The Algerine corsairs consist of ten sail, mounting forty guns to sixteen. Those of Tunis consist of twenty corsairs, mounting from twenty-four guns to eight.

The corsairs of Algiers and Tunis, to the consequence of the Portuguese truce, have become masters of the Western Ocean, and will of course prove very detrimental to the commerce of the United States to Europe. The fatal consequences of those American vessels being captured I presume is fully evident to your excellency's known wisdom and penetration.

Your excellency will perceive that the United States have at present no alternative than to fit out with the greatest expedition thirty frigates and corsairs, in order to stop those sea robbers in capturing American vessels. Fifteen of these vessels would be sufficient for a defensive war in order to guard the straits of Gibraltar, and prevent the Algerine and Tunis corsairs. Purser's order from visiting the Western Ocean; but in order to convince the Barbary States of the force and vigilance of American corsairs, it would be requisite the other fifteen American corsairs should be employed in the Mediterranean, in order to destroy many of the corsairs of the Barbary States, and oblige them to make a peace on some honorable terms with the United States; for if we leave them as the French did, they will become the natural enemies of those crafty people, who would in a great measure depend the desired effect in capturing the corsairs of this regency.

Humanity towards the unfortunate American captives I presume will induce your excellency to co-operate with Congress to adopt some speedy and effectual plan in order to restore to liberty and finally extricate the American captives from their present distresses.

I am, &c.

Extract of a letter from D. Humphreys to the Secretary of State.

 MADRID, December 25, 1793.

Sir:

We did not leave Alicante until Thursday the 12th instant, nor arrive here until the evening of Saturday last. I now take occasion to advise you of the final arrangements I made for the conveyance of Mr. Montgomery in the application of that part of my business which was committed to me, for the necessities of our citizens prisoners in Algiers, and for contingent expenses; as also for securing the residue of the public property now in his possession. This information you will find in the papers marked Nos. 1, 2, and 3. The last, you will be pleased to observe, is one of the four original receipts signed by Mr. Montgomery; and as such, ought to be preserved by Mr. Bowker for my justification, in accounting for the property of the United States which has come into my hands. Nos. 5 and 6 are copies of letters from Captain O'Brien, the former to Mr. Montgomery, the latter to me. In these you will find the most recent intelligence we have from Algiers. I am glad to see that O'Brien gives an account of eleven American vessels only as having been captured by the Algerians, instead of thirteen, which a Jew merchant of Algiers wrote to me on the 23d of November to Mr. Montgomery, had been brought in there; but I am induced to suppose he must have mistaken two Genoese vessels for Americans. The account given in the last of the enclosed letters of the Dey's actual dispositions and conduct towards the States, and the Swedish (after what has happened in pushing practical hostility in such an unusual manner against the United States and Genoa) gives reason to apprehend that some of the combined Powers may have an agency in this business. The departure of Mr. Pierre Eric Skjoldbrand at this moment is an extremely disagreeable and inconvenient circumstance for us.

I have received a copy of a letter from Mr. Bussara to Mr. Montgomery, received by him since I left Alicante. But the letter being written in bad Spanish, with a mixture of Lugna Frana, in a hand not easily legible, Mr. Short, Mr. Carmichael, and I, could only discover that it was meant to convey a desire from Bussara of being employed himself solely in our negotiations with Algiers; together with information that the Dey, his master (with whom he says he and the Bussara, the natural subject) did not believe the Government of the United States had ever appointed two commissioners to treat with him, who had died after their appointment; and, in short, that he, the Dey, would suffer no other agent to manage our affairs for us at Algiers, but Bussara.

I am also informed by Mr. Montgomery, that he has assented to his own resignation, and has informed me of the reasons he has assigned for it. But the Due of Bussara having, by some means or other, got hold of the copy of this letter, and sending a second one, I am informed, has induced him to this rash action by the Dey of Algiers expressing a desire he might not return to that place as British vice consul. I was personally acquainted with this young man, and from his apparent good disposition had hoped he would have been particularly desirous of our remaining, prisoners in Algiers.

Notwithstanding what Captain O'Brien says in his letter to me, I conceive there is still good reason to expect that Portugal will not conclude a peace with Algiers; at least the following extract of a letter from the consul of the United States at Malaga to me seems to carry this appearance: "Her faithful majesty, instead of retiring her squadron from Gibraltar, has reinforced it last week with two two sail of the line and three capital frigates. They are now ten sail, and have orders to give convoy to all Americans going to the westward, as far as they may require to get into safety from the enemy." And Mr. Simpson, of Gibraltar, advises me of the sailing of five American vessels from thence, under the protection of a Portuguese frigate. Lord St. Helens told Mr. Short and myself yesterday, that the Portuguese charged des affaires here said at his table the day before, "Portugal would not give six pence for a peace with Algiers." I have called on the Portuguese chargé des affaires, but have not been able to see him.
But if I may be allowed to offer an opinion I would say, under the circumstances I have represented, and after what has happened, it appears absurd to trust to the fleets of Portugal or any other nation to protect and convoy our trade. If we mean to have a commerce, we must have a naval force (to a certain extent) to defend it. Besides, the very separation of this would tend more towards enabling us to maintain our neutrality in the actual critical state of affairs in Europe, than all the declarations, reasonings, concessions, and sacrifices, that can possibly be made. Denmark, Sweden, and even Genoa, have as yet been able to avoid taking any hostile part, notwithstanding the apparent determination of the country. And I need not observe how much less in condition (from their population and other circumstances) to keep up a naval force some of those Powers are, than the United States.

As I am not much accustomed to offer opinions after having stated facts to you, I treat it may be considered in excuse, that the occasion seems to me of the last importance.

No. 1.

Instructions to Robert Montgomery, Esq. Consul of the United States of America at Alicat.

Sir:

In the application of that part of the money, the property of the United States of America, received by you from me, which is designed for relieving the necessities of the citizens of the United States who are prisoners in Algiers, and for defraying the contingent expenses which have been or may be inevitably incurred on the subject of Algerian affairs, you will be pleased to be guided by the following general principles, viz:

In the first place, in order to hide the nakedness, and screen from the inclemency of the season, the poor American prisoners in Algiers, you will have the goodness to provide for each one of them a comfortable suit of clothing, nearly in conformity to the estimate which has been made out for the purpose, unless the captains should choose rather to receive the amount in money, in which case you will comply with their wishes.

Secondly, you will please transmit, regularly, by way of subsistence, and for all other personal expenses, eight dollars a month to each of the captains, six dollars a month to each of the mates, and at the rate of twelve cents a day to each of the mariners.

Thirdly, you will please to repay whatever moneys may have been advanced by the consul general of Sweden at Algiers, or his brother Pierre Eric Skjoldbrand, Esq., to relieve the pressing necessities of the citizens of the United States lately captured and carried into Algiers; also such other sums as may be expended by either of them for communicating intelligence of importance, or for other contingent charges which may become indispensably necessary.

Fourthly, you will please to keep accurate accounts of your disbursements, and obtain as correct vouchers as the nature of the service permits. You will transmit the accounts in writing in order that there may hereafter be as little obscurity, trouble, and delay, in the final settlement, as possible.

Fifthly, the residue of the property of the United States, deposited by me in your hands, you will please to retain safely in your care, until you may receive further directions from the Secretary of State for the United States of America, from myself, or such person as may be duly authorized to dispose of it, except under the strong probability of an immediate rupture between this country and the United States, of which Mr. Carmichael will be requested to give you the earliest possible advice by express in which case you will secure the property of the United States in the best manner you can, by taking bills on any safe port, or other ways in the transaction of which business you must be guided by your own good discretion and great regard to the public interest.

Sixthly, you will be pleased to write to the Secretary of State for the United States of America, enclosing a copy of these instructions, and informing him they were given only with a view of remaining in force until they may receive further directions in the premises from the government.

Lastly, you are requested, sir, to open a correspondence with Pierre Eric Skjoldbrand, Esq., with the object of obtaining whatever useful intelligence, and rendering whatever services to the United States, may be in your power, from your favorable local situation, and well known good dispositions.

Given at Alicat, this 1st day of December, 1799.

D. HUMPHREYS,
Commissioner Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the Dey and Regency of Algiers.

No. 4.

Algiers, November 16, 1799.

Sir:

I had wrote Mr. Humphreys fully by the return of the small courier for Spain, informing that there is at present captured by the Americans ten sail of American vessels; their crews are all made slaves; a few Spaniards were amongst them they were cleared.

I had wrote my sentiments relative to the proposition. We lost an opportunity that will not be retrieved, except by negociating with you, a course which I thought you might adopt, but in the present state of the public business. By means urge Congress to fit out somes remarkably fast sailing cruisers, well appointed and manned. This is requisite, if we doe not obtain the peace. The Dutch truce want but fourteen days from this time to be expired, and finished; and I am sure that at that juncture, if any one was fully empowered in this place relative to our affairs, we might obtain what we wish. Secondly, I believe the Portuguese will not give the regency the money, &c. that is asked (this we should not trust to.) Thirdly, I believe the Danes will shortly have war but they may easily, as yet, put their affairs on a solid footing. Look sharp, Americans, or you will be dupe and buillion to all Europe. Three are at sea, they have sent two in Algiers not known whether an American or English, but I believe the latter, as she has wrote on her stern, the Minerva, of Plymouth, loaded with wine and brandy.

There are more preparing for the Western Ocean.

You sent two hundred dollars; one of these I gave to the new naked captives. Take care that there will not be many to redeem. Hunger, fatigue, and slavery are not the only accompaniments, but the plague and slavery for life, as they see that the victim remnant has been here nine years. That foundation laid by A. B. D. is torn up a new one in another channel must be laid, or all must suffer and perish, and with them your most unfortunate friends.

O'BRIEN.

I received Mr. Carmichael's letter of the 13th September. I shall answer him fully when I find a safe conveyance. We must be guarded, and use precaution.

(Addressed to Mr. Montgomery, and N. B. of Mr. Montgomery.) "The initials of A. B. and D. are A. Bassara and Danenos, our Jew friends at Algiers.

No. 5.

Captain O'Brien to Colonel Humphreys.

Algiers, December 6, 1799.

HONORED SIR:

I had wrote you fully the 19th ultimo, by the return of the courier which you sent on our business. I am this day informed that said courier arrived safe in Alicat, and, of course, you know how our affairs stand in this quarter. In answer to the ten sail of American vessels captured the first cruise, they have captured the brig Minerva, of New York, Capt. Ingraham, from Livorno; so that there is at present one hundred and twelve American captures in this city.

Since the departure of the Portuguese frigate, we have heard nothing more on that business, on which many conjectures were formed. The Dey's terms are, one million two hundred thousand Mexican dollars, for the treasury of the Regency; six hundred thousand for the Dey and family; six hundred thousand dollars for the Algerine minister, ambassadorial and consular presents equal to what Spain gave, which will amount to six hundred thousand dollars, not forgetting the number of French frigates to be sent the Portuguese court, and exorbitant that, sir, it costs exorbitant sums to keep up armaments to keep those people from depredations. I think the Portuguese will give all that is asked. They will free their colors and extend their commerce.

The Dey has prolonged the Dutch truce, and has commissioned the British consul to write to the Dutch admiral that is to come here to settle the peace, and desiring the admiral to give a definitive answer, peace or war. I believe the Dey has given the Dutch three months more. However, depend, that the longer the stay the more exorbitant their terms will be, and the more difficulty and opposition to settle the peace.

The Danish affairs are as yet as when I wrote you. It is said that inevitably the Danes may expect war, even if their annual tribute does arrive; and if it does not, this will give the Dey a stronger pretence.

The Swedish presents for the peace are not come. The Dey, enraged, gave the Swedes six months to complete all; if not, they look out for war. This necessitated Monsieur Skjöldebrand, junior, to depart this day from Algiers for Liverpool, to make up, if he can, the deficiency of the present orders to the Swedish court in the situation of the Danish affairs; and in consequence our affairs have met with a great loss and strong advocate in the absence of M. Skjöldebrand, junior; but, sir, there is no alternative. Indeed, sir, I see no alternative, but for the United States, with all possible speed, to fit out ten sail of forty gun frigates, six brigs of war of eighteen guns each, and four schooners or cutters of sixteen guns each. These to be the fastest sailing vessels ever built in America; appointed and manned; and to proceed towards Gibraltar, Algeziras, and Mahon, there to rendezvous, and to carry on a vigilant and offensive cruising. They will give more security to our commerce than all the marine of Portugal did. And depend, sir, that if this plan is not adopted speedily that the corsairs of Algiers and Tunis will remain masters of the Western Ocean, and that they have already taken the channel of the Western Islands, and be tempted to go the coast of the United States. Then, sir, what will be the consequences; what will be the alarm? Even if you succeed, or not, the present moment requires we should have cruisers. The same time, at all events, the door should be left open for the peace; and, I am exceedingly sorry, even at this crisis, that you have not fully empowered some confidential person in Algiers, to lay the foundation and pave the way, so that you may come and put a finishing hand to this business, which would be of such importance to our country.

These corsairs are this day eleven sail, mounting from forty-four to twelve guns only one is at sea. I am afraid they may attack the coast. The corsairs and frigates are too formidable a force, and the frigates are armed, sir.

These combined, would strike terror to the American commerce, if they in the summer proceed out into the Western Ocean; and, considering our small prospects with the olive branch, will more forcibly indicate to you the necessity of the United States fitting cruisers. Even if we were at peace with all the world, we should have cruisers to give us some security; for, we cannot believe any engagement with these corsairs.

It is needless in me, who have suffered so much, to touch on the distress of those unfortunate men. I have known my country nearly nine years captivity by her cruelty, perhaps unprecedented in the annals of tyranny. They must see their error, now too late.

I had forewarned you of this misfortune; but men in adversity are generally paid little or no attention to. They had other information than mine. Those half friends of the United States had their views, mine, depend, was to serve my persecuting country.

I have, sir, taken the liberty of writing you my sentiments on our affairs, but I know that you once declined any such correspondence; you will remember the circumstance. But I think present no excuse to plead, and depend, solicit no favor. Hoping to God your endeavors will be attended shortly with the greatest success, sir, your most obedient servant.

O'BRIEN.

You will please to give the perusal of this letter to Mr. Robert Montgomery; and, indeed, I write you the same time, I am much indisposed; therefore, you will make some excuse on that tack.

Extract of a letter from D. Humphreys to the Secretary of State.

LISBON, January 30, 1794.

Sir:

I left Madrid on the 12th, and arrived here on the 25th instant. On my arrival your letter of the 11th of September was put into my hand, which is the only one I have had the honor to receive from you since those that were brought by Mr. Cutting. I proceed to you papers of the following numbers and descriptions, viz. No. 1, the copy of a letter from me to the American captains in captivity at Algiers; No. 2, original memorials from them to the two Houses of Congress, which I have promised to transmit, to be presented accordingly; No. 3, a copy of a letter from the French consul at Algiers; No. 4, extracts from Mr. Montgomery's letter to me; No. 5, my answer to the letter from the American captains in captivity; No. 6, my answer to the French consul at Algiers; and No. 7, my answer to Mr. Montgomery's letter of the 8th of January. These communications complete my correspondence up to this time, on Algerine affairs, and I hope by my proceedings in them may meet the approbation of Government. As soon as Mr. Cutting shall have finished the accounts of the disposition of public property, &c. which had been destined for this service, they shall be transmitted to you without loss of time; after which I shall consider myself exonerated from any further duties under the commissions of the 21st of March last. Mr. Cutting proposes to leave this place in a short time for Ireland. He will then, of course, be detached from his connexion with the Algerine ministers.

Upon consulting with Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Short, it was judged imprudent to make any further disclosures, or overtures, to any person in Algiers, respecting the terms which had been limited as an ultimatum, or for obtaining a capitulation. I thought it unwise to make any measure of mutual forbearance; and I firmly and deliberately thought that, to make specific proposals, which (from the change in the state of affairs) would certainly be rejected, must be highly disadvantageous to the United States in case of any future negotiations.

Having already reported to you all the material facts in the regular order of time at which they occurred, I will only beg leave to add, that as some small personal consolation for the distressing sensations which have been excited by want of success, I cannot but feel a consciousness that the failure has not been owing to any neglect or want of exertion on my part. I also feel a peculiar degree of satisfaction in having received such strong testimonies of the sympathy of the people of this country. And I hope, sir, I may safely say, that the excitement and alarm you will perceive, is the case of one of the captains and crew now in slavery at Algiers, by the following answer which Mr. Murphy, consul of the United States, at Malaga, wrote in consequence of my inquiry respecting that fact: "Captain Calder, of the schooner Jay, is the identical person whose name is so justly and universally unpopular here. I received his note hence, after having been made acquainted with the news you gave me of the Algerines having passed the Straits."

All agree that the number of American vessels which have fallen into the hands of the Algerines is much less than could have reasonably been expected from the circumstances. Mr. Cutting is in the fair without giving the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He informs me that this court has sent a second messenger to Algiers; that the terms insisted upon by it are such as give the greatest reason to believe the Day and Regency will not accede to them; and that, in about fifteen days, an ultimate answer may be expected; of which notice will be given to me.

Another convoy is granted by this court, expressly for the American vessels now here, which amount to twenty-two sail.

With sentiments of great esteem, &c.

D. HUMPHREYS.

ALGIERS, December 29, 1793.

HONORED SIR:

We, the subscribers, in behalf of ourselves and brother sufferers, at present captives in this city of human misery, return you our sincere thanks for your communications of the 29th ultimo, and for the provision you have been pleased to allow us, in order to elevate somewhat our situation from present unfortunate situations.

We have drawn up and signed two petitions, one to the Senate, the other to the House of Representatives, and we shall esteem it among the many favors you have rendered us, that you will please to forward these petitions to their respective address, so that no time may be lost, but that they be laid before the Representatives of our country, hopefully informed that the United States will fully provide funds for extricating from captivity, and restore us to our country, families, friends, and connexions.

We have perused, with sentiments of satisfaction and approbation, your memorial to the Regency of Algiers; and have observed, that its contents fully coincide with our sentiments on this business, which we trust to the Almighty will terminate to the honor and interests of our common country, notwithstanding the insinuations (of others in this quarter) to the prejudice of the United States.

We trust and hope that the United States will adopt such effectual plans, in order to prevent any more of our brother slaves sharing our unhappy fate, which unavoidably must happen, if some speedy and decisive means is not immediately put in execution, as we understand the Portuguese truce with this regency was agreed on for one year.

What dumps our spirits, in some degree, is, that we are informed that the plague, that fatal and tremendous disorder, has given its awful alarm in the countries adjacent; and, as your unfortunate countrymen are confined during the night time in the slave prisons, with six hundred captives of other nations, that from our present situation we must be exposed to this contagious disorder, which necessitates the subscribers to entreat you, sir, that, in this case, those our friends, and of influence in this regency, will be authorized by you, and our honored countrymen, Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Short, to have a house taken for the residence of the American masters and mates, and, if possible, the mariners, to shield them from the threatening storm of mortality and danger.

We make no doubt, that, in case of the Almighty's wrath visiting this city of iniquity, but the Day and Regency would acquiesce to the proposed plan of humanity, which would be establishing an example for the general welfare of mankind; and, would, to posterity, be recorded to the immortal honor of the United States.

The same time, honored sir and friend, be you assured, for your consolation, that we, the American captives in this city of bondage, will bear our sufferings with fortitude and resignation, as becoming a race of men endowed with superior souls in adversity.

We are indebted to Mr. Skjoldebrand, and brother, his Swedish majesty's agents in this city, for their humanity and attention to the American captives, and feel ourselves particularly obliged to you for recommending us to the good offices of Consul Skjoldebrand, and Mr. Mace, whom you mention to us as a friend.

With sentiments of gratitude, &c. the subscribers, in behalf of themselves and brother sufferers,

N. B. The foregoing addressed on the outside, "Hon. David Humphreys, American ambassador, at present at Madrid."

No. 2.

ALGIERS, December 29, 1793.

To the honorable Representatives of the United States of America, the humble petition of the American captives in Algiers most humbly shews:

That your petitioners had the misfortune to be captured, by the corsairs of this regency, in October and November last, whilst we were navigating vessels belonging to citizens of the United States. That your petitioners, and their crews, are at present captives in this city of bondage, employed daily on the most laborious work, without any respect to persons.

That your most humble petitioners are informed, that the plague, that fatal and tremendous disorder, is raging in the country adjacent, and, as your unfortunate petitioners are confined in two slave prisons, with six hundred captives of other nations, that, from their situation, the wisdom of the United States will consider what must be the fatal effects of the plague spreading, and become alarming amongst the captives.

That your petitioners return their country their sincere thanks for the provision allowed them by their worthy representative, Mr. Humphreys, which provision, in some degree, helps to alleviate, somewhat, our hard fate and sufferings, without which allowance, our lives would be rendered much more benumbing and unhappy.

That your petitioners pray you will take their unfortunate situation into consideration, and adopt such measures as will restore the American captives to their country, their friends, families, and connexions; and your most humble petitioners will ever pray and be thankful.

ALGIER, December 15, 1793, 2d year of the French republic.

Sir:  The navigation of the United States has just been odiously abandoned to the corsairs of this Regency. I have thought that it would probably be convenient to Congress to make peace with Algiers, and that the mediation of one free people in favor of another, would be the most agreeable to your nation. I am, therefore, going to make the overture on the subject to the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Paris. I should be charmed if my endeavors prove useful to your country. I should be as attentive to its suffering interests as to those of my own. I must inform you, however, that your peace here will inevitably be costly; but, if those of Portugal and of Holland should miscarry, the circumstance would then prove favorable to you, and your conditions would become less onerous. I greet you, &c.

The consul of France at Algiers.

MADRID, January 12, 1794.

My dear Sirs:

I have been favored by the receipt of your joint letter, dated the 29th of December; and as I am about to set out immediately for Lisbon, I shall be able to do little more than to assure you, that your memorials to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States shall be forwarded to them in the earliest and safest manner possible.

Having communicated to Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Short, your apprehension that the plague may be again introduced to Algiers from the adjacent countries, where it is already said to prevail, we have not hesitated to conciliate with you in sentiment, that, in case of that dreadful event, it might be useful for you to have a house hired in the country, in order to endeavor, by all humane precautions, to prevent your falling victims to that terrible disorder. Whereupon, Mr. Robert Montgomery, consul of the United States at Aliant, has been empowered, in case that dreadful event shall happen, to furnish sufficient money to pay for the hire of a house, in the manner, and for the purpose, you propose. This provisional arrangement to continue in force until Mr. Montgomery shall receive further instructions from the Government of the United States for continuing or suspending the same.

I treat you will be persuaded, my dear and unfortunate countrymen, that I receive, with great satisfaction, the marks of your appreciation of the honest but ineffectual efforts I have made in your favor. Would to heaven they had been as successful as they were disinterested and sincere. I have only to repeat that you may, at all times, and on all occasions, count upon the sympathetic regard and esteem of your real friend and affectionate fellow-citizen,

D. HUMPHREYS.

P. S. Although I have repeatedly remarked, that it may, perhaps, (for particular reasons) be inexpedient for me to keep up a regular correspondence with you; yet, it is proper I should add, that I shall always be glad to hear from you, and that I may be particularly interesting to the Government of our country, to receive, at the earliest possible period, all intelligence of importance. I shall, therefore, always be ready to communicate such intelligence, until some nearer and better channel of communication can be established.

To Captain O'Brien, and the other captains and citizens of the United States, now prisoners in Algiers.

Sir:

I have duly received, in this place, the letter which you were pleased to address to the American ambassador at Alcant, on the 15th of December last, and shall, without loss of time, have the honor of transmitting a copy thereof to the Executive of the United States of America.

In the mean time, in making my acknowledgments for your obliging offers, I avail myself, &c.

No. 7.

Colonel Humphreys to R. Montgomery, Esq. United States’ Consul at Alcant.

MADRID, January 12, 1794.

My Dear Sir:

I have had the pleasure to receive, by the last mail, your letter of the 8th instant; and, being on the point of departure for Lisbon, I can only briefly reply to the most interesting parts of it.

I coincide with you in opinion, with respect to the provision which should be made for the supercargoes and second mates in captivity at Algiers. You must act according to the best of your discretion, in hiring a small barque to carry over the clothing and necessaries to Algiers, or in still attempting to find a conveyance for them, by the packet from Carthagena, or some private vessel from Valencia or elsewhere. If the expense of hiring a small barque, on purpose, (inconsiderable as the expense may be) can be avoided, without leaving the prisoners to suffer, it certainly will be eligible to avoid its if not, the expense will come under the head of inevitable contingent charges, which you must be authorized to make.

Upon consulting with Mr. Short and Mr. Carmichael, it was judged expedient, that, in case the plague should again make its appearance in Algiers, the American captains, &c. in captivity, should be enabled to hire a house, in the country, in order to prevent them (if possible) from falling victims of that dreadful scourge of heaven. In which case, therefore, you are hereby empowered to make the necessary advance of money, from the money of the United States deposited by me in your hands, to pay for the hire of the said house, until the Government of the United States shall have been apprised of this provisional arrangement, and shall have thought proper to express their pleasure for continuing, or suspending, the said arrangement. And you are requested to apprise them of the arrangement accordingly.

With sentiments of great regard and esteem, I am, &c.

D. HUMPHREYS.

P. S. I have again mentioned the subject of hastening the signature and final despatch of your exequatur, to the person alluded to in your letter. This is all that it would be proper for me to do in the business. You will be pleased, after perusing and sealing the letter for the American captains in captivity, to forward it to them by some safe conveyance. Have the goodness to offer my compliments, as usual.

FOREIGN AGGRESSIONS ON AMERICAN COMMERCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 5, 1794.

Message transmitting a report of the Secretary of State on the spoliations committed on the commerce of the United States.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The Secretary of State, having reported to me upon the several complaints which have been lodged in this office against the vexations and spoliations on our commerce, since the commencement of the European war, I transmit to you a copy of his statement, together with the documents upon which it is founded.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 5, 1794.

PHILADELPHIA, March 2, 1794.

Sir:

In your message to both Houses of Congress, on the 5th of December, 1793, you inform them, that "the vexations and spoliations, understood to have been committed on our vessels and commerce by the cruisers and officers of some of the belligerent Powers, appeared to require attention: That the proofs of these, however, not having been brought forward, the description of citizens, supposed to have suffered, were notified, that, on furnishing them to the Executive, due measures would be taken to obtain redress of the past, and more effectual provisions against the future" and that, "should such documents be furnished, proper representations will be made thereon, with a just reliance on a redress proportioned to the exigency of the case."

On my successor to the Department of State, I found a large volume of complaints, which the notification had collected, against severities on our trade, various in their kind and degree. Having reason to presume, as the fact has proved, that every day would increase the catalogue, I have waited to digest the mass, until time should have been allowed for exhibiting the diversified forms in which our commerce has hourly suffered. Every information is at length obtained which may be expected.

The sensations excited by the embarrassments, danger, and even ruin, which threaten our trade, cannot be better expressed, than in the words of the committee of Philadelphia. After enumerating particular instances of injury, their representation to Government proceeds thus: "On these cases, which are accompanied by the legal proofs, the committee think it unnecessary to enlarge, as the inferences will, of course, occur to the Secretary; but they beg leave to be permitted to state other circumstances, which, though not in legal proof, are either of such public notoriety as to render legal proof unnecessary, or so vouched to the committee as to leave them in no doubt of the truth of them."

"It has become a practice for many of the privateers of the belligerent Powers to send into port all American vessels they meet with, bound from any of the French ports in the West Indies to the United States; and it is positively asserted, that the owners of some of them have given general instructions to their captains to that effect;"
and, though many of those vessels have been afterwards liberated, yet the loss by plunder, detention, and expense, is so great, as to render it ruinous to the American owner. In many cases, where the cargoes have been valuable, they have been discharged from the coast, after escaping the French mariners, for fear of their being seized; and many a poor American citizen has to do, every day, with a view of getting the property into their hands, upon a valuation made so unfairly, as to ensure them a considerable profit, even if they should be finally made liable.

"Fourteen days only are allowed to an American owner to make his claim, which renders it impossible for him, except in extraordinary difficulty which a combination of interested persons can devise, to throw in the way, to prevent his getting security; and in few instances can it be done, but by making over his vessels and cargo to the securities, and thereby subjecting himself to the heavy additional charge of commission, insurance, \\
&c. It may be added, that the most barefaced bribery is sometimes practised to prevail on unruly boys, or those who know little news of their business, to go on board of him, and give him to understand that he will receive the money in the case of the former, or considerable value in the case of the latter, and thereby go to give testimony in favor of the captors.

"Beside the cases here enumerated, the committee have information of a number of vessels belonging to this port, being captured and carried into different ports; but as the legal proofs are not come forward, they forbear to mention them.

"It is proper, however, for them to add, that, besides the loss of property occasioned by those unjust captures and detentions, the masters and crews of the vessels are frequently subjected to insults and outrages, that must be shocking to Americans. Of this the case of Captain Wallace is an instance. There are others within the knowledge of the committee, of which they have been directly informed, that have not been brought to their notice.

"To this last list of grievances the committee are sorry to find it their duty to add, that, by reason of the vexation, loss, and outrages, suffered by the merchants of the United States, its commerce already begins to languish, and its products are likely to be left upon the hands of those who raise them. Prudent men doubt the propriety of hazard their property, when they find that the strictest conformity with the laws of nations, or of their own country, will not protect them from the capricacy of men who are neither restrained by the principles of honor, nor by law sufficiently coercive to give security to those who are not subjects of the same government.

"The committee conclude this representation with an assurance, that they have, in no degree, exaggerated in the statement they have made, and that they will continue to communicate all such information as they may further receive; of which nature, before the closing of this report, they are sorry to add, is, that of the intrusions of the Algerines from the Mediterranean, in consequence of a truce concluded with that regency, it is said by the British minister at Algiers, that such traders are thence taking part of our goods, or the cargoes of our vessels, and that they have already become victims, of so distressing a nature, as must soon deprive us of some of the most lucrative branches of our commerce, if not speedily checked or prevented. The immediate rise it has produced in insurance, and the fears it may instil into our seamen and commanders, are of a nature highly deserving the serious consideration of the Government, on whose protection and zeal for the interests, commercial and agricultural, of the country, the committee implicitly rely."

In a supplementary letter the committee of Philadelphia make this conclusion: "that the cases which they recite, and which they are convinced, will most frequently happen, that, in frequent instances of suppression of papers, papers, \\
&c. very prejudicial to our shipping on their trials, and of injuries by the destruction of letters, to the general correspondence of the country with foreign nations.

When we examine the documents which have been transmitted from different parts of the Union, we find the British, the French, the Spaniards, and the Dutch, charged with attacks upon our commerce.

It is urged against the British,

1. That their privateers plunder the American vessels, throw them out of their course by forcing them, upon groundless suspicion, into ports other than those to which they were destined; detain them, even after the hope of a reign of indemnity, when they have already denounced their character, unless they sign a false and illegal legal proof to lay them before the Secretary.

2. That British ships of war have forcibly seized mariners belonging to American vessels, and in one instance under the protection of a Portuguese fort.

3. That, by British regulations and practice, our corn and provisions are driven from the ports of France, and restricted to the ports of the British, or those of their friends.

4. That our vessels are not permitted to go from the British ports in the islands without giving security (which is not attainable but with difficulty and expense) for the charge of the cargo in some other British or a neutral port.

5. That, without the imputation of a contraband trade, as defined by the law of nations, our vessels are captured for carrying on a commercial intercourse with the French West Indies, although it is tolerated by the laws of the French republic; and that, for this extraordinary conduct, no other excuse is alleged than that by some edict of a kindred nature, this kind of intercourse was prohibited.

6. That the conduct of the admiralty in the British islands is impeachable for an excess of rigor, and a departure from strict justice; and the expenses of an appeal to England too heavy to be encountered under all the circumstances of discouragement.

Against the French it is urged,

1. That their privateers harass our trade no less than those of the British.

2. That two of their ships of war have committed enormities on our vessels.

3. That their courts of admiralty are guilty of equal oppression.

4. That, besides these points of accusation, which are common to the French and British, the former have infringed the treaty between the United States and them, by subjecting to seizure and condemnation our vessels trading with their enemies in merchandise, which treaty declares not to be contraband, and under circumstances not forbidden by the law of nations.

5. That a very detrimental embargo has been laid upon large numbers of American vessels in the French ports;* and

6. That a contract with the French Government for coin has been discharged in depreciated assignats.

Against the Spaniards the outrages of privateers are urged; and Against the Dutch, one condemnation in the admiralty is insisted to be unwarrantable.

Under this complication of mischief, which persecutes our commerce, I beg leave, sir, to submit to your consideration the following facts, as facts which may justly, ought not to be immediately pressed upon the foreign Governments, in those of the preceding cases for which they are responsible.

Among these, I class, 1. The violations perpetrated by public ships of war. 2. Prohibitions, or regulations inconsistent with the laws of nations. 3. The indulgence of private commanders. 4. Infractions of treaty. 5. The possession of embargoes; and 6. The breach of public contracts.

How far a Government is liable to execrate the rapine of privateers, depends upon the peculiarities of the case. It is incumbent upon it, however, to keep its courts freely open, and to secure an impartial hearing to the injured applicant. If the rules prescribed to privateers be too loose, and opportunities too ill treatment be allowed them, or from the prospect of impunity, it is impossible to be too strenuous in lamenting against this formidable evil.

Thus, sir, have I reduced to general heads the particular complaints, without making any inquiry into the facts beyond the allegations of the parties interested.

I will only add, that your message seems to promise to Congress some statement upon these subjects.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

* There is reason to believe that the embargo was removed in December last, and the detention compensated by an order of the Committee of Public Safety in France.
SPAIN.

3d Congress. No. 84. ([1st Session.]

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 13, 1794.

Message transmitting to Congress two letters of the Commissioners of Spain.

UNITED STATES, March 13, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit you the translations of two letters from the Commissioners of his Catholic Majesty to the Secretary of State, and of their enclosures.

G. WASHINGTON.

Sir: Some circuitous course of the despatches having retarded our receiving the edict of his majesty, containing the declaration of war against the French, in consequence of their having declared war against Spain, and committed hostilities, and atrocities so odious to mankind, I gave my faithful and beloved vassals particular proofs of the paternal vigilance with which I setze all occasions to promote their own happiness, that engages my fondest wishes, and to which they are no less entitled by their unparalleled loyalty, than by their noble and generous conduct.

The measures and direction, that directed all my measures taken concerning France, since that period when the principles of confusion, of opulence, and anarchy, were displayed, and those disturbances began, which threw her inhabitants into the utmost agitation and ruin, is a matter so notorious, that it would be superfluous to adduce any further proofs thereof. I confine myself, however, only to draw your attention to the late events of the last months, without mentioning those manifold transactions, the very idea whereof I wish to blush from my mind, and that of my beloved vassals, alleging only the most horrid of the same, as it cannot be omitted.

My principal views were concentrated in one point, to wit: to try whether it was possible to prevail on the French to embrace a reasonable conduct, that by renouncing their boundless ambition, a general war over Europe might be prevented, and, in consequence thereof, personal liberty might at least be procured to the Most Christian King, and to his august family, who are confined in a tower, and daily exposed to the most poignant outrages, insults, and dangers. To obtain an end so beneficial to general tranquility, so conformable to the dictates of humanity, and so conducive with the obligations which the justice and pietas impose upon us, and are requisite to support the splendor and dignity of our crown. I yielded to the repeated instances of the French minister, by causing two notes to be executed; in which neutrality, and a reciprocal recalling of the troops, were stipulated.

When they perceived that they had obtained the object of their negotiation, they accepted of both, but changed that one respecting the recalling of their forces, by proposing to keep part of the same in the environs of Bayonne, under the palpable pretext of being under apprehension of an invasion of the English, but in reality, to indulge their own convenience, by placing themselves on a formidable footing, that occasioned great expense on our side, as we thereby were obliged to continue an equal force on our frontiers, if we would not have our dominions exposed to be overrun by undisciplined and unruly people. They could not refrain from using (in the same note) repeatedly, and with a great deal of affectation, that expression, "in the name of the republic of France" thereby endeavoring to get it acknowledged by us as such, by the very act of our accepting that official paper.

I had given orders that, when those notes, executed here, should be presented at Paris, at the same time the most efficacious measures should be taken to procure relief to King Louis XVI. and his disgraced family; and if the safety of the lives of those royal persons was not explicitly expressed, as the absolute condition of the neutrality and disarming stipulated, it was done from the apprehension, the situation of the cause itself might be hurt, on the happy event whereof I had taken so warm and due a concern. I, however, at the same time, was convinced, that without an extreme bad faith on the side of the French ministry, it never could be controverted, that so strong a recommendation and interposition, accompanied with the immediate dispatching of those notes, must be construed as standing in a secret, and so close a connexion with the same, that there was no possibility to carry one point into execution, in case they should refuse to fulfill the other part of the convention, as the omitting of an explicit expression of that condition was advised by delicacy, and with a view that the French ministers the easier might prevail on the different parties by which France at that time was, and is still divided, and so might be enabled to bring about that good end, which, to embrace, we then had reasons to think her disposed to.

Her bad faith has manifested itself since, when she, foigning to be ignorant of what she owed to the recommendation and interposition of a sovereign, placed at the head of a great and gallant nation, yet insisted on the admission of those notes in their altered quality, and accompanied her different urgent applications concerning them, with threats, that the persons charged here with her affairs, should, in case of a refusal, be recalled. Whilst they continued those negotiations, they committed the barbarous and unheard of murder of their own sovereign; and when my heart, which of all Spaniards, was filled with horror and mortal indignation at so atrocious a crime, they durst yet to continue the negotiations, certainly not supposing that there was a probability of their being admitted, without compromising my own honor, and that of my subjects, well knowing that any application, under such circumstances, really bears the stamp of irony and mockery, to which no hearing could be given; without violating honor and friendship, they requested passports to embark their agents, which were granted. At the same time a Spanish vessel being taken on the coast of Catalonia, by a French vessel, I ordered the commander-in-chief to set by reprisals; and, at almost the same time, intelligence arrived of other captures made by their vessels, and of their detaining and laying an embargo on our shipping at Marseilles, and other ports of France.

Finally, they, on the 16th, declared war against us, in which we were involved before, (though without a public intimidation) from at least the 26th of February, that day being the date of the commission against our men of war and merchants, and of the other papers that were in possession of the French privateer called the Fox, Captain John Baptista Lalane, when he took our brig the Active, commanded by Captain Don Juan de Dios Capete, with a Spanish vessel laden with gunpowder, conducted by him.

Therefore, to retaliate such conduct, and considering the hostilities begun by the French, even previously to the declaration of war, I have despatched this letter to discover, destroy, defend, and attack, the enemy, by sea and land, as opportunities may offer, resolving and ordering that, from hence, war is declared at this court to France, her dominions and inhabitants, and that those regulations be despatched throughout every part of my dominions, that they may prepare for their defence, and for open offence against the enemy. The present are conformable with the records in council for the accomplishment of what relates thereto. Given at Aranjuez, the 23d of March, 1793.

By the King:

Count DE CANADA.

Messa. Jaudenes and Viar to Edmund Randolph, Esq. Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, March 5, 1794.

SIR,

The assurances of harmony and good disposition towards Spain, which, on different occasions, the Government of the United States have given to us, and especially those which you, sir, on the 1st instant, verbally repeated to Don Veedo, and corresponded with the confidence and frankness of which said messages received by us, do not seem to authorize proceedings so hostile and contradictory as those practised by several individuals, citizens of the United States.

Your penetration will immediately lead you to perceive that we allude to those expediions which are in motion in the respective States of South Carolina, Kentucky, and Georgia, against the dominions of the King, our master.

The copy of a letter written by the Governor of East Florida, near Georgia, (which we have the honor here to enclose for your consideration) plainly asserts the truth of what lately has passed; and the different intelligence received in this capital, evince the situation of the other provinces of the same and adjacent States, are in entire agreement with those of the Governor of East Florida, sufficiently and strongly urges the nullity of the like conduct on our part within the United States, and the Government of the United States must needs be informed thereof better still, we deem it superfluous to dwell here on representations against absurd charges of this kind; therefore, we consider the despatch of the aforesaid letter, and the conduct of the Governor of East Florida, sufficiently to enforce the execution of their laws and regulations, as well as the notorious partiality of their citizens and individual inhabitants in favor of France, tending to the open prejudice of the interests of Spain, are likely to interrupt the good understanding and sincere amity that happily subsisted between the two nations to the present period, and which the United States the Government took upon as a connexion of consequence.

We expect, with confidence, that the energetic and prudent measures the States will adopt for preserving so advantageous a connexion as that with the nation we have the honor to represent, will be productive of the most solid and reciprocal harmony; to cultivate which his majesty has ever shown so happy a disposition. We have the honor to subscribe ourselves, &c.

JOSEPH IGNATIO DE VIAR, JOSEF D. JAUDENES.

P. S. According to our best information, a certain Dr. O'Fallon is one of the principal accomplices and abettors of the plots of the United States ordered to be apprehended, on the application of our predecessor in office, Don Diego de Garloqui, for projects of a similar nature.

He was, it seems, designing enough to avoid being taken, and to keep himself concealed. As the seizure of his person has not been yet effected, it is obvious that the United States did not pay due attention to a matter of so serious a nature.

EDMUND RANDOLPH, Esq.

The Governor of East Florida to Governor Mathews.

RESPECTED SIR,

On the 7th instant I wrote to your excellency by Mr. Juan Wallie, Vice Consul of Great Britain, in this city, that I have in my possession a declaration made on oath by an inhabitant of the city aforesaid, by which it appears that an expedition is under contemplation, and preparing against this province; that the American Governor, Samuel Hammond, is to have the command thereof; that Captain Hardy is one of the persons appointed to enrol the people residing in the county of Camden; that the troops so enlisted are to take an oath of fidelity (allegiance) to France and that they have, also, a naval force ready to act in concert with them for the same purpose.

Then I intreated your excellency what I expected from your well known zeal, that you would not neglect any exertion to counteract those wicked designs, that might disturb the intimate friendship subsisting between the court of Spain and the United States.

On the same date, I further informed you of my having charged the British vice consul, above mentioned, persons to appear in my name, and representing my person, and that of the King, my master, before your excellency, or before any other tribunal, with a petition to have the ringleaders of that premeditated attempt put under arrest, in order to obtain the satisfaction and redress due for the insults that were preparing for the royal flag and the dignity of his majesty. Subsequent to that information, I received further intelligence that the hostile project was on the eve of being executed; that, in the county of Camden, aforesaid, there is a body of sixteen hundred cavalry, in three divisions, under orders of the said Samuel Hammond, who has been appointed brigadier general in the British service; that the said divisions of cavalry are fully equipped and officered; that, in the fortified places of the province, there are formed two large magazines of provisions and ammunition of all kind, that were purchased by Mr. Abner Hammond, a brother of the commander-in-chief of that expedition, who is appointed colonel for the cavalry, both being inhabitants of that city; that there are three French frigates to sail from the port of Beaufort, having a thousand or eleven hundred men on board, in order to attack this province both by sea and land at the same time, which will be done in at least three weeks. Those advices not being of an indifferent nature, I had them proved by declarations of various subjects, and confirmed on oath; and, what is more still, I caused the same to be signed by the above mentioned Mr. Abner Hammond, one of the principal heads of the plot, whom I had the good fortune to seize within the limits of my jurisdiction, on the beach of the river St. Juan, whom I now keep under strict guard.

It is a matter incomprehensible to me how men of character and influence in that city, as both the brothers Hammond are, as well as others, suffered themselves to be seduced by the wicked insinuations of the French, even to such a degree as to compromise their own country, as is well known to your excellency that the raising of troops within the territory of a neutral Power, as that of the United States is, or to sail from its bosom with land and sea forces, to carry the sword into this province, is an evident violation of the law of nations, and a breach of the neutral character so solemnly declared, and consequently insulting a powerful monarch in the most formal and unequivocal manner.

Your excellency received my former information, by which I communicated to you the whole of the machinations that were put in motion in that city under your protection against this province under my trust. Being fully persuaded that your excellency, actuated by your zeal in the service, have taken the most efficacious measures to put a stop to those designs by arresting the leaders, as I requested you before, and do now request you again by the present requisition, which I transmit to you in the most formal terms; in consequence of which, you will please to exert your utmost efforts till the said plot shall be entirely destroyed: meanwhile, I make all possible dispositions to due defence to repel force by force; of all which I shall render an exact account to the King, my master, enclosing for his superior consideration all proofs I am possessed of, and which ascertain the imminent danger of an approaching invasion of the royal flag and his majesty's dominions, that his majesty may cause such steps to be taken as may secure due redress to his majesty. I have also enclosed them to his ministers to Congress, that a demand may be there made in requisite form. Repeating to your excellency the continuance of my affection to your person, I pray God will spare your life many years. Given at St. Augustine, in Florida, on the 3rd of January, 1794.

Your most obedient humble servant,

JUAN NEPOMUCENO DE QUESADA.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 18, 1794.

Message transmitting an application, by the Minister of France, for an advance of one million of dollars, on account of the debt due by the United States.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic having requested an advance of money, I transmit to Congress certain documents relative to that subject.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the republic of France to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, March 1, 1794, second year of the French republic.

SIR: The necessities of the inhabitants of St. Domingo, who have taken refuge in the United States since the burning of the Cape, have been noticed by the mother country. She is eager to recall to her bosom her unfortunate children, for the purpose of consoling and relieving them. The executive council have charged me to furnish them the means of returning to France. I must address myself to the United States for an advancement of the sum requisite to defray the expenses and preparations of their voyages; that which has been voted by Congress being insufficient to fulfill the intention of the executive council. I have every reason to believe that the United States will readily concur in the completion of it. Suffering humanity is in question, and those who suffer are Frenchmen.

I greet you fraternally.

JH. FAUCHET.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the republic of France.

PHILADELPHIA, March 3, 1794, second year of the French republic.

SIR: I have reflected on the request you have made, to indicate to you, by approximation, the sum which would be necessary to fulfill the engagements contracted by the different agents of the republic, and find that I shall want at least a million of dollars, payable in six months, to satisfy the wants of Frenchmen at present in the United States, and to pay off debts, which, in whatever manner they may have been contracted, are sacred to the republic, because they have been contracted in her name.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the republic of France.

JH. FAUCHET.

MR. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, March 12, 1794.

SIR: Your letters of 1st and 2d instant, requiring the advance of a million of dollars, have been laid before the President of the United States. He instructs me to inform you, that the sum of one million five hundred thousand livres shall be paid to your order as minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, on the 3d of September next, and an additional sum of one million of livres on the 5th of November next, (1794.) That, for the present, all claims for the anticipations which are understood to have been made by the United States, will be suspended; and that, in the mean time, any of your drafts within the above limits and epochs shall be registered at the treasury, in the order of their presentation. The President, in the determination now announced, has consulted a disposition to comply with your desire, as far as the situation and prospects of the United States have appeared to him at this juncture to permit.

I shall be happy to have a personal interview with you upon this occasion. As three o'clock this afternoon, and my office, seemed, from what passed between us yesterday, to be an agreeable hour and place, I beg leave to expect you.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with every consideration of respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the republic of France.
M. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary from the republic of France, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, March 12, 1794, in the second year of the French republic.

Sir:

I have received your letter dated to-day, and I observe with chargin the dispositions it contains.

When I asked for the advance of a million of dollars, I hoped that a part of that sum would be paid down to me, and the rest at different periods, the last of which should not exceed six months; but, contrary to my hope, the first term of payment is indicated at that epoch only, and the advance.to be made to me confined to half the sum which I had requested.

I pray you, sir, to observe to the President of the United States, that this determination will obviate none of the embarrassments which have affected me; that I must pay cash to the captains of the vessels which may take the colonists to France, and for the subsistence which those unfortunate people require; that I must advance to the latter for such stores at least as are of the first necessity. I request you, sir, to add also, that numerous drafts are drawn on me at sight, or within short periods of each other, by the different agents of the French republic, either for articles of provision for the crews of vessels ready to sail, or for expenses incurred antecedent to my administration, and which it is impossible for me to postpone satisfying immediately.

These various observations will, without doubt, operate a change in the resolution of the President, which you have communicated to me; and the sincere picture which I have traced to you, of my situation, will engage him to make an effort in favor of the allies of America.

And under this reflection, sir, I renew to you the assurance of the sentiments of esteem, so pleasing to me to testify to you.

JH. FAUCHET.

To the President of the United States:

I certify that the instalments, which, according to the contracts respecting the debt to France, accrue in the present year, are one million five hundred thousand livres on the 3d of September, and one million of livres on the 5th of November; which, was there no anticipation, would be payable on those days, respectively. The amount anticipated, there being some unsettled items, cannot be pronounced until a definitive settlement shall have been had.

Treasury Department, March 18, 1794.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Communicated to Congress, on the 25th of March, 1794.

Message communicating two letters from an American Consul, relative to the vexations committed on American Commerce.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The two letters which I now forward to Congress were written by a consul of the United States, and contain information which will probably be thought to require some pecuniary provision.

G. WASHINGTON.

St. Eustatia, March 1, 1794.

Sir:

On the 9th ultimo I had the honor of addressing you, and of expressing, with deep concern, my apprehensions of the design of the British nation upon the flag of the United States; and had not all communication have ceased, between Martinique and the British islands, for a month previous to my letter, I might, possibly, have derived such authentic information of the then prevailing symptoms of events, as would have justified my giving, to the American vessels in these seas, as well as to the Executive of the United States, an official and more satisfactory account; but, placed as I have been, I have done no more than to suggest to them, from time to time, my suspicions of a nation long used to committing acts of violence and of depredation.

The ship Delaware, in which I had taken passage for Philadelphia, was, on the 7th instant, captured by the Experiment privateer, of Bermuda, and carried into Monserrat; on her arrival stripped of her sails; and, by order of the judge, the captain's papers and mone were peremptorily demanded: I waived a compliance, and at the instant waited on the judge; and, in the mildest terms, observed the impropriety of my exposing, by compilation, public papers; which, if the United States were not at war with England, ought to be deemed sacred; or my private papers, which did not, in the most indirect manner, relate to the ship or cargo in question. Such assurances did not satisfy the curiosity of the judge; and, the next day, my desk was seized and forced. The ship Delaware, with thirty-three other American vessels, have been condemned, in the vice court of admiralty of Monserrat; about the same number have been also in St. Kitts; and upwards of one hundred and fifty more have been arrested, and carried into the different parts of the English Windward Islands, and no doubt will share the same fate.

The judges of the courts of admiralty of these English and Dutch Islands pretend to derive their sole authority from Mr. Dundas's instructions, (a copy of which I have the honor herein to transmit you) and some of these gentlemen are so candid as to say, that the Powers combined against France mean to suppress every species of neutral commerce, with the people composing that nation, while at war.

This conduct, arbitrary and unauthorized, on the part of the coalesced despots, in my poor opinion, does not seem to satisfy the avarice and ambitious views of Great Britain; whose privateers, and even government vessels, have in certain instances, seized our flags though cleared from America, for neutral and her own ports, or bound from such ports to America.

The ship Sydney, of Baltimore, cleared for this place, had arrived, two weeks since, under the cannon of one of its fortresses, and was there captured by a small English privateer, carried into St. Kitts, is libelled, and, in the general opinion of that island, will be condemned. Other vessels from America, cleared and actually on a direct passage to neutral and British ports, have been likewise taken and libelled, in British courts of admiralty; and judges, sir, have been heard to say, that although no documents could be found to prove that such vessels intended to trade with the French, yet it was reasonable to suppose that such might have been their designs.
Conceiving that it must be dear and interesting to the United States to secure the services and attachment of their seamen; I have made use of my feeble exertions to obtain them safe passages home; in part I have succeeded; and shall not hesitate, should the necessity of the case require, to charter a vessel for such as should experience a want of conveyances; but, it is with pride and gratification I have the pleasure of observing, sir, that these honest tarst cannot be diverted from hastening to the arms of their much injured country.

Sir Charles Grey, with ten thousand men, have seized upon St. Pierre, and many other defenceless parts of Martinique, and is now menacing the formidable fortress of Fort Bourbon Rochambeau has courage, ammunition, force, and provisions enough, in my opinion, to set him at defiance; and I venture to believe, and do most zealously hope, that he has virtue enough to teach Sir Charles that British gold is not capable of affording a key to every temple of liberty and virtue.

With sentiments of attachment and respect, sir, I have the honor to remain,
Your most obedient and most humble servant,

The Secretary of State.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

St. Eustatia, March 7, 1794.

Sir:—My letter, of the 1st instant, will have afforded some detail of the situation of about two hundred and twenty sail of American vessels, seized upon by British vessels of war, and carried into different English Windward ports. The whole of those vessels, with thirty others, which have been captured since my last respects, were, immediately on their arrival in those different ports, libelled; but only those in Dominique, Antigua, Montserrat, and St. Kitts, have been condemned; making, in the whole, about one hundred and fifty sail. The greater part of the people, belonging to those vessels, have rendezvoused here, in order to obtain passages for America; and, having been stripped, many of them, of the little resources they had possessed, I have ventured to procure, on account of the United States, a sufficiency of bread, beef, and water, to support them to their respective homes; vouchers and receipts of which, I will have the honor to lay before the Executive of the United States, on my arrival in Philadelphia; and, I flatter myself that the step will meet their approbation, when they become satisfied that my sole motive for undertaking the measure has been to guard our seamen; many of whom would have entered into foreign service.

I have not heard as yet of any other official communication having been received from the combined Powers, maritime, than the instructions of Mr. Dundas, (a copy of which I had the honor to transmit, in my letter of the 1st instant) but, the prevailing Dutch and English opinion seem to be, that they mean to suppress not only all neutral commerce, directly carried on with the French, but that French manufactures and produce shall serve to contaminate any vessel in which they may be found.

Anticipating the honor of paying, personally, my respects, are long, I have the pleasure of remaining, with sincere respect,
Your most obedient and most humble servant,

The Secretary of State.

EMBARGO.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 28, 1794.

Message suggesting the extension of the Embargo to Fishing Vessels, &c.

UNITED STATES, 28th March, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In the execution of the resolution of Congress, bearing date the 26th of March, 1794, and imposing an embargo, I have requested the Governors of the several States to call forth the force of their militia, if it should be necessary for the detention of vessels. This power is conceived to be incidental to an embargo.

It also deserves the attention of Congress how far the clearances from one district to another, under the law as it now stands, may give rise to evasions of the embargo. As one security, the collectors have been instructed to refuse to receive the surrender of coasting licences for the purpose of taking out registers, and to require bond from vessel owners, binding one district to another, for the delivery of the cargo within the United States.

It is not understood that the resolution applies to fishing vessels; although their occupations be generally in parts beyond the United States. But without further restrictions there is an opportunity of their privileges being used as means of eluding the embargo.

All armed vessels, possessing public commissions from any foreign Power, (letters of marque excepted) are considered as not liable to the embargo.

These circumstances are transmitted to Congress for their consideration.

GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND ALGIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, APRIL 4, 1794.

Message transmitting letters from our Minister at London; advices from Algiers; and a letter from the Minister of France.

UNITED STATES, 4th April, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:—I lay before you three letters from our Minister in London; advices concerning the Algerine mission from our Minister at Lisbon and others; and a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic to the Secretary of State, with his answer.

G. WASHINGTON.
Dear Sir:

This serves to cover an additional instruction, which, though dated the 6th of November, was made public at the admiralty some days ago, and has been received by me last post. I am, with sincere respect, dear sir, your faithful and obedient servant,

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

The Secretary of State.

I mention the circumstances of the dates because it appears to me of some importance.

Dear Sir:

At the moment when I was preparing to go to the conference with Lord Grenville this morning, I received a note from him informing me that he had left the meeting. I then endeavored to see Mr. Burgis, but without success; as this is the last hour for writing by the packet, I must send the enclosed additional instructions without any explanation obtained from the ministry. The Danish minister is sick and at Bath; but the Swedish minister appears alarmed at this measure; as I am informed the mercantile interest connected with America appear to be, from a communication of them having waited on Mr. Pitt. Upon this instruction, as it stands, it is unnecessary for me to make any comment. If a repeal or modification of it should take place, or if I can obtain the principles upon which this Government has issued it, I will immediately communicate. Toulon is again possessed by the French republic; we have not yet the particulars. I remain, &c.

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

The Secretary of State.

Additional instructions to the commanders of all our ships of war and privates that have, or may have, letters of marque against France.

L. S.

Given at our Court at St. James's, the 6th day of November, 1793, and in the 34th year of our reign.

That they shall stop and detain all ships laden with goods the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions or other supplies for the use of any such colony, and shall bring the same, with their cargoes, to legal adjudication in our courts of admiralty.

By his majesty's command.

H. DUNDAS.

My Dear Sir:

You will receive, herewith, the copy of an instruction to the commanders of His Britannic Majesty's ships of war, &c., dated the 8th of this month, concerning which I had another conversation this morning with the Minister of the Foreign Department. On his saying, in the introduction of the subject, that he hoped I was in it a manifestation of the good will of this Government towards the United States, I observed that it was my misfortune to have been the only minister of the ministers in whose country there was an understanding with the United States, that it revolved, and might be as favorable as the principles upon which this Government acts would admit; but I reminded him that our ideas differed materially from theirs on this subject; and without repeating the arguments I had before addressed to him, both verbally and in writing, in support of our position, it was only to say, that if the Briton did not think it his interest to maintain that which he had promised to support, but his nation's, under all circumstances, I remained, &c.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

LONDON, 26th December, 1793.

THEODORE PINCKNEY.

This follows the letter from Mr. Pinckney, of January 2d, 1794.

I remain, with sincere respect, dear sir, your faithful and obedient servant,

THOMAS PINCKNEY.
GEORGE, R.

Instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France. Given at our Court at Saint James's, the 5th day of January, 1793.

As you are about to lay before the President a statement of the claims relative to the seizures and spoliations which have been, or may be, committed by some of your vessels, on the complaints, well or ill founded, which have been brought against privateers and two ships of war of the French republic. You will not observe with less pleasure, in my reply, that the National Convention has already done justice to some of the demands of the merchants of the United States, and are now occupied in satisfying some others.

In the list of complaints against the republic of France, the complainants urge that the French privateers do not less harass your commerce than those of the English.

To this assertion I answer by two observations which I submit to your impartiality.

1. It is now some time since any of our privateers have sailed out of the ports of France, and the number of those which have been armed in our islands, is not to be compared with those piracies which the islands of Bermuda alone send forth.

2. If any of your merchants have suffered any injury by the conduct of our privateers, (a thing which would be contrary to the instructions) they may, with convenience, address themselves to the French Government, which will, never refuse justice to those whose claims shall be legal.

I feel a pleasure in thinking, and saying to you, that it is not the fault of the French, if commercial property, even of enemy nations, has not been respected amidst the horrors of war.

This proposition of natural right was made by one of our legislative assemblies to the British, who rejected it.

2a. It is imputed to two of our ships of war that they have committed outrages on your vessels.

Should the fact be proved, the captains of those two vessels are as culpable towards France as they are towards the United States, for having acted in a manner contrary to the instructions they have received. The Government, upon information of the crime, will most certainly punish the authors of it. It would be unjust to accuse a nation generally for the act of some individuals, when that nation disavows their conduct, and repairs the wrongs which they have committed.

3d. If the effect of oppression in the courts of admiralty are complained of.

The offensive acts of the admiralty courts need no longer be complained of, since, on the claims of merchants of the United States, the Convention, on the 5th November last, passed a decree giving to the executive council the power of judging on the validity or invalidity of prizes.

3e. It is as follows.

The report of the Committee of Public Safety, decrees that all disputes arisen, or which may arise, on the validity or invalidity of prizes made by privateers, shall be decided, by way of administration, by the provisory executive council. The decree of the 14th February (O.S.) attributing the judgment of this matters to the commercial tribunal, is repealed.

"JH. FAUCHET."

The 4th allegation would require a long discussion, which I shall not undertake here; I shall only indulge myself in this single reflection, that the horrible system of violating the law of nations, in order to starve a people who cannot be conquered by force of arms, has not been invented by France, and that it would be as unjust as barbarous to require that she should allow provisions to pass to her enemies, while those destined for her are taken by them.

As to the embargo on American vessels, inopportun circumstances, the salvation of the country, have imposed that measure; but the interests of no one will be injured; and to convince you of this, I recite an extract of a letter which I have received from a friend, representative of the people of Boston.

It is possible, he writes me, "that some malevolent persons may make use of this pretext (the embargo) to disturb the harmony existing between the Americans and us, or might represent this measure as a violation of treaties between the two nations; the interests of individuals may for a moment cause the general interest to disappear. It is then, to you, brave republican and the true friend of your country, that we must consign the care of defending it to Congress, (should the measure happen there to be calumniated) say to our brethren that it is the intention of the Committee of Public Safety, the actual centre of the French Government, to indemnify all the owners or captains, by the operation of the embargo, have been obliged to remain a length of time in France, and that the propositions which will soon be made to them in the name of the committee, will be advantageous to both nations. In short, my friend, use every means of a frank republican negotiator to convince our brethren, the Americans, that when occurred amongst the aggregate interests of the nation, we do not forget theirs, and they may be assured that they will always find us in faithful observers of the treaties made with nations worthy of liberty.

The fifth and last allegation is, that a contract, the payment of which having been stipulated in cash, has been paid in assignable.

I am unacquainted with the fact, but I am assured that it is the intention of the National Convention that such a contract shall have been completed.

I conclude my reflections, not doubting, sir, but that they will be received with the same interest as would be excited in France by the observations of our allies, to whom I always, with new pleasure, renew the assurance of the most perfect fraternity and eternal friendship, on the part of the people of France.

JH. FAUCHET.
Sir,

You do me no more than justice in believing that I receive with pleasure the explanations which your letter of the 9th ultimo contains. They inspire me with full confidence that my representations, on each complaint, will be treated with candor, and assure me of redress, as far as truth will support my demands.

Omitting what I have here repeated what I have expressed in my letter on the vexations of our commerce, that my inquiry into the facts did not go beyond the consideration of the surface the ostensible. My view was to present a summary only of the subjects of the remonstrances lodged in my office; reserving the proofs for our interviews on the adjustment of the claims of retribution; delivering no opinion how far the charges were supported by evidence; and, above all, not impugning to the French republic the unauthorized misconduct of its ships of war.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with great respect and esteem, your most obedient servant.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

GREAT BRITAIN AND SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 15TH APRIL, 1794.

Message transmitting to Congress a letter from the British Minister to the Secretary of State, and despatches from the American Commissioners at Madrid.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty to the Secretary of State; and despatches from our Commissioners at Madrid. These despatches, sir, at Madrid being a part of a business which has been hitherto deemed confidential, they are forwarded under that view.

G. WASHINGTON.

Mr. Hammond to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, April 11, 1794.

Sir: In a letter, which I had the honor of addressing to your predecessor on the 13th of September last, I communicated to his excellency my information, by His Majesty's order, of the commanders of all British armed vessels, and accompanied it by some few observations, explanatory of the principles in which it had originated. But as Mr. Pinckney has recently presented to His Majesty's ministers a memorial relative to the instruction in question, I am directed to submit to you, sir, some further remarks on this subject, in reply to that gentleman's representations.

I have formerly stated, that, at the period of issuing this instruction, the situation of France was notoriously such as to point out the prevention of its receiving supplies, as one of the means of reducing it to reasonable terms of peace; and that this species of commerce being almost entirely procured by the then ruling party of France, it could no longer be regarded as a mercantile speculation of individuals, but as an immediate operation of the very persons who had declared, and were carrying on war against Great Britain. Notwithstanding this situation, and these circumstances, His Majesty's Government, so far from proceeding to the extent which the law of nations would have warranted, adopted regulations by which its limits were contracted, and its rigor was qualified: for the instruction only prevented the French from being supplied with corn, omitting all mention of other provisions, and especially of rice, one of the staple agricultural productions of the United States; and even with regard to corn, the regulation, instead of a confiscation of the cargoes, assured to the neutral proprietor a full indemnification for any loss they could possibly sustain.

It is not essential to the present question to enter into an examination of the different definitions which, as you, sir, well know, have been given of the law of nations, and of the consequent diversity of sentiment that has prevailed, as well with respect to the principles on which it is established, as to the obligations which it prescribes. I shall, therefore, not hesitate to admit the broad basis which Mr. Pinckney has assigned to it—reason, and the usage of civilized countries. But I must premise that, though the principle of reason be immutable, its dictates are sometimes governed by circumstances, or liable to different interpretations; and that the usage of nations is fluctuating. Hence, then, in order to ascertain the real nature of the system which is established on this basis, it is necessary to recur to the result of the experience and wisdom of ages and of nations, as it is collected and exposed by those authors who have treated this subject. If it be examined by this criterion, it is manifest that the right of a belligerent Power to stop and even to seize supplies of provisions going to its enemies, is strongly sanctioned in all the ancient authors, and is recognized by Vattel, whose writings contain a much more modified and limited system in these respects than that which is to be found in the books of authority on which the practice and law of nations rest; and, in point of fact, it would, I doubt not, be found, on investigation, that the milder usage with respect to provisions is of a recent date. In regard to the collateral argument which Mr. Pinckney deduces from the enumeration of articles, denominated contrabande de guerre, as contained in particular treaties, it is proper for me to observe that those treaties are not declaratory of the law of nations, but are restrictions and modifications of that law by special agreements between the contracting parties, and are, consequently, neither binding on other Powers, nor even on the parties themselves, in other cases. But even concerning the argument based on the supposed effect of our acts of trade to be enforced by the remaining order of council: for of the two only existing treaties, by which His Majesty's conduct is regulated towards nations neutral in the present war, one (that with Sweden) expressly includes provisions in the enumeration of articles contrabande de guerre, and Professor Martens, one of the most accurate, and unquestionably one of the most modern writers on the law of nations, asserts (page 390, vol. 2) that corn and other provisions, even brandy and tobacco, are comprehended under the denomination of contrabande de guerre in some treaties of commerce. The same author, in the section to which I have referred, adds, that the maritime Powers (especially since the end of the last century) have introduced a practice of declaring to the neutral nations, at the commencement of a war, the articles which would be regarded as contraband; and the sole limitation which he appears to assign to declarations of this nature, is, that they shall not operate to the prejudice of particular treaties which may subsist between the neutral nations and the belligerent Powers promulgating such declarations. The 8th of June, 1793, forest Mr. Pinckney's position, that it is the common interest of mankind that a culture which, like that of the soil, fur- * Vide the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance, concluded on the 21st of October, 1661, between King Charles the Second and his Swedish Majesty.
nishes sustenance and employment to so great a proportion of them, should not be interrupted or suspended because two nations are involved in war? but I must, at the same time, be permitted to observe, that it is at least a question-able point, whether the interests of humanity be not best consolided by a recurrence, on the part of a belligerent Power, to all the honorable means of imposing on an enemy the necessity of submitting to reasonable terms of accommodation, and of extenuating those barbarities or misfortunes of the enemy, which are the inevitable consequences of war. By the property of a neutral Power, both previously (as it is, indeed, declared in the decree of the National Convention of the 9th of May) and subsequently to the instruction in question, has been such as that which Mr. Pinckney appears to have imagined that this measure on the part of the British Government would have a tendency in future to produce.

In Mr. Pinckney's representation of the case it remains for me to offer any further remarks is his apprehension lest the acquisition of the United States in this instruction, being considered by France as a pretext and as a violation of neutrality, that nation might derive from those considerations the right of pursuing a similar course against the United States, by forcibly ruling the high seas, with the property of a neutral Power, both previously, but is a novel doctrine, but is consonant to the law of nations, as explained by the best authors on the subject, and is even recognized by the stipulations of particular treaties, I cannot avoid expressing my disquiet in the proposition that the modification contained in the instruction is, in fact, nothing but an involved manner of the King's Government to adhere, will be regarded by this Government as more favorable to the commerce of America than the general principle of the law of nations, and consequently as a proof of His Majesty's sincere disposition to cultivate and maintain with the United States the most cordial harmony and good understanding.

I have the honor, &c.

GEORGE HAMMOND.

Messrs. Carnichael and Short to M. de Garodqui.

St. LORENZO, October 1, 1793.

Sir,

Some of the communications lately made to our Government by your commissioners at Philadelphia, with respect to Indian affairs, having appeared under a disagreeable complexion, as well as to style as matter, the following notice would be the most proper, and is accordingly addressed, through the medium of these sentiments on those subjects. We accordingly do ourselves the honor of addressing your excellency relatively thereto.

The President has hoped that those communications were not a just expression of the temper of this court and the more so, because, in recurring to the dispositions and proceedings of our Government, nothing is to be found in them but that peace and friendship for Spain, and of the most justifiable, moderate, and forbearing nature towards our Indian neighbors. Perceived that this will appear from a full and true statement of facts, he has thought it proper that we should be furnished with such an one, beginning from an early period, to be communicated to your court.

At the commencement of the late war, the United States laid it down as a rule of their conduct, to engage the Indian tribes within their limits, and neutral, and that accordingly they pressed it on them, urging the object of their wishes to an ultimate and perfect understanding. We strengthened these recommendations by doing them every act of friendship and good neighborhood in our power. With some these solicitations prevailed; but the greater part of them suffered themselves to be drawn into the war on our side, and their continued adherence to us in that war has been singularly conspicuous, and in the most amiable manner, indescriminately, burning their houses, and desolating the country. They put us to vast expense, as well by the constant force we were obliged to keep up in that quarter, as by expeditions of considerable magnitude, which we were under the necessity of sending into their country from time to time.

Peace being at length concluded with England, we had it also to conclude with them. They had made war on us without the least provocation or pretext of injury. They had added greatly to the cost of war. They had insulted our feelings by their savage cruelties. They were by our arms completely subdued and humbled. Under all these circumstances, we had a right to demand substantial satisfaction and indemnification. We used that right, however, with real moderation. Their limits with us under the former Government were generally ill defined, questionable, and the frequent cause of war. Sincerely desirous of living in their peace, of cultivating it by every act of justice and friendship, and of rendering them better neighbors, by introducing among them some of the most useful articles of consumption, the trade relations of both nations, and particularly the mutual boundaries were settled; and notwithstanding, our just right to concessions adequate to the circumstances of the case, we required such only as were inconsiderable; and for even these, in order that we might place them in a proper light, we waited the period of independence, and granted them annuities in money, which have been regularly paid, and were equal to the prices for which they usually sold their lands.

Sensible as they were of the wrongs they had done, they expected to make some indemnification, and were for the most part satisfied with the mode and measure of it. In one or two instances, where a dissatisfaction was observed to remain as to the boundaries agreed on, or doubts entering on the authority of those with whom they were agreed, the United States invited the parties to new treaties, and rectified what appeared to be inconsistent of it. This was particularly the case with the Creeks. They complained of an inconvenient cession of land on their part, and a great part of it, not only representing their nation. They were, therefore, desired to appoint a proper deputation to revise their treaty, and to ascertain the correctness of any unfair practices. They have been invited to come to the seat of the General Government, and to treat with that directly. They accordingly came. A considerable proportion of what had been ceded was yielded back to them, and nothing required in lieu of it; and though they would have been better satisfied to have had the whole restored, yet they had obtained enough to satisfy them well. Their nation too would have been satisfied, for they were conscious of their aggressions, and of the demand made upon them with justice by which we had been contends. But at that time came among them an adventurer, of the name of Bowles, who, acting from an impulse with which we are unacquainted, flattered them with the hope of some foreign inter-ference, which should undo what had been done, and force us to consider the naked grant of their peace as a suffi-cient satisfaction for their having made war on us. Of this adventurer your Government rid us. But we are obliged to say, that the same practices and excitements against us were continued by the officers commanding at New Orleans and Pensacola, and by agents employed in their actions. We have already had the honor of communicating with your excellency on these subjects, and we were desirous to renew the business, because we flattered ourselves with your Excellency that the final settlement of the limits would eradicate all grounds of difference on these heads. In the mean time it cannot be doubted that these officers called assemblies of the Indians, and by the usual means of Government, offered the treaty which we had previously made with the Cherokees in the spring of 1793, and that they support them with all the powers which depended on them, assured them of the protection of their sovereign, gave them arms in great quantities, for the avowed purpose of committing hostilities on us, and promised them future supplies of powder, ammunition, and arms. These Indians, one part of the nation only, settled at Chickamauga, and a band of mixed with bands from the Illinois and other tribes, acknowledged control from none, even in a state of peace, have readily engaged in the hostilities against us, to which they were once taken. But what was much more important, great numbers of the Creeks, chiefly their young men, have yielded to these incitements, and have murdered for more than a twelve month been committing murders and desolations on our frontiers. Really deserves of living in peace with them, we have redoubled our efforts to produce the same disposition in them. We have borne with their aggressions, forbidden all returns of hostility against them, tied up the hands of our people, insomuch that no one has been heard to say that the Creeks have occasioned our suffering or trouble. We have multiplied our assotiations to them; fed them, when starving, from the produce of our own fields and labor. No longer ago than the last winter, when they had no other resource against famine, and must have perished in great numbers, we carried, to their country and distributed among them, gratuitously, ten thousand bushels of corn, and that too at the very time we were ourselves suffering from want. It is clear that it is not merely the disposal of these deprivations which involve more considerable parts of the nation, we are still demanding the punishment of the guilty individuals, and shall be contented with it. These acts of neighborhood kindness and support on our part have not been confined to the Creeks, though we have occasioned our suffering against the United States, and have more than once been guilty of insubordination. The Creeks are in fact, a people seditious by nature. In the present season, among the great and respectable tribes of the United States, we are the only bureau of the public services, which are to them also, at first five hundred bushels of corn, and afterwards hundred more. Our language to all the tribes of Indians has constantly been, to live in peace with one another; and in a most especial manner we have used our endeavors with those in the neighborhood of the Spanish colonies to be peace- ful. We have sent emissaries to the Spaniard, and had relations with the agents of the United States on these heads; and we are now authorized and instructed to declare, that such has hitherto been the candid and zealous endeavor of our Government, that, if its agents have in any instance acted in another way, it has been equally unknown and unauthorised; and that, were even probable proofs of it, they should be marked with the disapprobation of Government.

In this state of things, in such dispositions towards Spain, and towards the Indians, and in such a course of proceedings with respect to them, the late communications were made from your commissaries at Philadelphia. In their last, of the 18th of June, they exhibited to the House the several papers which had been presented against the United States, and which had been communicated to them.

The most extraordinary of these papers was a letter which was written to the Creeks, threatening them with war on the Creeks. Were this true, it would not be unjustifiable. The Creeks have now, a second time, commenced against us a wanton and unprovoked war; and the present one, in the face of a recent treaty, and of the most friendly and charitable offices on our part. There would be nothing out of the common course of proceeding, then, for us to engage allies, if we needed any, for we have always been disposed to the best treatment of these Indians, with their present state of society, and with the world to produce a single proof of it. The declaration of the war by the Chickasaws, as we are informed, was a very sudden thing, produced by the murder of some of their people, by a party of Creeks, and produced so instantaneous as to require us to engage allies immediately. By this we are exerting that nation to preserve peace, because, in truth, we have a most particular friendship for them. This will be evident from the copy of a message to the President of them, which we do ourselves the honor to enclose to your excellency.

We also furnish the Chickasaws with provisions and arms. The gift of provisions was but an act of that friendship to them, when in the same distress which had induced us to give five times as much to the less friendly nation of the Creeks. But we have given arms to them. We believe it is the practice of every white nation to give arms to the neighboring Indians. The agents of Spain have done it abundantly, and this for purposes of avowed hostility on us, and for the purposes of injuring us. The Creeks have not attempted any thing so inconsiderable as arms, but have erected that nation to preserve peace, because, in truth, we have a most particular friendship for them.

With aiming at the occupation of a post at the Ecores Amargos. Considering the measures of this nature which have been adopted by Spain (having, since the proposition made to the United States to treat with them on the subject of limits, established posts on the Walnut-hills, and other places for two hundred miles upwards) it would not have been wonderful if the United States had taken some similar measures, if they have not done it. They thought it right to give a fair chance to the negotiation going on, and to make no innovation, pending the negotiation. In this spirit they forbade, and deterred, every by military force, a large association of their citizens, under the name of the Yacoo companies, which have been formed to settle themselves at those very Walnut hills, which have been occasioned by the occupation of the British Government from meditating the particular establishment so boldly charged in the letter of your commissaries, that they know not what place is meant by the Ecores Amargos.

This charge, then, is without foundation also.

In short, the United States are not meddlesome, and regard no distinction to the Indian chiefs. This has been a custom from time immemorial. These medals are considered as complimentary things, as marks of friendship to those who come to see us, or who do us good offices, conciliatory of their good will towards us, and not designed to produce a contrary dis-tosition towards others. They confer no power, and seem to have taken their origin in the European practice of giving medals to the friends of the particular person, as a mark of respect and of distinction. The British Government, while it prevailed in the United States, practised the giving medals, gor-etts, and bracelets, to the savages, invariably. Our Government has continued it, and did imagine, without pretending to know, that Spain also did the same.

The United States are charged, also, with meddling with the affairs of Indians in alliance with Spain. It is difficult to know precisely what this charge means. The Indians on our frontiers treat both with Spain and us. We have endeavored to cultivate their friendship, to merit it by presents, charities, and extortations to peace with their neighbors, and particularly with the subjects of Spain. We have carried on some little commerce with them, merely to supply their wants. Spain too has made them presents, traded with them, kept agents among them. We hardly, can suppose, that this kind of meddling on our part can be seriously objected to; and we consequently pass over the complaint made of the United States having not done so effectually as we might have done it, and the United States have, on the contrary, done what they could, when there existed, or to have been in use.

We have forborne to make any observations ourselves, with respect to the style and expressions of the communications above mentioned, because we take it for granted that copies of them must have been forwarded by your com-misseries, and are willing that they should be simply referred to the announcement, piety, and superior judgment of your excellency.

The commissioners finally concluded with observing what your excellency will readily see could not but have been sensibly felt by our Government, that, on a review of the proceedings of the United States with respect to Spain, and the Indians her allies, they foresaw that our peace and friendly relations with them would have been suggested, to us, as to the calamitous picture which we have thus presented to your excellency of what those proceedings have been, the most natural inference from this conclusion of the commissaries was, that, unless the United States submitted still longer, without resistance, to the singularly inconsiderate measures of their present ally, they would in the course of time be deprived of all their savage cruelties, with all the other things which was necessary to all that the United States, who, from inclination as well as interest, cherish peace with all the world, had been for years exhausting all the means in their power of procuring it from the Creeks in particular, and that with a degree of forbearance and moderation, of which, we believe, there are few examples in any other country. They add, that the Indians, with whom the Creeks have meddled, and who may, without any confidence, be considered as the sequel of the communications which had been previously made at different times, it appeared to the President of a nature not to admit of his concealing the impression it made on him, and particularly in comparing it with the constant dispositions which our Government has uniformly felt and manifested towards the Creeks. We trust that the measure the President has adopted, of transferring this subject here, and of having it presented in its fullest extent to the immediate view of His Majesty, will be considered as a new proof of the high sense which is entertained in the United States of His Majesty's sentiments, of the important consideration which they annex to whatever may proceed from so magnificent a sovereign, and of their real desire to cultivate, by all possible means, the most perfect cordiality and friendship between the two countries.

We have received extracts from the instructions of our Government, to their agents on the frontiers, and among the Indians, which being indicative of their dispositions as well towards Spain as our Indian neighbors, we do ourselves the honor of enclosing copies of them to your excellency, and beg you to be persuaded of the sentiments, &c.

Messrs. Carmichael and Short to the Duke of the Alcudia.

St. LORENZO, October 30, 1793.

Sir:

We have the honor of addressing your excellency in consequence of our new learning from his Excellency Don Diego de Gardoqui, that it has been judged proper that the subject contained in our letter to him of the 1st instant, should be treated with your excellency. In handing it in the first instance to another department, we have committed an error of form, we hope your excellency will have the goodness to excuse it, as we were led to it from the instructions on that subject having been addressed to us jointly.

We beg leave to refer your excellency to our above mentioned letter, as we were informed that it had been lately transferred to the hands of your excellency, with the other papers accompanying it. We conceive nothing need be added to what was there said, to show how invariable the endeavors of our Government have been to bring their southern Indian neighbors to the ways of peace by all the possible means of justice, humanity, and moderation; and to leave no doubt, if they should be brought to adopt other measures with respect to them, that it can proceed only from their own wanton continuance of such depredations and cruelties as to admit no hopes of their being put an end to but by force.

Under this idea we allow ourselves to hope that your excellency will consider it as corresponding to these sentiments which the United States have ever manifested towards His Catholic Majesty, and particularly in this instance, to remove those superfluities which have been given to our Government in the manner we have mentioned, of an intended interference of Spain between the United States and their Indian neighbors.

We hope your excellency will be assured of the pleasure we shall receive, in being made the organ of so agreeable a communication, in whatever manner may appear proper to the superior intelligence of your excellency; and we beg leave to add assurances of the profound respect, &c.

Messrs. Carmichael and Short to the Duke of the Alcudia.

St. LORENZO, November 12, 1793.

Sir:

We had the honor of addressing your excellency on the 29th of October, on the subject which we had previously expressed fully, in our letter of the 1st of the same month, to his Excellency Don Diego de Gardoqui. As yet we have not had the honor of receiving an answer of any kind.

The circumstances which gave rise to these letters are known to your excellency. Communications made by the commissioners of His Majesty at Philadelphia, were understood to contain a menace of interference on the part of this country in favor of our Indian neighbors, who were then committing daily acts of hostility on our frontier. As this exhibited doubts as to the dispositions of a sovereign whose friendship has been ever placed in the highest rank by the United States, the President determined to have this subject adjusted fully before this court; and, that there might be the least possible delay on his part, he sent a special messenger from America, trusting that he would carry back such assurances as would entirely remove the doubts which had been excited. This messenger has hitherto been repelled by us in that hope, and waits now only for the answer which your excellency may judge proper to give to the letters above mentioned, as has been repeated, also, in the audiences which one of us has had the honor to have of your excellency.

After the delay which has already taken place, with the cause of which we are unacquainted, and, consequently, ignorant of the sentiments which may be entertained by his Majesty's minister to this effect, your excellency will excuse me renewing this subject, and expressing our anxiety to despatch the messenger, whose embarkation is rendered every day more precarious, by the advancing season.

We beg leave to trouble your excellency with a repetition of the several articles contained in our precedent letters, to which we beg leave to refer. We have, &c.

The Duke of Alcudia to Messrs. Carmichael and Short.

St. LORENZO, November 15, 1793.

Gentlemen:

Don Diego de Gardoqui has, in the 18th ultimo, delivered to me the memoir that you transmitted to him on the first of October, last past, conveying complaints, in the name of the President of the United States, on account of some official papers, as disagreeable respecting their form as their contents, that were presented by Don Jose de Jaudenes, his confidential assistant, chargés des affaires for the King, at Philadelphia. To that end, you have entered into an historical recapitulation of the wars that has occurred between the United States and the Indian nations, who border on those United States and the dominions of the King, from the beginning of the late war with England to the present period, in order to prove the justice, moderation, and temper, with which they have always proceeded towards the Indians, by sacrificing, in many instances, their own interest, in order to preserve peace, as also to evince the inclination manifested by the United States, on all occasions, and especially of late, for maintaining perfect harmony with Spain. You continue to declare how strange the tenure of the different memoirs presented on the 20th of May, and 18th of June, of this year, by Don Jose de Jaudenes, and Don J. Ignacio de Vies, appeared, on which, having added some remarks, you conclude by citing that paragraph of the memoir of the 18th of June, which has been most felt by the President of the United States, and occasioned the despatch of an express, in order to lay a circumstantial account of the whole transaction before the King my master. In compliance with the request of the President of the United States, I have seen all the papers in my power relative to the points of which you treat, and am in a position to say that His Majesty has ordered me to declare to you, that he is fully convinced of the truth and good friendship with which the United States proceed, and does not doubt the sincerity of their answers, nor the dispositions they profess, to cultivate, by all possible means, the most perfect harmony with Spain.

That the chargés des affaires of His Majesty have acted in strict conformity to their orders; however, as those orders never had in view to prescribe to them a captive manner of proceeding, but, on the contrary, a faithful and frank conduct, it is solely owing to that very frankness that they made use of that expression of which the President complains, without having any other object in view than to conclude the interests of both nations.
And finally, that the ideas of His Majesty are, to draw closer the ties of friendship connecting both nations, and by discussing, in the negotiations opened upon the boundary questions, concerning the property of the soil, limits, and other Indian concerns, to establish solid principles of a friendly intercourse and future tranquillity between the United States and the dominions of His Majesty. I avail myself, &c.

MESSRS. CARMICHAEL AND SHORT.

The Duke of Alcudia.

MADRID, November 21, 1793.

Sir: From the letters which we had the honor of addressing to your excellency, the 20th of October and 12th inst. referring to that which had been previously written to His Excellency Don Diego de Gardoqui, it resulted that grounds had been given by the Spanish agents in America, for supposing that this court intended to interfere in favor of the Indians, if the United States should proceed to repel their hostile aggressions; that the President of the United States conceived, that, if such were the intention of this court, it must be in consequence of a misrepresentation of what had taken place between the United States and those Indians; and that, if such were not the intention of this court, that it was his wish and desire to cultivate, that the doubts excited should not be allowed to exist; and, finally, that, in consequence of this disposition, he determined to send a messenger for the purpose of removing, by a full statement of the conduct of the United States towards their Indian neighbors, any misrepresentation which might have been given thereon in the hope of receiving assurances that it was not the intention of this court, as had been suggested by their charges des affaires, to make the peace and harmony between the two countries dependent on what might take place between the United States and the Indians. The letter which we have had the honor of receiving from your excellency having made no particular mention of this object of our communication, we think it our duty to renew it to your excellency. We hope, under the circumstances above mentioned, it will be considered proper, and consonant to that frank mode of proceeding which both countries desire to see established, that it should be expressed whether it be the intention of this court to interfere in the case, rendered highly probable, of the United States being obliged to repel, by force, the hostile aggressions of the southern Indians. In this hope, we have determined still to detain the messenger, rather than despatch him without being enabled, at the same time, to send such answer as your excellency may judge proper to be given to this object of the President's inquiry, trusting a very short delay will suffice.

The sentiments of His Majesty towards the United States, which your excellency has done us the honor to communicate to us, we shall lose no time in transmitting, well knowing with how much pleasure they will be received, as well as whatever may indicate a desire in His Majesty to strengthen the friendship between the two countries. Being firmly persuaded, ourselves, that nothing can more sensibly contribute to the promotion of a subject which you repeat, and cause us to express our conviction of the rights of the respective parties, as to the objects which have hitherto been in discussion, we can assure your excellency we will leave nothing undone, on our part, to give them the most complete and satisfactory investigation. With these assurances, &c.

W.M. CARMICHAEL.
W. SHORT.

His Excellency the Duke de la Alcudia, &c.

The Duke of Alcudia to Messrs. Carmichael and Short.

ST. LORENZO, November 26, 1793.

GENTLEMEN: After acknowledging, in your communication of the 21st instant, my official letter of the 15th, you endeavor again to express, with more precision than was done in your former letters, that our charges des affaires gave occasion to the President of the United States to suspect that Spain intended to favor the Indians, in case the United States should proceed in their measures for repelling, by force, the hostile intentions of those Indians; that the information, thus given, was of such a nature as to clear up those doubts, so prejudicial to the good harmony the President is desirous of maintaining with us, he had despatched an express, in hopes to receive positive information that the intentions of His Majesty are not such as had been supposed to render the peace and friendship between the United States and Spain dependent upon the events that might take place between the United States and the Indian nations. You further observe that, as respecting that point, no particular mention had been made in my said official letter of the 15th, you have detained the express, wishing, previously to his departure, to know whether this court intends to interfere, in case (as it was highly probable) the United States should find it necessary to repel, by force, the hostile intentions of the southern Indians; in order that you may be enabled to transmit satisfactory information to the President. There is no possibility to return a categorical answer at the present moment. His Majesty being deprived of information of what has occurred between those nations and the United States within these seven months last past, consequently had not the means of ascertaining, whether it was intended to form a subject of negotiation with which His Majesty has concluded treaties of friendship and alliance, which have been communicated to the President of the United States by our charges des affaires. Therefore I can only declare, that His Majesty will never grant protection to violences, and will cheerfully listen to any proposals that may be made, on the part of the United States, for preventing hostilities, by specifying each of those points on which His Majesty's resolutions are to be taken, so that, in the negotiation opened for that purpose, all matters may finally be decided with knowledge.

I expect you will please to communicate me above frank and amicable declaration of His Majesty to the President of the United States; and rest assured, &c.

MESSRS. CARMICHAEL AND SHORT.

MESSRS. CARMICHAEL AND SHORT TO THE DUKE DE LA ALCUDIA.

MADRID, December 7, 1793.

Sir: The letter which your excellency did us the honor to address us, on the 30th of November, has been received. In conformity to the desire of your excellency we shall transmit it to the President of the United States, as well as every other communication we shall have the honor of receiving from your excellency.

We beg leave to inform your excellency, that it had been supposed that we had not expressed ourselves as clearly in our preceding communications as in our last of the 21st of November, with respect to the explanations hoped for by the President, as to the apprehensions of the interference of this country in favor of the Indians. Our first communication on this subject was addressed to his Excellency Don Diego de Gardoqui. The verbal explanations were given by that minister, which immediately preceded it, left no doubt as to the apprehensions excited, and the explanation expected. As soon as we learned that this subject had passed into the hands of your excellency, we did ourselves the honor of addressing your excellency on the 20th of October respecting it; and as the same verbal explanations as above mentioned, we hope that your excellency would "remove those ideas which have been given to our
GREAT BRITAIN AND SPAIN.

Government in the manner we have mentioned, of an intended interference of Spain between the United States and their Indian neighbors.

We consider this circumstance incidentally, that there may be no doubt as to our desire of expressing, with the utmost clearness and precision, whatever communication we may have the honor of making to this court, being persuaded that it will contribute to that mutual esteem and friendship which both countries desire to cultivate, that their respective ideas and wishes should be unrestrainedly communicated and fully understood.

We think it our duty to make some observations to your excellency on the letter above mentioned, which we have had the honor of receiving.

Your excellency therein informs us that it is not possible, at present, to give a categorical answer to our demand to the interference of Spain, because, he says, he has no information of what has passed during the last seven months between the Indian nations and the United States, and consequently cannot decide whether those nations are the aggressors with whom His Majesty has treaties of friendship and alliance.

The natural inference from hence would seem to be, that there are cases in which the interference of Spain in favor of the Indians would be only injurious. If it should be the case that an aggressor should not be the aggressor, we might rely fully that they would never occur, from what we know of the fixed and invariable determination of the United States, to be, in no instance, the first aggressor towards any of their Indian neighbors. Still we cannot conceal from your excellency, that it appears to us, that this subject admitted of a much more positive solution on sending His Majesty a more precise account of the occurrence of the present incident towards this court, on this occasion, and the cordiality with which it was done, would have entitled him to it.

The Indians in question inhabit either within the limits of the United States or the domains of His Majesty. As to the first, we take it for granted, the treaties mentioned cannot regulate the affairs of those with whom we had the honor of adducing, in our letter of the 11th of August last, on the same subject, to his Excellency Don Diego de Gardoqui, namely, that one sovereign can have no right to treat with persons inhabiting within the territory of another, and take those persons under his sovereignty and protection; that such a system being adopted by one sovereign would give the other an unquestionable right to make use of it also; and that this would be so contrary to the established laws of nations, and lead to consequences of so destructive a nature, that we supposed that this court would be less disposed than any other to admit of such a precedent.

We do not see, therefore, from whence could arise any difficulty, on the part of Spain, to declare that they had no intercourse with the Indians, and the Indians from expecting those stipulations in the limits of the United States, in any case whatsoever; and if they inhabited within the limits of the domains of His Majesty, that they would not protect their aggressions. Such a declaration as this, on the part of this Government, would have been in full consonance with the law, and the other nations, and as the Indian tribes would have been given by the United States, under similar circumstances, we had hoped they would have received it from Spain.

We must observe also, as your excellency, that the circumstances which have given rise to the President's sending this letter to us, as to the nature of our letters, have none of them taken place within these last seven months. All that passed prior to that epoch is, of course, known to your excellency, and, consequently, it is known, also, whether the Indians were, or were not, the aggressors at that time; and whether, being attacked by the United States, for what had taken place, this court would interfere in their favor, as was clearly to be expected by the chargé des affaires of His Majesty.

So far, at least, as credit is to be given to the statement made by our Government, nothing can be wanting on this subject. We have the honor of laying before this court, by the order of the President, a full statement of what had passed between the United States and the Indians, from a remote period, until the time of the memorable despatch; and we trust, for justice, moderation, humanity, and forbearance, it will bear fully a comparison with the conduct of any other of the civilized nations towards those Indians who inhabit within their domains, or on their frontiers.

The object of the United States was, as it is still, their desire to induce those Indians to cultivate the arts of civilization, and by thus bringing them to the ways of peace, render them more quiet, and consequently better neighbors. Had the Indians been left to themselves, and their own dispositions at that time, to comply with the stipulations of the treaty of New York, and the mode of living there agreed on, there can be little doubt that object would have been attained, and the blood of the defenceless women and children, which they have been since shedding on our frontiers, would have been spared.

After all that has taken place, and under present circumstances, we submit it to the superior intelligence of your excellency, and to the authority of both Catholics, and of the Indians themselves, and other, it be not necessary, under the desire which both Governments have manifested, of strengthening their mutual friendship, that they should be, without delay, fully and unrestrainedly informed of the intentions of each other, with respect to a subject so important as their frontier. It is also the object of the United States, that whilst they remain in their savage state, can have no other rule of conduct but right and prudent.

Hitherto we have found the uncertainty which has prevailed on those subjects imputed to the limits between the two countries not being finally settled. We now do ourselves the honor of transmitting to his Excellency Don Diego de Gardoqui, a copy of the letters from the President of the United States, to the chargé des affaires of His Majesty, that it is the intention of His Majesty that the general negotiation should continue in the channel in which it was begun.

Your excellency shall see from it that those limits were established so long ago as the year 1763; that the acts, by which they were established and confirmed, are pointed out, and are lawful and indisputable; in fine, are as precise, and as valid, as those establishing the right of the United States to any other part of their territory; and that Spain has no title whatever to produce; no document of any kind giving even the color of a right to the territory mentioned in the limits of the United States; we trust your excellency will think it just that that uncertainty should no longer remain.

It cannot be unknown to your excellency that the difficulties which have been raised as to the rights of the United States on the subject of limits and the navigation of the Mississippi, have retarded the negotiation set on foot. After all that has been said, and of which you are well aware, the United States were far from pretending that the obstructions which might have existed at the opening of the negotiation. We have hoped that time and a more accurate examination of the subject would remove them. We now present the claims of the United States on these subjects in such a form, as we think will be derived, that we hope they will appear rigorously just, and in that case we rely, from the known character of his Catholic Majesty, and his attachment to the strictest principles of justice, that they will no longer be withheld; and that thus, all obstacles being removed, the two countries may, without further delay, proceed to settle other objects of mutual concern, conformably to their mutual wishes and interest.

In this hope, we have the honor to be, &c.

W. M. CARMICHAEL.

W. SHORT.

His Excellency the Duke of Alcudia, &c.

Messrs. Carmichael and Short to Don Diego de Gardoqui.

MADRID, December 7, 1793.

Sir: The memorial which we have the honor of transmitting to your excellency is intended to remove that difference of opinion which we have found here, as to the limits of the United States, and their right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and which has hitherto retarded the negotiation with which we have the honor to be charged.

On the one hand, your excellency has regarded the claims of the United States on these subjects as unfounded, and has considered them as asking important cessions of Spain without offering any thing in return, whilst, on the other, they consider themselves as claiming only their strict and indisputable right. It is evident that such a varied distribution of heads, which, when it exists, must render it difficult to attain that degree of reciprocity in the negotiation they wish to carry on, which is the only permanent basis of real friendship between the two countries. The measure we have taken will leave nothing undone on our part to remove it.

It would be conformable to usage in similar cases that we should receive, in exchange from your excellency, the signature of the declaration of the non-existence of the claims of Spain in opposition to those of the United States. And should the rights of the United States be still contested, on the supposition that those of Spain are better founded, we hope your excellency will do us the honor to communicate them to us in the same form, that we may have an opportunity of knowing the precise extent of your claim, and of giving expression to the sentiments we wish those of Spain to be submitted; our object being really to ascertain the rights of both countries, so as that they may proceed with a proper understanding to settle those arrangements of convenience which may contribute to advance their mutual interests and strengthen their mutual friendship.

We, the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States, therefore, proceed to reduce to a more permanent form the claims of the United States, which we have heretofore stated and supported in the conferences, and to show the titles from which they are derived.

The several compositions of the United States of America were, from their first establishment, dependent on no other society of men whatever. They continued at the head of their respective Governments the executive magistrate that presided over the one they had left, and thereby secured in effect a constant amity with that nation during the whole of their connexion. In this stage of their Government, the several boundaries were fixed, and particularly by the Southern boundary, the one now brought into question by Spain. This boundary was fixed by the proclamation of the King of Great Britain, his chief magistrate in the year 1763, at a time when no other Power pretended any claim whatever to any part of the country through which it ran, all the territory on the left side of this line and extending from the Mississippi to the Red River, having been previously yielded by the treaty of Paris, to which his Catholic Majesty was one of the high contracting parties.

The boundary of Georgia was thus established to begin on the Mississippi, in 31 degrees of latitude of the equator, and running easterly to the Apalachicola, thence along the said river to the mouth of the Flint, thence in a straight line of 170 miles to the lake Florida, thence along the line of the Florida river to the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and thence along the coast of the Gulf of Mexico to the 31st degree of the parallel of 170 miles from the said river to the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and thence along the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, with the S. and W. extremity, originally the Pacific ocean, was by the treaty of Paris reduced to the middle of the Mississippi.

In the late war which took place between Great Britain and the confederated States, (and in the course of which we were joined by the British, as an ally, by Spain and Holland as associates, having a common enemy) this boundary was the line of demarcation to the defence of the country between the two nations, and to the war against Great Britain and that which continued under British Government; Georgia having entered into the confederation, and Florida remaining in its former state. At the conclusion of hostilities, Great Britain, by the only Power against whom the United States were engaged in the war, was ceded to France, as they had not been able to defend it to the advantage of Spain, as is pretended, but on the contrary confirming that of Georgia, in particular, as it had existed from the year 1763.

The treaty afterwards made with Spain, Great Britain ceded the two Floridas (which had been defined in the proclamation of 1763) and Minorca; and, by an express article of the treaty, Spain agreed to restore, with all compensation, all the territories conquered by her, and not included in the treaty, either under the head of cessions or restitutions—that is to say, all except Minorca and the Floridas.

The Congress, by their express and unequivocal declaration, have delivered up the possessions she had taken within the limits of Georgia, to Great Britain, if they were conquests on Great Britain, who was to deliver them over to the United States, or rather Spain should have delivered them to the United States themselves, as standing, quoad locos, in the place of Great Britain. Spain was bound also by natural right to deliver them to the United States, on a strict consideration of the principle set up in the cession of, without having had any cause of war with the United States, to whom they belonged, and without having declared any, but on the contrary conducting herself, in other respects, as a friend and associate in a war against a common enemy.

It is an established principle that conquest gives only a right to recovery, a perfect title confirmed by the treaty of peace, and by a renunciation or abandonment of the former proprietor. Had Great Britain been that former proprietor, she was so far from confirming to Spain the right to the territory of Georgia invaded by Spain, that she expressly relinquished to the United States any right that might remain in her; and afterwards completed that relinquishment, by further procuring and consolidating the agreement with Spain herself to restore such territory, if comprised within the conquests of Spain, without compensation.

It is still more palpable that a war existing between two nations, as Spain and Great Britain, can give to neither the right to seize and appropriate the territory of a third, which is even neutral, much less which is an associate in the war, as the United States were with Spain.

On the conclusion of the general peace, the United States lost no time in requiring from Spain an evacuation of their territory. This has hitherto been delayed, by means which need not be explained here, but which have been confirmed by the right, and to the present of the United States.

From what has been said, it results—

1. That the boundary of Georgia, now forming the southern limits of the United States, was lawfully established in the year 1763.

2. That it has been since confirmed by the only Power who could at any time have had pretensions to contest it, founded on a state of war.

3. That Great Britain, by the late treaty of peace, obtained of Spain a renunciation to all pretensions within this boundary, so as to have removed every pretext for questioning the right of Great Britain to have confirmed that boundary to the United States.

4. That Spain can have no right to any claim by conquest, within the limits of the United States, having never been the state of Spain with them.

The right of the United States to participate in the navigation of the Mississippi rests on two separate and distinct foundations, either of which would suffice to establish it clearly. These are—

1. The treaties of Paris of 1765, and of 1783; the latter between the United States and Great Britain.

2. The law of nature and nations.

1. The war of 1755—1763 was carried on jointly by Great Britain and the thirteen colonies, now the United States of America, against France and Spain. By the treaty of peace, which was negotiated by our common chief magistrate, and to which, as has been observed, his Catholic Majesty was one of the high contracting parties, it was secured to the subjects of Great Britain (the common designation of all those under his Government) to navigate this river, in the terms following:—The navigation of the river Mississippi shall be equally free to the subjects of Great Britain and those of France, in all their ships and vessels, forever; and especially this part of the river which is between the above mentioned island of New Orleans and the right bank of this river, as well as the entrance
It is moreover stipulated, that vessels belonging to the subjects of the one or the other nation, shall not be arrested, visited, or subjected to the payment of any duty whatsoever.

Spain soon after received from France a cession of the island of New Orleans, and all the country she held westward of the Mississippi to the line of navigation of the river, which Spain has since, in consequence of an act of Parliament, been powerfully confirmed to her by France.

Thus stood our right to navigate the Mississippi then settled. In the course of the late war, in which the United States, Spain, and France were opposed to Great Britain, Spain ceded to France the island of Florida, from which they had obtained it in exchange for a cession of Louisiana, a portion of the United States, and this cession was formally received by France in 1800. At that time France, under the impression of its superiority, and the evident disorganization of the United States, considered the possession of a great part of those waters as a part of its just rights, and determined to assume and maintain it.

It is unnecessary to examine whether the possession of half a dozen posts, scattered over the surface of seven or eight thousand square miles, could be considered as the possession and conquest of that country. If it were, it gave still but an inadequate idea of that war, it was, as is explained above, which could not be perfected but by the relinquishment of the former proprietor, at the close of the possession of the shores, to wit, of the island of New Orleans on one side, and Louisiana on the other, had undergone no change.

Still less can Spain be considered as having conquered the river, as against the United States, with whom she was not at war. When this war commenced, we had a common right of navigation in the part of the river between Florida, the island of New Orleans, and the western bank; and nothing which passed between Spain and Great Britain, either during the war, or at its conclusion, could lessen that right. Accordingly, at the treaty of November 20, 1782, the cession of the United States to the navigation of the river from its source to its mouth, and in January, 1783, completed the right of Spain to the same navigation, as it stood by the cession of all her rights in it. This relinquishment could not include the navigation held by the United States, on one right, because this right existed in themselves only, and was not in Great Britain. It could only transfer that portion of right held by Great Britain to herself, where, in the treaty with the United States, held seven weeks before to wit, a right of using it in common with the United States.

So that as, by the treaty of 1783, the United States had obtained a common right of navigation the whole river, from its source to its mouth, so, by the treaty of 1792, that common right was confirmed to them by the only Power who could pretend claims against Spain, founded on a state of war. Nor has that common right been transferred to Spain, either by conquest or cession.

Two, Independent of the right of the United States to navigate the Mississippi, as above established, they are entitled to the same right by virtue of natural justice, which is founded by the usage of all civilized countries, and strengthened by the morality of sovereignties: the law of nature and nations.

There is no principle of natural justice more strongly marked than that seas are free to all men, and rivers to all their navigators. There is no man, savage or civilized, unbiased by who, does not feel and attest this truth. Accordingly, in all tracts of country in which the same principles of natural justice prevail, this natural right universally acknowledged and protected, by laying the navigable rivers open to all their inhabitants, and by the right of navigation they enter the limits of another society, if the right of the upper inhabitants to descend the stream be in any case obstructed, it is an abandonment of that right, and is a renunciation of it by some act of society. Such an abridgment will necessarily be considered, by impartial observers, with reference to the company with whom it has been made, as lowering the limits of the two countries, the nature and extent of their river, and other attending circumstances. It is easy to see that there are cases in which such an abridgment could be only by an act of force, in a stronger society, against a weaker one, which would be condemned by the judgment of mankind.

Such an act of force is, in some cases, supposed to be modified by the upper inhabitants having bound themselves, for some valuable consideration, to renounce their natural right of navigating the river. It is unnecessary to examine whether the right is good or bad, or for this right be attempted to be done, and what circumstances of necessity can justify such an alienation, so as to bind on themselves and their posterity. The examples of history have no doubt that this will unavoidably depend, in some degree, on the progressive relations of times and countries.

Whenever it be pretended, however, that an alienation, so contrary to natural justice, has been made, it may be at least demonstrated, that no such alienation could be made. If such an act would, of course, have been a solemn one, negotiated by those duly authorized to act in the name of the society represented, therefore, to be easy to produce, if it existed. Until it be produced, it is fair to suppose that the rights of the upper inhabitants, antecedent thereto, and founded in natural justice, exist in all their integrity.

With respect to the United States, they have been so far from alienating this right, that the only acts in which the subject has been mentioned as respecting them, have, as has been shown above, expressly secured and confirmed to them, by treaty, the rights of navigation to which they were entitled by natural law.

So far as the rights of the upper inhabitants depend on a comparison of the numbers above and below the limits, or, in other words, of those certainly to be benefited, and those who may suffer by it, to injury, from the freedom of the navigation, there is no case in which it can be more strongly marked than in the present case. The United States hold six hundred thousand square miles of habitable territory on the Mississippi and its branches, and this territory affords millions of navigable waters, penetrating this territory in all its parts. The inhabitable grounds of Spain, below our boundary, and the bordering Spanish territory, any one can pretend no fear of being incorporated by our use of the river, are not the thousandth part of that extent, and the territory of the United States has no other outlet for its productions, and these productions are not of the bulkiest kind. And, in truth, their passage down the river may go, or be easy to be produced, if the Spanish subjects on the river, but, from their nature, might be made really advantageous to the commercial interests of Spain.

We referred to the law of nature and nations, as explained by those writers on the subject whose authority is admitted by all, not a few, and where it is disputed whether the navigation of the Mississippi was, by right of possession, the exclusive right of Spain, still, innocent passage along it is a natural right in the justice of perpetuating its borders above. It would indeed be what those writers call an imperfect right, because the modification of its exercise would depend, in a considerable degree, on the conformity of the nation through which they are to pass. But it is still a right as real and as other right, however well defined, and were it to be refused, or be shackled miles and miles, regulations not necessary for the peace or safety of its inhabitants, so as to render its use impracticable, it would then be an injury of which they would be entitled to demand redress.

The upper inhabitants cannot lose this navigation is the counterpart of that of possessing the shores below, and founded in the same natural relations with the soil and water, and the lines of commerce which their navigation must be advanced or withdrawn so as to equalize the conveniences resulting to each party from the exercise of such a right, as is the case with that of the Mississippi. That estimate is to be fairly made, with a mutual disposition to make equal sacrifices, and the numbers on each side are to have their due weight in the estimate. Spain holds, so very small a tract of habitable land on either side below our boundary, that it may, in fact, be considered as a strand of the sea. For though it is eighty leagues from our boundary to the mouth of the river, yet it is only here and there in spots and slips that the river would rise to the height of the sea in times of inundation. There are, then, and ever must be, so few inhabserve, to communicate their mutual sentiments, and that it will, in consequence, be indispensable that they be explained clearly.

However, that very principle points out to me the propriety to call your mind, that the demand made in your letter is properly to be intimated "whether this court intends to interfere in case (as it was highly probable) the United States should find themselves obliged to repel by force the hostile aggressions of the Southern Indian nations."

As, on your part, there has not been made in your communications transmitted to me, till this day, a distinction between the Indians residing within the territory of the United States and those living in His Majesty's dominions, I therefore do not see why you should in the least expect it in my answer. As little do I conceive how you could doubt that, in that letter, those Indians alone were treated of who reside within the territory of Spain, with whom His Majesty has concluded a treaty of friendship, and that in no manner can be comprehended those Indians who live within the boundaries of the United States. Therefore Spain does not propose to herself any new object than the maintaining of the legal right in the territories which belong to her, and will not take a decided part in favor of the Indians, except when justice and equity call for the same.

I am as firmly persuaded as you are, that the uncertainty that has prevailed heretofore in those Indian affairs originated from the want of fixing positively the limits between the United States and Spain; and I can assure you, that His Majesty is likewise convinced of the same truth, and being desirous to give to the United States an unequivocal proof of his sincere wishes to draw closer the bonds of friendship and of good understanding between the two countries, will withhold the discussion of the limits to be retarded, but will cause the same to be carried on with the utmost dispatch.

I participate in the professions of your letter of the 7th instant, and repeat the assurances of my zeal to oblige you, remaining under prayers to God to preserve you many years.

THE DUKE OF ALCUDIA.

MESSRS. CARMICHAEL AND SHORT.

Messrs. Carmichael and Short to the Duke de la Alcudia.

MADRID, December 29, 1793.

SIR: The letter which your excellency did us the honor to address to us, in answer to that which we wrote on the 7th, was received by us on the 19th instant.

After the just and equitable principles by which your excellency therein does us the honor to inform us are adopted by the United States, and the Indians, as well within the Spanish as the American limits, and which will be fully reciprocated by the United States, nothing remains to eradicate all possibility of difference on the subject of Indian affairs but the settlement of the limits between the two countries. And it is therefore with singular pleasure that we remark the dispositions of His Majesty towards the United States, announced by your excellency in admitting no delay in the examination of so interesting a point.

That nothing may be left undone on our part to accelerate it, we do ourselves the honor of enclosing herein an extract of what concerned limits, in particular in the memorial which we informed your excellency in our last we transmitted to his Excellency Don Diego de Gardecu. The subject being 1794, correct to the time at which, and which were the inspection of your excellency, detached from the other parts of the negotiation, we hope will require little time to be fully examined and decided on its merits.

In the mean time, because nothing is wanted to establish the several points respecting the limits which we had the honor of mentioning in our last; and we therefore allow ourselves to hope that it is reserved for the administration of your excellency to do that justice to the United States which it is evident there were never any proper grounds for withholding from them; and thus remove an obstacle to those relations between our two countries in which their mutual interests and wishes concur.

With sentiments, &c.

His Excellency the Duke of the Alcudia, &c.

WM. CARMICHAEL, W. SHORT.

Extract of a letter from Messrs. Carmichael and Short to the Secretary of State.

MADRID, January 7, 1794.

Our very prolix letters of April 18th, May 5th, and June 6th, will have made you fully acquainted with what had taken place at their respective dates. You will have seen, from them, that, from the first conference, we were fully informed in what we had suspected from the time of our commission arriving at Madrid, namely, that this Council would not acknowledge our rights either as to limits or the navigation of the Mississippi.

Under the still circumstances of European politics, our situation became from that moment embarrassing. Two lines of conduct presented themselves to our view; the first, to introuch ourselves behind the instructions we had received from you, and pursue the negotiation; the second, to temporize, in order to admit of (what we then counted on as morally certain) the receiving further advices from you after you had become acquainted with the changes which had taken place in the political relations of this country posterior to your original instructions being given.

It would be impossible to comprehend, within the space of a letter, and perhaps imprudent, in the present situation of even the surest conveyances, to commit to one all the circumstances of the moment which came to our knowledge, all the various conversations which have passed between us and the British General, and which agreed with us in determining the line to pursue. One of the principal, however, and in which the event has shown that we were mistaken, was the certainty which we felt that we should receive further instructions from you immediately on your being informed that Spain and England had got into the same scale, and were joined to the general league against France. This situation of affairs was so different from that which existed at the time of your instructions being formed, or even at the time of your last letter to us being written, that we could not doubt you would do us the honor to write to us, if it were only to confirm the original instructions, which could not but be considered as having occasion of it after so great a change.

As we were then situated, it appeared to us that the pursuing the first line could do no possible good, and might do much harm, whilst the second, if it did no good, at least avoided all harm, except that of delay, which we then supposed would be short. We therefore determined to adopt it, and gave time for receiving further instructions from you; and in the mean while to avoid whatever might tend to excite any kind of alarm in this court in respect to the United States, at the time they were forming their arrangements with England against a common enemy, and during which the greater their apprehensions of us the more they would be likely to enter into arrangements which both Spain and the United States had cause to regret of when too late.

This leading principle has directed us in all the steps we have taken; and it has induced us to hold a less expressive language than you may have wished and expected—i.e. to be less bold and decisive in the manner in which we have conducted our negotiations. Yet we hope you will find, from the crate of letters which we have transmitted to you, that we have not slighted the important and critical times at so great a distance from their Government, at so great intervals without hearing from them, and under so perfect an ignorance of their intentions and real situation with respect to the leading and dominating power of Europe.

After remaining some time in the manner above mentioned, and being fully convinced that the business of our joint commission could not be accomplished under existing circumstances, we took the liberty, in our letter of June 6th, of indicating to you our sentiments with respect to it. The measure which then appeared to us most for the honor and interest of the United States was to put an end to the joint and express commission in such a manner as to avoid alarmhere, and at the same time to leave the deck consequently open for the negotiation at the moment when the opportunity might be the most favorable as well as the most available, and we had determined to move more fully into it at present if we did not flatter ourselves that our precedent letter will have rendered it useless, at least as far as our opinion may be considered worthy of attention.

For which purpose we propose to induce us to change the line we had adopted. Still, in proportion as the time elapsed without our hearing from you, the greater the presumption became that we had been mistaken in counting on it as above mentioned. From the delay and miscarriage which sometimes take place in letter conveyance across the Atlantic, it was possible, however, you might have written without having received the same in time, and we therefore determined, to forward the discussion of our business, not as the measure which appeared to us the best, but as not thinking ourselves authorized, after so long a silence from you, to delay longer. Of this, we did ourselves the honor to inform you in our letter of August 15th, on setting out to fetch the despatch from St. Ilenfonso.

On our arrival there, we proposed to M. de Gardoqui to commence the business by each party stating their respective claims, and communicating them to each other conformably to usage in similar cases, and particularly to what was practised by the French and English commissioners, in their conferences for settling limits in America. This was done, and it appeared clearly that both parties had a right to claim, from the account, effects of the treaty, that subject with him. Under ordinary circumstances we should have been justified in terminating our joint commission; but, in the critical situation of European affairs, we continued to think it our duty not to do it without your specific instructions. And from a part of your letter of July 22d, this manner of our viewing that point, seems conformable to your intentions.

As we had determined, however, to bring on the discussion, we did not think we ought to be prevented from it merely by M. de Gardoqui's refusing to adopt the proper form. Accordingly, we prepared a memorial, stating the rights of the United States to limits and the navigation of the Mississippi, which we purposed presenting to him as the basis of discussion.

During this time accounts were received from England, and confirmed by different ways, that the United States and that country were engaged in a situation which was probably on better terms. An intelligence of November 3, 1792, was a circular enclosing the President's proclamation. We were, therefore, delivered up absolutely, to vague conjecture under these circumstances, but with presumption of the account from England being true. The English ambassador came to St. Ilenfonso, and from several circumstances evident at the moment of his arrival, it was possible, that England, having determined to be the aggressor in a war with the United States, might be endeavoring to prevail on Spain to come into it. It was possible Spain might be then hesitating on the subject. It appeared to us advisable, therefore, to suspend again the measure we were about to take until the uncertainty should be removed.

Things remained in this situation, until a person came from Cadiz with letters for us from Government. The court went to the Escurial about the same time; and our letter of September the 29th will have informed you of our meeting there, and receiving the despatches by Mr. Blake.

The object was to regret that our view of the subject in the commencement of the business had induced us to have adopted the line we did, in order to give time for further instructions; and the more so as we had foreseen that our situation here, under that commission, for various reasons, with which it is useless at present to trouble you, would be far from favorable.

As matters stood, however, it was evidently impossible that, by the middle of October, the time at which Mr. Blake was to set out, anything could be done in the general negotiation so as to give you more certain information with respect to it than what had been contained in our first letters, and which we hoped must, some of them at least, have reached you. The communication to you had not disposed of the subject; it was relative to Blake's departure. We determined, therefore, not to clog the communications on Indian affairs with the general negotiation, as it would certainly delay our answer from this court, but to endeavor to ascertain their ideas with respect to those affairs in the shortest time possible; to despatch Mr. Blake therewith; and immediately afterwards to report to our government on the subject, without further procrastination, to our own views, after being informed of yours; although we still remained convinced our rights would be refused.

It should be observed, also, that the belief of the United States being at the eve of war with Great Britain still remained in all its force, accounts the arrival of Mr. Blake. Accounts continued to arrive here from England and Holland, to that effect. As they were grounded on the supposed situation of affairs in America, later than Mr. Blake's departure, and as by him we received from you no indication of what would probably be the sentiments of America in certain cases, and particularly with respect to the conduct of the belligerent Powers opposed to the principles of the President's proclamation, nor any information of what had passed between the American and British Governments with respect to their privileges carried into our ports, we were as much at conjecture after, as before the receipt of the despatches by Mr. Blake. The assiduity of the English ambassador continued; his departure from here had nothing to disparage the importance of his mission; and every circumstance was calculated to enhance the importance of it.

Under these circumstances we brought forward a proper subject of the communications of the Spanish commissioners in a verbal conference with M. de Gardoqui; and he promised us immediately that all doubts as to the interference of Spain should be removed, and without delay. As from the conference he understood clearly what kind of an answer we expected, it was best to avoid, as much as possible, in our first letter to him, grounded thereon, the appearance of dictating it. Our letter of October 22 will have informed you that, before M. de Gardoqui gave us the promised answer, and, as he informed us, at the very moment he was about to do it, the Duke de la Aulcula determined to take that subject into his hands.

The consequence of this letter has been that, between that minister and us, of which we do ourselves the honor to forward herein copies enclosed, as well as those to M. de Gardoqui, according to the list annexed. They will show you that his first answer was absolutely different from what M. de Gardoqui had promised us; and erasive of the character of a communication that could in any manner engage him in an undertaking to us to lay the basis of the general discussion with M. de Gardoqui, by presenting him a memorial on limits and navigation, (in which we adhered to the substance, and as far as we could to the expressions, of your report on those subjects) and also to enter on the subject of limits with the Duke de la Aulcula, as he had placed the settlement of that point above all others. He did not deed to do nothing at all in the mean time, and, in the mean time, shall do whatever may depend on us, to hasten it, so that there may be the least possible added to the delay of his departure, which has been now so much extended beyond our first intention announced to you in our letter of October 22.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

We do not think ourselves authorized to give you ground to expect that, in this answer, he will come forward with candor, and acknowledge the rights of the United States. We have, from the beginning, had sufficient proofs that this court would not be induced thereto by the mere force of argument; and if they should do it before force of another kind be used, it will be only because they may begin to consider their situation, in other respects, such as the friendliness of the court that prevails.

The present moment is pregnant with great events, and may produce great changes in the situation of this and the other countries of Europe with whom the United States are most concerned. We still think, therefore, they should wait for events which it is not in their power to control. The distrust of this country towards England has certainly increased since the peace was concluded; and it may be urged, that their joint efforts, seem equally calculated to augment it. Their getting possession of Toulon, and their being forced to fly from it, have alike augmented the dissatisfaction of the two Powers with each other, and consequently the desire of arms. We think it will be best, and that the public interest of the East and West Indies, will, unavoidably, also become food for jealousy and discord. It should be observed, however, that the danger of this country from France increases also with time; and that this circumstance may prevent their showing too strong signs of displeasure with respect to Great Britain, and may even force them to conceal it altogether, so long as our joint forces and their own, are not so far victorious, as to oblige them to employ the troops and the fleet in the hands of the French, that if, as is probable, they should judge proper to employ it in Russillon, it will be difficult to calculate the effect it might have.

The present situation, then, of this country, with respect to England and France, is distress of one, and danger from the other. At a time when it would seem they had no naval enemy in the Mediterranean, and that their efforts would be wanted to defend their frontier against land force, they have given orders for sending several ships of the line of Cadiz to join their Mediterranean fleet, and for augmenting the crews of those already under the command of Langara. Their army is much diminished by losses and diseases. The Government is, however, near the end of such resources as they have been able to command, without new taxes or loans. It is uncertain how far the first could be hazarded, or the second obtained; and it is therefore thought that their intention is to apply to the resource of sales routes. These as yet keep above par, but that is hardly to be expected after a new emission. The plan seems to be to form the Cedula for about sixteen millions of dollars, and to begin with issuing only a part, about five or six millions.

If, under these circumstances, this Government supposed the United States would be able to keep out of the present war, and saw them seriously commencing a hasty, they might consider it proper to begin now to remove any cause of alarm on our part. They may probably, however, think we shall become a party in the war, and perhaps entertain doubts of the real desire of the citizens of the United States to keep out of it. Their consuls have free scope in representing these things as they please. Our last letters were by Mr. Blake; theirs come down to November 8, 1794. The despatches from this Government are of November 4, 1794. We have no means of knowing whether they declare for the one or the other, and pressed in a manner which it will be difficult to evade. Should this Government adopt that opinion, and at the same time believe in the continuance of their union with Great Britain, they will of course consider themselves as being opposed to war with the United States; and, therefore, would see no reason why they should not return the present opportunity to do us personal good.

We have thought it our duty, by the present conveyance, to say thus much of the prospect as to the general negotiation. As to Indian affairs in particular, we think, under the present circumstances, no interference is to be apprehended from this court; and that the United States may, without regard thereto, take such measures on those which they may think necessary, and are capable of producing effects in the United States, although the letter of the Duke is not absolutely conclusive during the uncertainty of the limits. This Government might, and probably would, aid them in a clandestine way, whether we be the aggressors or not. But we cannot suppose they would risk their peace with the United States by taking an active part, if there were no other cause of war between them.

We think it our duty to add, by this conveyance, the substance of a conversation which we had some time ago with Mr. de Gardouqui, whilst speaking with him on Indian affairs. To the general assurances which he gave us of the desire of the King his master to cultivate the friendship of the United States, (and to which the persisting to which the prospect of forming a friendship between the two, might give great weight) he added that it was the wish of the King that His Majesty, as a proof of these dispositions, desired to form with them an alliance offensive and defensive, or at least defensive. He expressed his regret that we had not powers adequate thereto, and desired we would communicate to the President this desire of His Majesty. He would not agree, however, to communicate it to us in writing, saying that there were more than a hundred letters of honor which the Duke could say to each other, but which it would be imprudent to express by writing, and particularly to convey across the sea in such times as these. We must add, however, that experience has convinced us that Mr. de Gardouqui sometimes forgets his verbal assurances, or interprets them so differently from what we understood them, as to make them indifferent things.

We observed to him, without being acquainted with the sentiments of the President as to transatlantic alliances, we could venture to say that he set the highest price on the friendship of His Catholic Majesty, and that we conceived he had in the case in question given a convincing proof of it; that it appeared to us that the surest and the best ground on which the United States could fix their hopes on the present war, was to derive it to it; that they had not yet a sufficient proof of the certain of making the best of this would be to begin by restoring what justly belonged to them. He said the settlement of different disputed rights, and the establishing an alliance, ought to go hand in hand, and would aid each other. We think it useless at this moment to add anything further on that subject, leaving you to make what use you may judge proper of it without an alteration.

The letter which you sent to Colonel Humphreys for us, by Mr. Cutting, is still at Lisbon; no proper conveyance having presented itself. As your letters by Mr. Blake alluded to none later than November 9, 1794, and as Mr. Cutting left America before Mr. Blake, we suppose the letter he had must be a copy of the last you mentioned. It will therefore remain at Lisbon, unless some confidential conveyance should be found, according to your instructions to Colonel Humphreys thereupon.

The last accounts left Lord Hood at the Hieres Islands. Admiral Langara is arrived with his fleet at Carthagena. There is no doubt that much ill blood is fermenting between them; and from the nature of things, it could not be otherwise. The public of Madrid are in an ill humor, also, on the subject. They say that Spain is duped by England, and that the last designs of the United States are for the ruin of her as if it were the wish of Mr. Blake to subvert him for the first time that His Majesty, as a proof of these dispositions, desired to form with them an alliance offensive and defensive, or at least defensive. of the council. The English ambassador is still here, but it is believed will set out in a few days. He is evidently much less in favor than formerly; but in the present situation of things, he will probably do more by other means than by favor. The nature of his business, however, since his being stopped here in the manner I mentioned, or the prospect of his being stopped, has probably given him a certain security from the communications to the British Parliament, sooner than by any other way equally to be relied on. I will add here nothing to what is contained in our letter of the 7th, as to the internal situation of this country. You will suppose it to be a belligerent power, as the ensuing circumstances will prove. It is much more to be feared that they should have been able to do without them so long, and keep their present station, than if they have done, seeing the circumstances in which they were before the war begun. The amount of voluntary offers, like every thing else here, is kept a mystery, viz. the amount actually received. I have heard it estimated, including that of France, of which the true amount of dollars, I have no means of knowing, but that it is not known with any degree of certainty worthy of attention. From their American possessions they have been immense on paper, and realized in at great a proportion probably as those made here, but the amount as uncertain.

The state of probation of this country which I formerly announced to you, will see is not [at] an end, and their eventual state of peace may depend on the most probable result of the war. Subject to the same redres in such a manner as they should begin a rapid depreciation, and the French troops arriving from Toulon and breaking into Catalonia, their position would be truly alarming. These cases are not certain, but still they are supposable. It is not surprising that the Government have hitherto found, and notwithstanding Cautions England and Spain continued longer the plan, at least ostensibly, of restoring the dethroned family. Spain was probably in earnest, and it would seem had been persuaded that England was also. What took place at Toulon, during the present month, at the long, has never hitherto have complications on this side been known in a manner now, it is hard to say how they could extricate themselves from their present situation. Whatever they may think in other respects, they must probably see now that contending by arms for Louis XVII. is not rendering him any service more than the first efforts of the league did to his father, whose fate impartial observers will attribute to himself and France. It seems to serve his people.

It remains to be seen now whether England and Spain will persist in this quarter in that line. As far as we can judge here, England seems to have abandoned it in other quarters, viz: the East and West Indies, and to have followed Great Britain in the war. It may be fairly concluded, after the issue of the present campaign, that all the powers of the league actually at war would be satisfied to set down at present, and leave to France the right of modelling their own Government as they pleased. If there is any exception it is England, who, from hopes of extending their East and West India possessions, would probably be the last that should consent to any thing that hope, I am not certain. What I will say here to the ministry; what the people and parliament think of it will be seen with much more certainty on their meeting. I do not comprehend among those actually at war, the Emperor of Russia. She has contrived to be an honorary member only of the league; and of course would have no objection to the continuance of a war which costs her nothing, and weakens the other powers, and this never had any thing upon that subject, but to assure us that it should never be done; and that the Spanish islands could never have need of our provisions; adding, that what was done during the last war, in that case, proceeded from motives in the governors, which were well known to him, and that he would take care to prevent it in future.

I mentioned some time ago what had been mentioned to me as to Logie's interference to procure the Portugal trade for those who were connected with that trade, and that I should inform Colonel Humphreys thereof, although I did not think it to be relied on, merely that he might make the use he pleased of it. I did not mention to you then who the person was, because my letter went by post. Since Colonel Humphreys's arrival here we have brought on the same conversation with the person, (Lord St. Helens) and he has informed us, as appeared to me, that he had not formed any particular opinion with that view, and that it had been to do away any opinion that it was the cabinet of England which had negotiated the truce, in order to let the Algerines on us, and thus abridge the advantages of our navigation during the present war.

The Secretary of Portugal here says, openly, that his court is determined not to pay any thing whatever for a peace with Algiers; and that they will treat only on terms of reciprocity. If so, we may count on their not obtaining it; but at the same time it would be certainly a misfortune for the United States to be obliged to count longer on so precarious a ground for the protection of their flag.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Short to the Secretary of State.

MADRID, January 17, 1794.

Sir:

I have last the honor of writing to you by Colonel Humphreys, who was the bearer also of a joint letter from Mr. Carmichael and myself, and who left this place a few days ago for Lisbon. Since that time we have heard nothing further from the Duke de la Alcudia, and are waiting still for his answer to our last of the 22d ultimo, in order to despatch Mr. Blackwell with it. During the unsettled state of the court at Madrid, preparatory to its departure for Lisbon, it was thought, from the usage established, improper to press for that answer. The treaty with Algiers is now settled in the Sitio since the day before yesterday, and we therefore shall think ourselves authorized to remind him of it, if we do not very soon hear from him. The nature of this situation is such to continue the disease widely in the army; although it does not appear to be generally fatal, it discharges them from service. The number of Ricardo's army in that situation at present is supposed to pass fifteen thousand.

It is said that, among the extraordinary resources to be applied to for present contingencies here, is that of the King in his own hands, to hand over all sums in deposit, which are considerable his country, and to pay an annual interest of three per cent. You have been already informed of an operation, somewhat similar to this, made with respect to the funds of different commonwealths previous to the war. Although it is within a few days only that this project has been considered as decided on, yet it is said the ordinance is already dated in October last. I have not seen it myself, however, but it is not unusual here to keep as a profound secret, an ordinance after it is passed, and even to attempt to do it after it is printed. The idea amongst the best informed is, that the Government have determined that forty millions of dollars will be necessary to carry on the war, and that millions are to be raised by sales reales; and that the looking at interest the sums in deposit, is to be one of the means for raising the balance; the ordinary revenue, of course, to be applied to the ordinary expenses.

I have the honor of enclosing a statement of the vessels which arrived at Cadiz during the last year; those from the Spanish possessions in America, with the value of the gold and silver on board, being particularized. The number of vessels which entered Barcelona is also added.

The number of American vessels which came to Cadiz, you will find to be one hundred and sixty-two; and as you will no doubt have been informed of their number for the year preceding, you will be able to ascertain the progress of that valuable branch of navigation which seems at present so much menaced by the Algerine cruisers. Among the vessels marked as English, there was a considerable number from Quebec, loaded with wheat. That branch of English navigation augmented considerably in the last year, and will probably continue augmenting with the population and agriculture of that country. More this object becomes considerable, and attracts the attention of the British Government, the more will they be disposed to render our navigation, in the southern parts of Europe, precarions, by all the means in their power.

One of the effects of the present war to Spain has been to raise the price of all the productions of industry in a considerable degree. A productive labor is not only more productive labor is consumed, either in the army, or in providing for the army, as would necessarily have produced that effect to a considerable degree. Government augmented it by shewing so great a number of the French settled in this country, and who were unquestionably the most industrious of its inhabitants, and the labor of whom was employed to carry on the immediate handiwork, but that which their industry and capitals kept a-going among the Spaniards themselves. This loss of productive labor, and the effect produced thereby, makes less noise than the loss of a battle, or of a camp; but is probably much more prejudicial, and exhausts much more the public resources.

Independent of the cause above-mentioned operating on all articles, the bad season of the last year contributes also to an increase in the price of the essential article of wheat, to a degree which is well worthy the attention of this Government. This will appear from the comparative state, which I have the honor of enclosing, of the prices of that article in the principal markets of Spain for the months of January, 1793, and January, 1794.

The difference which will strike you is the great difference between the highest and lowest price of wheat on the same day, in some of the southern markets, and particularly at Cadiz, being, at that place, from fifty-nine to eighty-seven reals the fana, in January, 1793; and from seventy to one hundred and twenty-eight in January, 1794. This has been explained to me in a manner which shows that it is a subject of much importance for the farmers and exporters of the United States, and should be made known to them, if it is not so already. It depends on the preference given by the inhabitants of Cadiz to the hard red grained wheat. This is either produced in Spain, or imported from Italy or Africa. The soft white grained wheat, which they import from the north, or from America, is considered a species of commodity to which the rich of Cadiz may no use of it for their own particular consumption, but when the other is not to be had, or is at too high a price. This preference seems to be the effect merely of taste; as at Barcelona, on the contrary, the soft white grained wheat is preferred. Consequently, whilst the highest price of wheat is much greater at Cadiz than at Barcelona, the white soft grained commands a price at Barcelona superior to what it does at Cadiz. Proper information on this subject, taken from the different parts of Spain, might induce the American farmers, perhaps, to conform the kind of wheat they cultivate to the taste of the greatest numbers of consumers, or at least would enable the exporters to devise the kind they export to the market where it is preferred. In this case, the result of information from the different ports, would be to annually carry out there, some of the produce of confidence in each of the Spanish ports, with whom the permanent agent of the United States might correspond. A continued course of observation would be necessary, also, in order to avoid error. And if the same measure were to be adopted, with respect to the principal ports of Europe, to which this article of the produce of the United States is exported, very useful information probably would result. This, however, cannot be done but with time, and by a proper correspondence with persons of confidence in those ports.

During the same year one hundred and nine vessels sailed from Cadiz for the several ports of Spanish America. The owners are not included in the above statement. They are said to have much increased of late years in all the Spanish ports. This increase is attributed, for the most part, to the peace with the Algerines. In the port of Barcelona, during the year 1793, the merchant vessels which entered, amounted to 1,614: of which—Spanish, 1,365; French, 16; Genoese, 46; Neapolitan, 4; Venetian, 8; Tunisian, 5; Ragusan, 2; Tunisian, 1; American, 1; English, 96; Dutch, 12; Swedish, 4; Danish, 132.

* N. B. There were, besides, imported in the same vessels, ninety-six portions of silver and four of gold, and also pearls for the King; and several articles of gold, silver, and precious stones, for individuals; the value of which was not expressed.

Explication of the letter of Mr. Short to the Secretary of State.

We received yesterday a letter from the Duke of Alcudia, saying, that since his last of the 26th November and 18th December, the letters so long expected from Louisian and the Floridas had arrived; and that, by the intelligence given in them by the governors of those provinces, His Majesty was satisfied that the Indians bordering on Spain and the United States had been really the aggressors against the peaceable inhabitants of Georgia, on whom they had exercised their cruelty and barbarity; and that, in consequence thereof, His Majesty had given orders to

Madrid, January 21, 1794.
Note presented to Lord Grenville, November 9, 1793.

The serious and strong objections of the French government to the king of Great Britain, in the communication of the crown, have induced the king of Great Britain, acting in concert with the government of Commodore Szevy, and of the country of Nice, by the French, in no respect changed her dispositions. She knew how to make her neutrality and territory respected, although the latter be open and defenceless, on the side of Nice. Nor had the appearance of a formidable squadron before the ports of the republic, and the fear of compelling the government of women of a great number of her citizens, whose prosperous commerce, and especially the coasting trade, is concerned. She had, by divers negotiations, and thus saved Piedmont and Lombardy, which then presented no obstacle to the invasion of the French. This firm, loyal, and generous conduct, by the serious government of Genoa, merited the most formal approbation of the court of Versailles, and the most respectful acknowledgment of the Italian state of Turin. These two courts then gave the most positive assurances that they would always respect her neutrality.

If the serious republic has religiously observed her neutrality, at a time when she had everything to fear from France; if she then avoided giving the least reason for discontent to the allied Powers, it cannot be presumed that she would admit the demand of her respect in the same case as it was ever against those who have been so hardy since the peace of the French is no longer to be feared. Besides, the transactions alleged to justify the violation of the territory of the republic are destitute of foundation, or cannot be imputed to her conduct. A rapid discussion of these transactions may be here given:

1st. The most serious of these transactions is the seizure of a French tartan* who, it is said, did not acknowledge the pretended National Convention of France, and was under the immediate protection of his Britannic Majesty. His Britannic Majesty, by Rear Admiral Gell, sufficed to prove that they have been led into an error by wantonly arising reports: 1st. The most serious of these transactions is the seizure of a French tartan*, who, it is said, did not acknowledge the National Convention of France, and was under the immediate protection of his Britannic Majesty, by Rear Admiral Gell, sufficed to prove that they have been led into an error by wantonly arising reports.

2d. The serious government is reproached for having permitted the British flag to be insulted, by seizing two French vessels preparatory to sail. This is charge of foundation. The serious government, jealous of causing her edict of neutrality to be observed, exacted from the French captains their word of honor, that, during the space of twenty-four hours, they would not discharge any of the vessels which sailed out, or which should be in sight of the port. The English squadron, on entering the harbor, received the word of honor from the French, and the captain of one of the vessels was sent to the commander in chief, which obliged her to return. Having gone out again, three days after, she perceived the same boats, which had hidden behind a cape in the vicinity, where they watched for the favorable moment of attack. The serious government, conformably to its edict of neutrality, had required of the captains of the gunboats, previous to their departure, their word of honor without restriction, and that word had always been observed with the greatest exactness. These vessels anchored at Portofino, where health guards were given them. The government could not deprive them of the asylum of the port, because Portofino is a short distance from Genoa, and behind a cape.

3d. To the reiterated orders in which the crew of the Majesty have been guilty, it is said, to the individuals belonging to the marine of His Britannic Majesty, as well as to several others, these outrage have never been proved, nor have they been the subject of any claim. In the assault which took place on the 10th of August, between the British subjects and some Frenchmen, the former were defended and protected by the sailors of the republic; but the latter pretended to the contrary. The accounts of the court of Genoa being false, the government of the serious government procured to them all the facility—all the succor that could be expected from a friendly nation. A considerable number of them have been received in the public hospitals, and have been treated with that attention which has merited the expression of their gratitude to the people of Genoa.

4th. As to the reiterated orders in which the crew of the Majesty have been guilty, it is said, to the individuals belonging to the marine of His Britannic Majesty, as well as to several others, these outrage have never been proved, nor have they been the subject of any claim. In the accident which took place on the 10th of August, between the British subjects and some Frenchmen, the former were defended and protected by the sailors of the republic; but the latter pretended to the contrary. The accounts of the court of Genoa being false, the government of the serious government procured to them all the facility—all the succor that could be expected from a friendly nation. A considerable number of them have been received in the public hospitals, and have been treated with that attention which has merited the expression of their gratitude to the people of Genoa.

5th. The serious government, convinced that justice presides in the councils of His Britannic Majesty, hopes to obtain a reparation for the acts of violence which have so grievously affected her. The minister plenipotentiary, Drake, has acknowledged the legality of these claims, and proposed to declare that neither the act of his Britannic Majesty, nor the act of Admiral Gell, had had any influence in compelling the action of the vessels which offended the republic, but that they had only punished the guilty. Contesting itself with such a declaration would be to acknowledge the complaints alleged against the republic, the nullity of which have been proved.

The serious government solicits a reparation proportioned to the object of its complaints; which it claims with so much more confidence, as it has been jealous of meriting the good will of His Britannic Majesty.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 16TH DAY OF APRIL, 1794.

Message nominating John Jay as Envoy to Great Britain.

United States, April 16, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The communications which I have made to you, during your present session, from the despatches of our minister in London, contain a serious aspect of our affairs with Great Britain. But, as peace ought to be pursued with unremitting zeal, before the last resource, which has so often been the scourge of nations, and cannot fail to check the advanced prosperity of the United States, is contemplated, I have thought proper to nominate, and do hereby nominate, John Jay as envoy extraordinary of the United States to His Britannic Majesty.

My confidence in our minister plenipotentiary in London continues undiminished. But a mission like this, while it corresponds with the solemnity of the occasion will announce, to the world a solicitude for a friendly adjustment of our complaints, and a reluctance to hostility. Going immediately from the United States, such an envoy will carry with him a full knowledge of the existing temper and sensibility of our country, and will thus be taught to vindicate our rights with firmness, and to cultivate peace with sincerity.

FRANCE.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 17, 1794.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the message from the President of the United States, of the 18th of March last, relative to an advance of money required by the minister of the French republic, made the following report:

That, on inquiry into the subject referred to them, they find that the President is already fully authorized, without the intervention of Congress, to make any arrangements which may accommodate the minister of the French republic, by way of anticipation on the accruing instalments, as far as the existing revenues and resources will permit, and that, in the opinion of the committee, the present circumstances and exigencies of the United States will not permit a recurrence to any further revenues or resources for the purposes mentioned in the said message.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 23, 1794.

Letter from the Secretary of State transmitting a letter to Congress from the Committee of Public Safety of France.

Philadelphia, April 22, 1794.

Sir:

I do myself the honor of transmitting to the Senate the translation of a French letter, the original of which was addressed to Congress, and was delivered to me yesterday by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

The Vice President of the United States

and President of the Senate.

LIBERTY—EQUALITY—OR DEATH.

The representatives of the French people, members of the Committee of Public Safety, to the citizens, members of the Congress of the United States of America.

After having laid the foundation of our liberty, it became incumbent on us to secure it. A national government is born, and with it victory. Emanating from the will of the people, it has their energy. For the salvation of the State it has been resorted to, and the State is saved. At its voice fifteen armies are in motion, and triumph; at its signal, interior order is restored—fruitful industry is expanded—the conspirators fall.

We impart the news of the success of our armies to a people who, having obtained liberty in a similar manner with ourselves, cannot learn, but with enthusiasm, of the victories of republicans, and the downfall of tyrants.

Policy already appreciates the advantage of the retaking of Toullou. Already have the neutral Powers proclaimed themselves; and Genoa, indignant at the atrocity of our enemies, who have assaulted her territory by the vilest and blackest of crimes—Genoa has resumed all her energy, and driven the English and Spaniards from her ports.
In the North, our triumphs, not less brilliant, have given the combined Powers some severe shocks. They had dared to menace Dunkirk, Maubeuge, and Landau. Every where they have been beaten; every where they have been put to flight; and even towards the Rhine, our army, in pursuit of them, had advanced to the very gates of Mayence. Such is the long catalogue of success which unfolds itself, at the same moment, at every point to which the French republic sends her invincible phalanxes.

So many victories will convey nothing astonishing to you—you, magnanimous republicans, who will easily conceive the prodigies which liberty is capable of performing, after having, in this vast career, left to the defenders of the people memorable examples. You had already participated in our triumphs, as well in thought as political union. Our successes reverberate on you, and the fall of our eternal and implacable enemies will be as satisfactory to America, as to outraged France. Our cause is reciprocal; it is that of every people who honor humanity.

It is under these glorious auspices that the representatives of the French people are pressed by the desire of drawing closer, more than ever, the bonds of friendship, which unite two great, generous, and free nations. Thus liberty will have two points of fixture on the world; and being an immovable colossus, she will rest one foot on each hemisphere.

At her voice let agriculture and commerce, those two sources of national prosperity, pouring out under our hands their mutual exchanges, multiply, aggrandize, and cement our friendly relations and public felicity.

Let us discard every thing which may disturb that necessary harmony pointed out by the nature of things, still more than by a reciprocal interest; that harmony which has not a cautious, selfish, mercantile policy for its principle, but the esteem, the fraternity, all the social and beneficent virtues, which flow from liberty.

Honor, Prosperity, Safety, and Fraternity.

3d Congress.] No. 93. [1st Session] SPAIN,

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 23, 1794.

Mr. Lee, from the committee to whom were referred several remonstrances from the citizens of the United States west of the Alleghany mountains, respecting the navigation of the river Mississippi, made the following report:

That measures having been taken, and being still pursued by the Executive, by negotiations with the court of Spain, to obtain, by peaceful means, the free navigation of the said river, to which the United States are entitled by treaty, and having full confidence that the desirable object will be speedily and vigilantly pursued by the proper constitutional authority till it shall be accomplished; and viewing the subject as falling peculiarly within the limits of the Executive Department, they are of opinion that the said remonstrance ought to be sent to the President of the United States for his information, having no doubt that all due attention will, as heretofore, be paid by him to the subject, and every practicable measure pursued to obtain redress of the grievance complained of.

That, as it appears from the communications of the Executive, that the right of the United States to the free navigation of the Mississippi, is now the subject of negotiation with the court of Spain, and as it is the interest of the United States, and every part thereof, to come to an amicable adjustment of their right in that mode, rather than resort to any means constitutionally belonging to the Legislature, no further proceeding should be had on the said remonstrance, during the present session of Congress.

3d Congress.] No. 94. [1st Session] GREAT BRITAIN,

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MAY 12, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

As the letter, which I forwarded to Congress on the 15th day of April last, from the minister plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty to the Secretary of State, in answer to a memorial of our minister in London, related to a very interesting subject, I thought it proper not to delay its communication. But since that time the memorial itself has been received, in a letter from our minister, and a reply has been made to that answer by the Secretary of State. Copies of them are therefore now transmitted.

G. WASHINGTON.

LONDON, January 28, 1794.

Dear Sir:

LORD Grenville having told me that he would send the answer to my memorial on the grain trade to Mr. Hammond, to be by him stated to you, I enclose a copy of that representation, that you may have them both before you at the same time.

I remain, &c.

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

The Secretary of State.
The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor of representing to Lord Grenville, Secretary of State, that he has received information from additional instructions to His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, dated the 8th of June, 1793, and that it is with great regret that the government of the United States authorize measures which must materially injure the United States and abridge the rights to which, as a neutral nation, they are entitled. He has, therefore, directed the undersigned to expose to His Majesty's Government the demonstration of those measures, to demand an immediate and effectual retraction of the same, and to ask the representations, if necessary, in order to prevent their continuance. The article of the additional instructions, which is deemed particularly injurious to the United States, is that which permits all vessels laden wholly, or in part, with corn, flour, or meal, bound to any port in French America, to be seized and impounded by Government, or to be burned, on proof that the same have been furnished by the crown of France, or are of the port of some country in amity with His Majesty. It is conceived that this article is in opposition to the law of nations, which has for its basis reason, and the usage of civilized countries; for reason and usage have established that, where two nations are in amity and at peace, remain their natural right to pursue any of their agriculture, manufactures, and other ordinary vocations; to carry the produce of their industry for exchange to all nations, different or neutral, as usual; to go and come freely without injury or molestation; and, in short, that the war among others shall be held as if it did not exist. One restriction on their natural rights has been submitted to by nations at peace, as in the case of Spaniards and others with the United States; but the restrictions mere made in the interest of the other, not doing whatever, to a place blockaded by its enemy. What these implements of war are, has been so often agreed, and is so well understood, as to leave little question about them at this day: there does not perhaps exist a civilized nation in our common hemisphere, which has not made a particular enumeration of them in some of their treaties, under the name of contraband; from whence it clearly appears, that corn, flour, and meal, are not of those articles, and consequently remain articles of free commerce. It is the common interest of mankind, that a culture which, like that of the soil, furnishes sustenance and employment to so great a proportion of them, should not be interrupted or suspended because two nations are involved in war. It is also the interest of humanity, that those articles which are destined for the destruction of mankind should not be classed with those intended for their subsistence. If any nation has a right to shut up to the produce of another all the ports of the earth, except her own and those of her friends, and the trade of the nation with whose ports they may open their ports; or, if, from motives of policy, she were to abstain from this last exclusion, yet the opposite party would certainly have the vital right to pursue the same measure, whereby the same consequence would ensue. But for a nation to have its peaceful industry suspended, and its citizens reduced to idleness and want, by the act of another, is a restriction which the common reason of mankind, and the united wisdom of the nations, would be unable to warrant. If we, and our friends, will purchase your producer! because it is obvious that this effectually destroys the right all people have of judging for themselves what market best suits them, and precludes them from the enjoyment of the necessaries and comforts which might be obtained in return from any other independent country. It being evident, therefore, that the state of war existing between Great Britain and France furnishes no legitimate right to either interrupt the agriculture of the United States, or the peaceable exchange of its produce with all nations, the exercise of it will be as lawful hereafter as now, in peace as in war; for no ground acknowledged by the common reason of mankind authorizes any power to prevent the commerce of nations at any time and in any practice is hereby begun, to which no time, no circumstances, prescribe any limits, and which strikes at the root of the agriculture of the United States—branch of industry which gives food, clothing, and comfort, to the bulk of their inhabitants.

This article proceeds directly to draw the United States from that state of peace in which they wish to remain; for, it is an essential character of neutrality to furnish no aids (not stipulated by previous treaty) to one party which are not furnished with equal readiness to the other. If the United States permit corn to be sent to Great Britain and France, it is not in peace, but in war. To restrain it would lead to war with France and reckoning between restraining it themselves, and acquiescing in the restraint by her. It is no doubt, that the President trusts the justice and friendly disposition of His Majesty will not permit him to reduce the United States, especially as he is conscious that they have given no cause for it by any part of their conduct; he therefore disclaims whatever of the United States is not a matter detrimental to them will be discontinued, and compensation made to such of their citizens as may have suffered through them.

In thus unloading to His Majesty's Government the objections to this measure, the undersigned is particularly instructed to declare that the United States found their expectation of justice from His Majesty's Government on a principle of justice, and on their promise, to offer the most explicit assurance of their earnest desire to live on terms of the best friendship with this country.

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

Mr. Hammond to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, April 11, 1794.

Sir: In a letter which I had the honor of addressing to your predecessor, on the 12th of September last, I communicated to him an additional instruction, given by His Majesty's council, of the 8th of June, 1793, to the commanders of all British armed vessels, and accompanied it by some few observations, explanatory of the principles in which it had originated. But as Mr. Pinckney has recently presented to His Majesty's ministers a memorial relative to the instruction in question, I am directed to submit to you, sir, some further remarks on this subject.

I have formerly stated that, at the period of issuing this instruction, the situation of France was notoriously such as to point out the prevention of its receiving supplies as one of the means of reducing it to reasonable terms of peace with the United States. Confronted with an absolute pretension of the declaration of war with the United States, France, it could no longer be regarded as a mercantile speculation of individual, but as an immediate operation of every persons who had declared, and were carrying on, war against Great Britain. Notwithstanding this situation and circumstances, His Majesty's Government, so far from proceeding to the extent which the law of nations would have authorized, but, on the contrary, restrained all attempts to render the nation in danger, they by the instruction only prevented the French from being supplied with corn, omitting all mention of other provisions, and especially rice, one of the staple agricultural productions of the United States; and even with regard to corn, instead of a confiscation of the cargoes, assured to the neutral proprietors a full indemnification for any loss they might suffer, being a possibility sustained.

It is not essential to the present question to enter into an examination of the different definitions, which, as you, sir, well know, have been given of the law of nations, and of the consequent diversity of sentiment that has preceded the establishment of such principles. I shall therefore not hesitate to admit the broad basis which Mr. Pinckney has assigned to it—reason, and the usage of civilized countries; but I must premise, that, though the principle of reason be immutable, its dictates are sometimes by circumstances, or liable to different interpretations; and that the usage of nations is fluctuating. Hence, then, in order to ascertain the real nature and force of those principles which have been established on this basis, it is necessary to recur to the result of the experience and wisdom of ages and of nations, as it is collected and exposed by those... authors who have treated this subject. If it be examined by this criterion, it is manifest that the right of a belligerent Power to stop, and even to seize, supplies of provisions going to its enemies, is strongly inculcated in all the ancient authors, and is comprehended in the usual and natural signification of these respects, than which it is to be found in the books of authority, on which the practice and law of nations rest; and, in point of fact, it would, I doubt not, be found, on investigation, that the milder usage, with respect to provisions, is of a recent date. In regard to the collateral argument which Mr. Pinckney deduces from the enumeration of articles contained in the "contrabande de guerre," it is contained in the following terms to observe, that those treaties are not declaratory of the law of nations, but are restrictions and modifications of that law by special agreements between the contracting parties; and are consequently neither binding on other Powers, nor even on the parties themselves in other cases. But even in the following treaties, it would be found for, to observe, that the power of seizing contraband is not declared to be an inherent right of the belligerent Power, nor even in the cases where such right is declared to be inherent, is it declared to be free of restriction or regulation by any of the parties. It must be observed, that in the case of contraband, and the sole limitation, which he appears to assign to declarations of this nature, is, that they shall not operate to the prejudice of particular treaties which may subsist between the neutral nations and the belligerent Power promulgating such declarations. I shall certainly not controvert Mr. Pinckney's position, that it is the common interest of mankind, that a culture which, like that of the soil, furnishes sustenance and employment to so great a proportion of them, should not be interrupted or suspended because two nations are involved in war; but I must, at the same time, be permitted to observe that it is at least a questionable point whether the "interests of humanity" be not best consulted by a recurrence, on the part of a belligerent Power, to all the honorable means of imposing on an enemy the necessity of submitting to reasonable terms of accommodation, and of thereby abridging the duration of the calamities of war. The expectation of imposing this necessity is the motive, under the influence of which this instruction has been given; and it is the result of that expectation, on the supposition that in this respect the nation is warranted by precedents; and is inculcated by those writers whose sentiments on questions of this kind are entitled to every degree of authority and respect.

The only part of Mr. Pinckney's representation, upon which I remain for to offer any further remarks, is his explication of the idea of the property of a neutral Power, both present and as it may be conceived to have happened at the conclusion of the late war. In this part of his representation, I find that the United States in this instruction, binding itself, as it is commonly done by foreign Powers, to the usage of neutrality, and to a violation of the neutrality of the United States; and that the United States in this instruction, has been such as the whole world appears to imagine that this measure on the part of the British Government would have a tendency in future to produce. Having now, sir, I hope satisfactorily, evinced that the right of a belligerent Power to detain and even seize provisions for its enemy, is not a mere doctrine, but is consistent to the law of nations, as explained by the best authors on the subject, and is even recognized by the stipulations of particular treaties, I cannot avoid expressing my conviction that the modification contained in the instruction of the 8th of June, to which it is the intention of the King's Government to adhere, will be governed by this Government as more favorable to the commerce of the United States, and that the highest principle of the law of nations, and Mr. Pinckney's article, the disposition to cultivate and maintain with the United States the most cordial harmony and good understanding. I have the honor to be, &c.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Hammond.

Philadelphia, May 1, 1794.

Sir: Your letter of the 11th ultimo reviews a discussion long supposed to be concluded with greater convenience to our ministers of our respective nations in London. For my own part, as the additional instructions of June 8th, 1793, are essentially connected with that system, which has since appeared in more ample form, I wish to convey to our envoy extraordinary, as well the representations against them, as those truly serious remonstrances which the instructions of the 6th and 8th of June, 1793, contain, and the conviction with, the decision which I feel, that the United States have pursued with honor the path of neutrality: that His Britannic Majesty cannot with justice upbraid our conduct; and that the opinions which you are pleased to avow, tend to wrest from us the benefits due to our impartiality and love of peace; it is immaterial to pass over the doctrines contained in your letter, which seem to have been the germ of subsequent harsher measures.

In your exposition of the instructions of the 8th of June, as collected from your letter to my predecessor, on the 12th of September last, and from your remarks on Mr. Pinckney's memorial, you rely on two principal arguments: 1st. That, by the strictness of the right derived from the law of nations respecting contraband, and the actual situation of France, vessels of the United States, loaded wholly or in part with corn, meal, or flour, bound to any port in France, or any port occupied by the armies of France, may at least be lawfully stopped and detained: and 2d. That the rigor of this right has been softened, not only by exempting other provisions, and especially rice, but, also, by assuring to the neutral proprietors even of cargoes of corn, a full indemnification, instead of confiscating them. You next endeavor to remove the discontent excited by the preference established against the United States in favor of Denmark and Sweden, in the case of a blockaded or besieged port, by ascribing it entirely to the stipulation of treaties and to the apprehension expressed by the maritime states: and these instructions would be regarded as a precedent for a similar severity from France, by affirming that France had begun it before they were formed. 1st. The epoch at which the distinction between a contraband and lawful commerce was first settled among nations, is, perhaps, neither known nor material. We have heard it said that it originated in treaty, because it is deducible from the internal law of nations, as denominated by Vattel, independently of treaty. For, as one Government, by carrying the instruments of war to the enemies of another, without an obligation, contracted prior to the commencement of hostilities, would thereby abandon its neutrality; so could not the individuals who were not parties to such a contract, without a breach of the law of nature, be liable to injury or loss. As no one could be a fitness for war, then, as is indicated by what are called instruments of war, is the original criterion of contraband. Corn, meal, and flour, do indeed support men; and men wield arms. But they support men no less in peace than in war; and if, by a circuit of construction, food can be universally ranked among military engines, to be used for any purpose, it must be confessed, if it be not in all circumstances, must be confessed, corn, meal, and flour, are so; in a blockade, siege, or investment. There the exclusion of them directly and obviously goes to the reduction of the place; but neutral commerce is, in this instance, infringed only, where the exclusion would endanger the warlike operations. In a general war, they must, it would be replied, that this position would withdraw naval stores, as being suited to peace or war, from the list of contrab-band; I shall be ready to examine whether, upon principle, they partake not the qualities of ordinary merchandise; whether the ancient writers who first pronounced against them, did not live (to use the language of a high British authority on the same occasion) when commerce was but little understood: its rights were not sufficiently regarded: war was too much a season of rapine; they who entered into it, meant less to conquer than to plunder; and when have exhausted the pernicious returns of their dictate, their rules and precepts. Many of the writers have proceeded: whether the modern usage of nations has not cast away the opinion as obsolete: and above all, whether corn, meal, and flour, do not hold a pre-eminence over naval stores, by being the most part incapable of being domesticated, or of subsisting on land.

* Vide the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance, concluded on the 21st of October, 1661, between King Charles the second and his Swedish Majesty.

When Mr. Pinckney refers to treaties for the enumeration of contraband, you answer that they are not declaratory of the law of nations, but restrictions and modifications of that law by special agreements but seen the parties—" not binding on other Powers, nor even on the parties themselves in other cases"? and, in the treaty of Brest, 1778, these reservations are entirely nullified.

After premising that treaties as well as statutes often re-enact a pre-existing law, a few of the English treaties most important to the present purpose, shall be consulted.

We are at a loss to determine why, in 1655, Crownell omitted provisions from his treaty with the United Provinces, whereby the United Provinces were not at all apt to stop short of his rights, or to discard any possibility, by which he might accomplish his designs.

In the treaty of commerce between France and England, in 1667, corn, barley, other grain, and every thing tending to the subsistence of man or beast, were declared contraband.

In the treaty of commerce between Charles II. King of England, and the States of Holland, in 1668, the liberty of trade is granted to all goods which are not called contraband; and no goods are there so called but arms, and things which serve for the use of war; those serving for sustenance and the support of life being excluded in terms.

By the treaty of Utrecht, in 1719, between England and Spain, wheat, barley, other grain, and generally whatsoever belongs to the sustaining and nourishing of life, are excepted from contraband.

In the treaty of commerce and navigation between England and Russia, in 1766, only military stores are contraband.

In 1786, Denmark as well as Russia concur in the same ideas.

And the last expression of the sense of Great Britain, in the year 1786, in the treaty with France, was, that wheat, barley, and other kind of corn, were not to be reckoned contraband.

In the treaty of navigation with Powers of different orders; with one against whom she has been employed in perpetual rivalship and war; with others whose bias of commerce and the fruits of whose agriculture could most annoy her by supplies to her enemies; with Holland, with France, with Spain, and with Russia. I pretend not to assert that England has been immutable in regarding and respecting this immunity in her treaties. But, in that period, she has deviated, without reason; which at the moment only indicated it was necessary to better information, will enable you to correct me. If, however, you appeal to the convention between Holland and England in 1668, as a proof of the contrary, I must cite the animadversions of Jenkinson and Vattel. "Such therefore, that treaties are called to the necessity of the hour, which, in proceeding thereby those bounds of equity and moderation which she had almost always practised in this point before and which she will, I hope, most faithfully observe for the future. The Dutch, if he, as well as other the crowns, who were particularly affected by this prohibition, contended very vehemently against it; in answer to their objections were urged the circumstances of affairs, the danger of Europe, and the mighty strength of that ambitious power, which, if some extraordinary fort was not made, would bring mankind under its subjection. It is remarkable that Puffendorf, who owed his fortune and employments to one of those northern crowns, was of opinion in this case against them; and thought that the too much for one or another end; it circumstances may sometimes make a thing to be lawful, which, considered by itself, would be unjust or such times are truly unhappy, when necessity must be pleaded in support of a right."

England and the United Provinces having agreed in the treaty of Whitehall, signed on the 29d August, 1669, to regard no ship, whatever the cargo or character, as contraband, or coming out of, the harbors of that kingdom, to be a lawful prize, Sweden and Denmark, from whom some ships had been taken, entered into a counter treaty on the 17th of March, 1693; for maintaining their rights, and procuring just satisfaction. The maritime Powers, perceiving, that the complaints of the two crowns were well grounded, did not justify their exertions.

All the major nations of Europe, and in addition to these, Denmark and Sweden, have followed the same practice in their treaties—I shall not say exclusively, because this would imply a greater intimacy with their foreign relations than at this distance we perceive, that it will not be too assuming to conjecture under what influence they may have occasionally departed from these tenets, permit me to hazard a belief that the examples of such a departure, and especially in certain high-toned declarations of Holland, in the last century, and of Louis the Fourteenth of France, will be found in motives which bear no affinity to, and can neither illustrate nor weaken, the principle.

These, are the striking features of the customary law of nations, as defined by Vattel. "When, says he, a custom is generally established, either between all the polished nations in the world, or only between those of a certain continent, as of Europe, for example, or those who have a more frequent correspondence, if that is custom in its own nature, such is it to every other who might make it useful, it ought to be obligatory on every one, not only by the law of nations, but also by the law of nature, other wise while they have not expressly declared that they will not adhere to it. But if that custom contains any thing unjust, or illegal, it is of no force, and every nation is under an obligation to abandon it; nothing being able to oblige or permit a nation to negotiate a new law." Although the United States be without the European circle, they not only have a frequent correspondence with Europe, but in various public acts have proclaimed their abhorrence of enlarging the catalogue of contraband. I appeal to their treaty with Holland, to their treaty with Sweden, and their treaty with Prussia. A passage in the last has abolished the clause of the convention to which I alluded in the former treated of—"And in the same case of one of the contracting parties being engaged in war with any other Power, to prevent all the difficulties and misunderstandings that usually arise respecting the merchandise herefore called contraband, such arms, armorial, and other warlike stores as are carried in the said ships by the said other party to the enemies of the other shall be deemed contraband, so as to induce confiscation, or condemnation, and a loss of property to individuals, &c.

That suggestion is wise and useful your own candor admits. You express yourself thus: I shall certainly not controvert Mr. Pinckney's observation, that it is the common interest of mankind, that a culture, which, like that of the soil, furnishes sustenance and employment to so great a proportion of them, should not be interrupted or suspended, because two nations are involved in war. But what if these evidences of custom were less forcible than they are? When I review the events of Europe for more than a century past, and remark how much they have been crowded and diversified; how strong mercantile tile enterprise has been; how seldom other nations have suffered, and that Great Britain has not suffered at all, from this barthen on neutral commerce, I must be indulged with the inquiry, if, upon the supposition of the ancient law of nations, subject to its limitations, by the interposition of society, commerce with the world, are to be dead to them? If they are, is it because they are sovereignties of a recent date, and in the Western hemisphère, although, whencesoever they might, they have narrowed the sphere of contraband? Would not the nations of Europe deem the United States innocuous in that respect, if they should assume the imperative, in any prevailing modification of that law? Would Great Britain herself be silent? Let then the inconvencences and advantages of these alterations be to us reciprocical.

As you have selected the treaty of England with Sweden, in 1601, in opposition to Mr. Pinckney, it has been reserved for a test of the preceding doctrines. I acknowledge that provisions are contraband, according to that treaty; but in what manner? Does it recognize them as contraband under the law of nations? This cannot be maintained, because the treaties, for more than a hundred years past, announcing them not to be contraband, are more numerous than those of a different complexion, and, therefore, enjoy a better title to be declaratory of the law of nations. Does it break the uniformity of the law, which has long obtained? It is presumable that no more can be quoted, unless it be between England and Holland, in February, 1675-4, which may be accounted for on different grounds, and was quickly cancelled by the treaty of December, 1674, or that in 1699, on which we have already spoken. If this be true, it is the most obvious and manifesting this of 1661, to wit, in 1654 and 1656, between the same parties, the definition of contraband does not embrace provisions. If this variation has not been wrought by peculiar causes, it is at any rate overwhelmed by the mass of conflicting authorities, to which England has herself given birth, at different stages of her commerce.

You next resort to the opinion of being friends to the instructions.

Until Grotius, in 1605, published his work on war and peace, the subject had been much neglected. "He," says Vattel, "broke up the land, and it is not surprising that his mind, overcharged by an immense variety of objects and citations which entered into his plan, could not always acquire those distinct ideas, so necessary in the sciences."

He admits, I own, that, if a nation cannot defend itself without those things which are sent to its enemies, such as money, provisions, ships, and naval stores, necessity will give that nation a good right to them, upon condition of restitution, if there be no just cause to the contrary. This is no palliative for the instructions, because Great Britain not only absconded in corn, meal, and flour, but her European ports were shut, by prohibitory duties, against their importations from the United States.

He afterwards treats of the right of one enemy to intercept provisions going to another. "If the supplies sent thither hinder the execution of my designs, and the sender might have known as much as, if I have besieged a town, or blocked up its entrance. In this case, an intercepted, it is said, that sender is obliged to make me satisfaction for the damage that I suffer on his account." Upon what data the citizens of the United States could calculate that their accustomed trade would hinder the execution of the designs of Great Britain, will be hereafter treated of. But let me say this as much the better. Behamey, the commentator of Grotius, whose notes enhance the dignity of the text, and are the efforts of an enlightened pen, in an enlightened age, when the law of nations had been critically investigated, liberates us from every dilemma in this respect.

Provided, that, in furnishing corn, for instance, to an enemy besieged and pressed by another, it is not done with design to deliver him from that unhappy extremity; and the party is ready to sell the same goods also to the other enemy, the state of neutrality and liberty of commerce leave the besieger no room for complaint. "There is the more reason for this, if the seller had been accustomed to the traffic in the same goods before the war." He puts the strongest possible case, that of a siege, and yet decides for the neutral. Your West Indies are conscious that we have been always ready to sell to them our corn, meal, and flour: your merchants have enjoyed full liberty of purchase. Your own inquiry into our trade must have convinced you, that long before the war, we were in the habit of exporting those commodities to France.

You are certainly correct in your estimate of Martens' elementary treatise on the modern law of nations, but are you equally so in inferring, from his 374th section, that he regards corn as contraband? That we may discover his genuine sense, it may be well to present together all the important sections on neutral commerce.

"Of neutral commerce, according to the universal law of nations.

"One of the most important points relatively to the conduct which the neutral Powers are to hold, is the commerce to be carried on with the enemy. Now, in considering the thing on the part of the neutral Power, the right was not proved of the time of peace, and transgression into the commerce of an enemy, and the continuance of carrying on this commerce with it, also remains to it, when a war takes place between two Powers, so that it may permit its subjects to transport every sort of merchandise, and even arms or warlike stores, to the two Powers engaged in the war, or to that one of them with which this commerce may be continued or established most advantageously to itself. But let me say this as much the better. Behamey, the commentator of Grotius, whose notes enhance the dignity of the text, and are the efforts of an enlightened pen, in an enlightened age, when the law of nations had been critically investigated, liberates us from every dilemma in this respect. However the belligerent Power, having a right to hinder its enemy from being reinforced by whatever serves for the use of war, the necessity of its own state was to prevent these measures arriving to the enemy, still it ought not to confine itself to the holding of these mercantile during the war, or to the appropriating of them to herself, but it may make provision for the value of the thing to the neutral proprietor. But this right to confiscate such merchandise, or even the vessels carrying them, seems not to belong to the enemy, except when the neutral Power has violated the laws of neutrality, or when this confiscation is made at a place amenable to the laws of the sovereign exercising it."

"Entire prohibition of commerce.

"In consequence of this last principle, and of the rights of every sovereign in general, the belligerent Power may even prohibit all commerce with the enemy throughout the extent of its territory and maritime dominion, in the places and provinces of the enemy of which it has rendered itself the master, and even with the places which it holds blockaded as to be able to prohibit the entry therein of every stranger. In all these cases, it may subjoin to its prohibition the penalties either of confiscation of the effects, or of the vessels, or the corporal punishment of those who exercise this commerce."
it has even been certain to certain mercantiles, which do not serve directly or solely for war, inasmuch as they might be useful to the enemy; whilst, in others, the latter are expressly ranged among mercantiles, the commerce of which is made the principle which has been expressly proscribed, when nothing has been said of the neutral Powers.

"Besides this, the maritime Powers have been, particularly since the end of the last century, to make, at the commencement of war, declarations, in order to notify to the neutral Powers the mercantiles which they would regard as contraband, and which they shall esteem on those who might transport them to the enemy. These declarations are less laws than notices; but their effect cannot be extended to the Powers with whom treaties subsist, which cannot be injured by them."

"Penalty attached to contraband commerce."

"A nation which authorizes this contraband commerce is deemed to violate the obligations of neutrality; and the belligerent Power is permitted to confiscate such mercantiles and even, sometimes, the vessels. This latter point is very questionable, when the proprietor of the vessel had known she belonged to a neutral Power, either in the whole or in part. At present, however, almost all the commercial treaties have abolished this custom entirely, or, at least, they do not admit it, except in some cases. But where no treaties exist, the conduct observed by the belligerent Powers is rather inconstant."

§ 276.

"Freedom of neutral commerce acknowledged in Europe."

"But as to mercantiles which are not contraband, it is generally adopted, that it is permitted to the neutral Powers freely to trade in them with the enemy, and to transport them to the enemy, except in places blocked up, by which all commerce is interrupted. However, neutral merchant vessels ought, in open sea, to submit to the customary visitation, or which that is fixed by treaties in almost an uniform manner."

The deductions from this author are,

1. That the neutral rights extend to every kind of merchandise, and even to arms or military stores, with certain exceptions, which do not protect any other nation.
2. That the places of an enemy with which commerce is interdicted, are those only which are possessed by the adversary Power, or blocked up, so as to prevent the entrance of every stranger.
3. That treaties of commerce have sometimes classed provisions among contraband, and sometimes among lawful merchandise, and that,
4. A commerce in mercantiles, which do not serve directly or solely for war, is to be presumed lawful, when nothing has been regulated concerning it.

Which, sir, of these deductions confront the doctrines now advanced?

It is true, from a passage in your letter, the answer which will immediately—there is no other limitation upon the will of a nation to increase the number of contraband, than that treaties shall not be violated. If this were tenable, the law of nations, instead of being a stable rule, would fluctuate, according to the caprice and force of the belligerent Powers. But Martens obviates such a consequence by observing that "these declarations are not to be understood as assertions of warnings." The law is, therefore, to be sought for elsewhere than in those notices; it must have existed before.

Let us now turn from the question of contraband to your second vindication of the instruction, namely, the probability of its successful operation against France. To this end, you state that, "at the period of issuing the instruction, the situation of France was notoriously such as to point out the prevention of its receiving supplies, as one of the means of reducing it to reasonable terms of peace." And, again, that "it is, at least, a questionable point whether the interest of humanity be not best consulted by a recurrence, on the part of the belligerent Power, to all honorable means of imposing on an enemy the necessity of submitting to reasonable terms of accommodation, and of thereby abating the duration of the calamities of war," and that "the expectation of imposing this necessity is the motive under the influence of which this instruction has been issued, and is the acknowledged ground of your former explanations of it." &c.

You have not, sir, except in a few instances, meddle with this branch of the subject further than the stress which you lay upon it demands. In defence, therefore, of the commercial rights of the United States, I must be pardoned for asking if the actual situation of France does, in truth, afford a clear and unequivocal prospect of defeat by famine? What is the state of the environs of that country, the quota for labor, the agriculture, the total of the internal resources of France, induce so much of doubt, at least, as to the possibility of any hopes of provisions from the adversary? and is it not a sufficient answer to your objections against the check to our commerce, if, the two seas which wash her territory and her coasts, for many hundreds, miles, can be so guarded as to render the importation of subsistence impracticable; if she cannot send forth naval convoys competent to your advantage, or get her supplies by overland conveyances? If, for the possible difficulty which a scantiness of external supplies might create—i.e., from the possible clamors and tumult which the want of imported bread might stir up; or if from any other speculation, a neutral trade, of many years standing, is to be suppressed, some of the belligerent parties, in every war, will set off pretext for harassing neutrals.

To counterbalance the innocence of individuals, and drive all from the course of their commerce, upon the vague suspicion that the ruling power of France is gathering supplies under their names, as you seem to intimate, is to humiliate and to punish.

Vattel remains to be examined. "Commodities," he says, "particularly used in war, and the importation of which to an enemy is prohibited, are called contraband goods; such are arms, military and naval stores, timber, horses, and even provisions, in certain jurestures, when there are hopes of reducing the enemy by famine."

So that, in point of fact, the usage of nations, and the opinions of other respectable writers, are repeated, to controvert this dictum. But, without dwelling longer on such considerations, if the judge of these hopes of reducing the enemy by famine be one of the warring Powers, it must be guided, upon this, as upon every other occasion, and that under them from the great duty that "each nation ought to contribute all in its power to the happiness and perfection of other nations." I ought to be held to the utter, without demonstrable justice, the rights of another nation. It ought not to be seduced, by sanguine expectations of advantage, to forget our full claim to whatsoever neutrals can reasonably require. At the very moment when our citizens were navigating the ocean, ignorant of any penalty which they had to avoid, as soon as the instructions had undergone the forms of office, they were the victims. Those who undertake to judge for us should remember what the impression must be, if the proclamation of the President of the United States reached London before they were published; that we were not impressed, as stated by Great Britain, in any official channel, for months after it had been brought thereto by reprobation; and the instructions of the 6th of June, operating independently, and not handed to us by you until the 19th of September, were disturbing our commerce for more than three months before we were admonished of our danger.

Denmark, therefore, it is not involved in the words of the first clause in the instructions. But if the late tablets of Arnowil are to be believed, the interest of those nations, in the direct exports of corn, meal, and flour, to France, and the carrying trade in those articles thither, has received no wound, of which they greatly complain. So that, in fact, of the nations inhabiting the shores of the Atlantic ocean, and practising their navigation," the instructions essentially interfere with the United States alone.

"Such as ship timber, cables, hemp, specie, grain, brandy, tobacco, and other articles of life," &c.
2. With our rights thus fortified, we have no room for discussing the moderation which you attribute to the exercise of your pretensions. We are not free from injury by the exemption of rice, or the forbearance to confiscate corn, meal, and flour. We are not compensated for our injuries, because no more than two out of three of our agricultural productions are wrested from the channels chosen for them by ourselves. Compute, sir, the value of those prohibited goods, and their importance to the growth of our shipping. Although it will always be a serious object to keep our rice markets unclugged, the losses by the instructions are neither covered nor concealed by the indulgence to rice. Its freedom plainly speaks that France was not presumed to be relieved by it; or else the belief of a famine by arresting corn, meal, and flour, was vain. Hence the profit of this exportation would be an inadequate atonement, even upon your own scale, for the other wrongs. Further, the original destination of the corn, meal, and flour, to France, was dictated by France being notoriously a better market than any other to which they had access; especially when they were to be conducted into the British ports under the stigma of being culprit property. It will be necessary, therefore, before the temper of the instructions be fairly appreciated, to compare the actual allowance in the English ports with the prices in the true port: to determine what the degree of damage is to a merchant, whose agent lives in France, to have his ship compelled to enter into England; how long it may be before she can be accommodated to this unlooked for situation; what capital may be rendered for some time inactive; what preparations for a return cargo may be ruined at the intended port; and what derangements may overtake an individual whose study and fortune have been fixed to one scheme. When all these items shall be assembled, then, and not till then, shall we know the rate of compensation which is afforded by the omission to confiscate. But, after all, the real question is, whether any belligerent Power can thus fetter neutral trade? Nay, if the instructions had terminated only in the demand of security, one of the conditions upon which vessels may be rescued from the admiralty, even this would have been vacuous. It is very rare that security can be obtained in a foreign land, where neither an owner nor a correspondent resides, without an hypothecation of the vessel.

3. In your letter of the 19th of September, 1793, you contend that the exception in favor of Denmark and Sweden has reference to existing treaties with those Powers, and cannot, therefore, give just grounds of umbrage or jealousy to other Powers, between whom and Great Britain no such treaties subsist. As the instructions in the instance of a blockade light upon the United States alone, of all the Atlantic nations, when our remonstrances upon the capture shall be heard, it will probably be again pronounced, as it has already been, without any reply in your last letter: "What might not we, on the same ground, have withheld from Great Britain during the whole course of the present war, as well as the peace which has preceded it?" Reluctant as I am to kindle fresh contests, this topic will not, at present, be dilated. But surely to exact the last iota of a right awakens an unsocial feeling.

4. It is of no consequence, nor do I pretend to ascertain, from whom we have received the first injury. Complaints against one nation cannot be discharged by severity from another. But Mr. Pinckney argued with fitness, that, if the United States acquiesced in the instructions of Great Britain, as being consonant to the law of nations, they must acquiesce in the pleasure of all the world, who, by waging war, may destroy every foreign market. From another people, whose acts offend us, we shall expect satisfaction. We expect no more from you.

No, sir, we have labored to cultivate with the British nation perfect harmony. We have not attempted, by a revival of maxims, which, if ever countenanced, are now antiquated, to blast your agriculture or commerce. To be persuaded, as you wish, that the Instructions of the 9th of June, 1793, are in a conciliatory spirit, is impossible. And be assured, sir, that it is a matter of sincere regret to learn the intention of your Government to adhere to them, notwithstanding our representations, which utter, as we flatter ourselves, the decent but firm language of right. I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary.

Mr. Ellsworth, from the committee to whom was referred a number of resolutions moved in the Senate, relating to the navigation of the Mississippi, and the negotiation at the court of Spain, submitted the following report:

That, in the negotiation now carrying on at Madrid, between the United States and Spain, the right of the former to the free navigation of the Mississippi is well asserted and demonstrated, and their claim to its enjoyment is pursued with all the activity and vivacity which the magnitude of the subject demands, and will duly be pursued, until the object shall be obtained, or adverse circumstances shall render the further progress of the negotiation impracticable. That, in the present state of the business, it would be improper for Congress to interfere. But the committee recommend, that, in order to satisfy the citizens of the United States more immediately interested in the event of this negotiation, that the United States have uniformly asserted their right to the free use of the navigation of the river Mississippi, and have employed, and will continue to pursue, such measures as are best adapted to obtain the enjoyment of this important territorial right, it be Resolved by the Senate, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to cause to be communicated to the Executive of the State of Kentucky, such part of the existing negotiation between the United States and Spain, relative to this subject, as he may deem advisable and consistent with the course of negotiations.

The documents which accompany this message develop the measures which I have taken to suppress them, and the intelligence which has been lately received. It will be seen from thence, that the subject has not been neglected; that every power vested in the Executive, on such occasions, has been exerted; and that there was reason to believe that the enterprise projected against the Spanish dominions was relinquished. But it appears to have been revived, upon principles which set public order at defiance, and place the peace of the United States at the discretion of unauthorized individuals. The means already deposited in the different Departments of Government are shown by experience not to be adequate to these high exigencies, although such of them as are lodged in the hands of the Executive shall continue to be used with promptness, energy, and decision, proportioned to the case. But I am impelled, by the position of our public affairs, to recommend that provision be made for a stronger and more vigorous opposition than can be given to such hostile movements under the laws as they now stand.

G. WASHINGTON.

PHILADELPHIA, August 29, 1793.

To His Excellency the Governor of Kentucky.

SIR: The commissioners of Spain, residing here, have complained to the President of the United States, that certain persons at this place are taking measures to excite the inhabitants of Kentucky to join in an enterprise against the Spanish dominions on the Mississippi; and in evidence of it, have produced the printed address now enclosed. I have it, therefore, in charge from the President, to desire you particularly to attend to any attempts of this kind, among the citizens of Kentucky, and if you shall have reason to believe any such enterprise meditated, that you put them on their guard against the consequence, as all acts of hostility committed by them on nations at peace with the United States are forbidden by the laws, and will expose them to punishment: and that, in every event, you take those legal measures which shall be necessary to prevent any such enterprise.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

The Hon. Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State.

GERMANTOWN, November 6, 1793.

SIR: I have received from the representatives of Spain here, information of which the following is the substance: That, on the 2d of October, four Frenchmen, of the names of La Chaise, Charles Delpeau, Matharin, and Gignoux, set out in the stage from Philadelphia for Kentucky; that they were authorized by the minister of France here to excite and engage as many as they could, whether of our citizens or others, on the road or within your Government, or any where else, to undertake an expedition against the Spanish settlements within our neighborhood, and, in event, to descend the Ohio and Mississippi and attack New Orleans, where they expected some naval co-operation; that they were furnished with money for these purposes, and with blank commissions, to be filled up at their discretion. I enclose you the description of these four persons in the very words in which it has been communicated to me.

Having laid this information before the President of the United States, I have it in charge from him to desire your particular attention to these persons, that they may not be permitted to excite within our territories, or carry from thence, any hostilities into the territory of Spain. For this purpose, it is more desirable that those peaceable means of coercion should be used which have been provided by the laws, such as the binding to the good behavior these, or any other persons exciting or engaging in these unlawful enterprises, inditing them, or resorting to such other legal process, as those learned in the laws of your State may advise. Where these fail, or are inadequate, a suppression by the militia of the State has been ordered and practiced in the other States. I hope that the citizens of Kentucky will not be decoyed into any participation in these illegal enterprises against the peace of their country, by any effect they may expect from them on the navigation of the Mississippi. Their good sense will tell them, that that is not to be effected by half measures of this kind, and that their surest dependence is on those regular measures which are pursuing, and will be pursued, by the General Government, and which flow from the united authority of all the States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TH: JEFFERSON.

To His Excellency the Governor of Kentucky.

January 13, 1794.

SIR: After the date of my last letter to you, I received information that a commission had been sent to General Clarke with powers to name and commission other officers, and to raise a body of men. No steps having been taken by him (as far as has come to my knowledge) to carry this plan into execution, I did not conceive it was either proper or necessary for me to do any thing in the business.

Two Frenchmen, La Chaise and Delpeau, have lately come into this State. I am told they declare, publicly, they are in daily expectation of receiving a supply of money, and that, as soon as they do receive it, they shall raise a body of men and proceed with them down the river. Whether they have any sufficient reason to expect to get such a supply, or any serious intention of applying it in that manner, if they do receive it, I can form no opinion.

I judged it proper, as the President had directed me to write to me on this subject, to give you this information, that he be may be apprized, as fully as I am, of the steps which have been and are now taking here in this matter. If the President should, hereafter, think it necessary to hold any further communication with the Executive of this State on this subject, I wish him to be full and explicit as to the part which he wishes and expects me to act. That, if when that communication shall be within my knowledge, I may take the liberty to make any remarks on the part which I have in my power to show that the steps which I may take were not only within my legal powers, but were also required by him.

I have great doubts, even if they do attempt to carry their plan into execution, (provided they manage their business as well as they would be expected) whether there is any legal authority to restrain or punish them, at least before they have actually accomplished it; for, if it is lawful for any one citizen of this State to leave it, it is equally so for any number of them to do it. It is also lawful for them to carry with them any quantity of provisions, arms, and ammunition, and, if the act is lawful, the provision of arms, and nothing is done to prohibit it. But I know of no law which inflicts a punishment on intention, only, or any criterion by which to decide what would be sufficient evidence of that intention, if it was a proper subject of legal censure.

I shall, upon all occasions, be averse to the exercise of any power which I do not consider myself as being clearly and unambiguously invested with, and nothing is done to prohibit it. I do not know how far I am entitled to this confidence of your patronage that I can, and brethren, in favor of a man whom I view as an enemy and a tyrant. I shall also feel but little inclination to take an active part in punishing or restraining any of my fellow-citizens for a supposed intention only to gratify or remove the fears of the minister of a prince, who openly withholds from us an invaluable right, and who secretly inflicts upon us a most savage and cruel enemy.

But, whatever may be my private opinion as a man, as a friend to liberty, an American citizen, and an inhabitant of the Western waters, I shall, at all times, hold it as my duty to perform whatever might be constitutionally required of me, as Governor of Kentucky, by the President of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq. Secretary of State.

Philadelphia, March 29, 1794.

Sir:

The letter which your excellency addressed to my predecessor, on the 13th of January, 1793, has been laid before the President of the United States, and I have it in charge from him to recall to your view the state of things with which it is connected.

It was further informed, on the 29th of August, 1793, that the commissioners of Spain had complained of attempts to excite the inhabitants of Kentucky to an enterprise against the Spanish dominions on the Mississippi; that the President requested you to be attentive to circumstances of this kind; and that if such an enterprise was meditated, your citizens ought to be put on their guard against the consequences, and that you should adopt the necessary legal measures for preventing for it, as, acts of treachery are, and are provided for by your citizen nations at peace with the United States, were forbidden by the laws, and would subject the offenders to punishment.

That every efficient exhortation might be combined with a sense of duty, it was, at the same time, represented to you that in the state in which you are now placed, the special interests of the State of Kentucky could be particularly commuted; as nothing could be more injurious to them than such a movement, at the very moment when their interests were under negotiation between Spain and the United States. Your excellency's answer, on the 5th October, 1793, gave a satisfactory assurance of your readiness to counteract any attempt which may be made against your State, and that you were then in contemplation in your State; and of your citizens possessing too just a sense of the obligations which they owe to the General Government, to embark in any enterprise so injurious to the United States.

It was, therefore, with full confidence in your zeal, that, on the 6th of November, 1793, upon the representation of the commissioners of Spain, you were further informed that, on the 3d of October, 1793, four Frenchmen, of the names of La Chaise, Charles Delpean, Mathurin, and Gignoux, had set out in the stage from Philadelphia to Kentucky, authorized by the then minister of France here to engage as many as they could, whether of our citizens or others, within your State, and to lead them into the States, or anywhere, to undertake an expedition against the Spanish settlements within our neighborhood, and in event to descend the Ohio and Mississippi, and to attack New Orleans, where naval operation was expected; and that they were furnished with money for these purposes, and with blank commissions, to be filled up at their discretion. Your excellency was requested to caution your officers to take every precaution which could be provided by the laws, (such as the binding down good behavior or indulging) or to resort to such other legal process as those learned in the laws of your State might advise. The letter conveying the foregoing intelligence, proceeds thus: "Wherefore, all or are inadequate, a suppression by the militia of the State has been ordered, and practical measures will not be deferred into any participation in these illegal enterprises against the peace of their country, by any effect which they may expect from them on the navigation of the Mississippi. Their good sense will tell them that it is not to be effected by half measures of this kind; and that their surest dependence is on those regular measures which are proposed, and will be pursued, by the General Government, and which flow from the united authority of all the States."

After the impression made by your letter of the 5th of October, 1793, you will naturally conclude how difficult it was to reconcile it with your last, of the 12th of January, 1794. As the constituent and the laws of the United States are to govern the conduct of all, so cannot it be well imagined that the President intended to impose upon your excellency any departure from them. You were asked to prefer peaceable means of coercing and, for that purpose, to consult those who were learned in the laws of your State, to designate legal measures to be adopted. I shall not attempt to determine the precise sense of your excellency, to determine whether any, or what, species of process was admissible. I beg leave, however, to observe that if, in the opinion of the judges, no preventive or other step could be supported, the President required none. My predecessor, in his letter of November 29, 1793, from what is now the State of Kentucky, and much of the laws of which are understood to be incorporated in your code, naturally suggested the propriety of binding to the good behavior and inducing. And, indeed, what Government can be so destitute of the means of self-defence, as to suffer, with impunity, its peace to be drawn into jeopary by hostilities levelled within its territory against a foreign nation, ordered to be prostrated at the will of tumultuous and rude societies of bloodshed and civil war to be introduced? You intinmate a doubt, sir, whether the two Frenchmen, La Chaise and Delpean, can be restrained or punished, before they have actually accomplished their plan, and assign as a reason for this doubt, that any step of your excellency or of the Executive of your State, to carry out the wishes of provisions, arms, and ammunitions before the completion of the whole plan, Hence you conclude that these acts, being lawful, a particular intention cannot render them unlawful, and that no criterion can be fixed for deciding such an intention. If there be no peculiarity in the laws of Kentucky, and that act is allowable to be reduced from general principles, or even analogy to the laws of other States, we might expect, from a candid examination of your excellency's, and hence the Executive of your State, to wait, as your excellency would seem to suppose, until their numbers shall defy the ordinary arrangements of force; and until they are incapable of being subdued, but by force of arms. To prevent the extremely of crimes, is wise and humane, and steps of precaution have, therefore, been found in the laws of most societies.

Nor is this offence of foreigners expiated or lessened by an appeal to a presumed right in the citizens of Kentucky to set under such hands without the intervention of their Government, instituted for the happiness of the whole, with a clear delineation of the channels in which the authority derived from such a quarter may flow, can a part only of the citizens wrest the sword from the hands of those magistrate whom the whole have invested with the direction of the military power? They may, it is true, leave their country; they may take arms and present themselves before some court; but not on the ground of mere personal liberty, but of being retained in a foreign service, for purposes of enmity against another people, satisfaction will be demanded, and the State to which they belong cannot connive at their conduct, without hazarding a rupture. The evidence of a culpable intention is perhaps to be proved it is a subject of inquiry in penal proceedings, and undefined to an objection to your interference on this occasion. But here sufficient to say, that the President wishes you to do nothing more than the laws themselves permit. Let them have their free course, by such instructions as you may think adequate and advisable, and I trust that they will prove competent to rescue the United States from a painful alteration of their foreign relations.

As these unwelcome assemblages of military force may assume various forms, Congress have not been unmindful that the civil arm may sometimes be unequal to the task of sustaining civil authority. They have, therefore, by an act of May 2, 1792, conferred on the marshals and their deputies the same power, in executing the laws of the United States, as sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law in executing the laws of their respective States. They have rendered it lawful for the President, in case of invasion, to call forth the militia, or to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer of the militia as he shall think proper. They have empowered him to call forth the militia or call for the suppression of an insurrection in another, under certain circumstances; and to subdue, by the militia, any combinations against the laws which may be too powerful for ordinary judicial proceedings.

Thus far have I addressed your excellency upon the constitutional and legal rights of the Government, which perhaps are in strictness the only topics belonging to the present occasion. But, as it may not be known that the navigation of the Mississippi has occupied the earliest labors of the Executive, and has been pursued with an unresisted sincerity, I will lay before you such a sketch of the pending negotiation as may be communicated consistently with the respect due to the nation in treaty with us, and the rules observed in such cases.

The primary subject in that negotiation is the renewal of any treaty operated between the United States, has been to throw open to the commerce that resulted from the treaties, that have been held with the United States, by one of the commissioners of Spain here, that His Catholic Majesty, apprized of our solicitudes to have some arrangements made respecting our free navigation, gave the port of Cadiz, was ready to enter into a treaty at Madrid. And great, indeed, was that solicitude. For although this overture was not, as to the place, what might have been desired, yet it was attended to without delay, and accepted.

As a proof of the interest taken by the Government on this subject, I might mention that, not only was Mr. Carmichael, who had acquired an acquaintance with persons and circumstances in Spain, made a member of the commission, but Mr. Short was added, as being more particularly informed of the navigation to be treated of.

Instructions, comprehensive, accurate, and forcible, were prepared by my predecessor; and if at this stage of the business it were proper to develop them to public view, I should expect, with certainty, that those who are the president for the main object would pronounce that the Executive has been deficient neither in vigilance nor exertions.

For many months have our commissioners been employed in this important affair, at Madrid. At this moment their labors cannot be ascertained finally, what is the result of the negotiations with the powers of Europe, and other considerations, which at this season cannot with propriety be detailed, dictate a peaceable expectation of the result.

Let this communication, then, be received, sir, as a warning against the dangers to which these unauthorized schemes of war may expose the United States, and particularly the State of Kentucky. Let not unfounded suspicions of a tardiness on the part of either, or that the Government, the courts of the United States, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, as may be applied for, or as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

I cannot, therefore, doubt that, when your excellency shall revise this subject, you will come to this conclusion, that the enterprizes which you profess as a private man, a friend to liberty, an American citizen, and an inhabitant of Kentucky, if you are bound to the duty as a citizen, that you have considered, that on the other hand, the contemplation of those several characters, under which you have considered yourself, ought to produce a compliance with those measures which the President of the United States has consigned to your discretion and execution.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

His Excellency the Governor of Kentucky.

Copy of the first, second, and ninth sections of "An act to provide for calling forth the militia," &c.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation, or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion; and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper, and in case of an actual war with any State, against the Government of the United States, or of the President, or of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, as may be applied for, or as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, the same being notified to the President of the United States, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State to suppress such combinations, and to execute the laws of the United States, and to cause the militia of a State where such combinations may happen, shall refuse, or be insufficient to suppress the same, it shall be lawful for the President, if the Legislature of the United States be not in session, to call forth and command the militia of such States most convenient thereto, as may be necessary; and the use of the militia, so to be called for, may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the ensuing session.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the several districts, and their deputies, shall have the same power, in executing the laws of the United States, as sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law in executing the laws of their respective States.

59 Vol. 1.
Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to His Excellency Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the Northwestern Territory, dated Germantown, near Philadelphia, November 9, 1793.

Sir:

I have the honor to transmit a copy of a letter written by the Secretary of State to the Governor of Kentucky, relative to the design of certain Frenchmen, mentioned therein, to excite some military enterprise against the possessions of Spain upon the Mississippi, with which Power the United States are at peace.

The President of the United States has instructed me to request that you would consider the letter to the Governor of Kentucky as written to yourself, and that you take all the measures in the course of the laws for the prevention of the design, in the manner suggested by the Secretary of State. But if the design should have assumed such an aspect as to bid defiance to the operation of the laws, that then you use the militia of your Government to prevent the progress of the design; or that you request the officer commanding the troops of the United States in your neighborhood, in the name of the President of the United States, to afford you such assistance in the effectual suppression of such design, and apprehension of the offenders, as the nature of the case may require. You will please to report any proceedings of yours which may occur in consequence of this letter, in order that the same may be submitted to the President of the United States.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to His Excellency the Governor of Kentucky, dated Germantown, near Philadelphia, November 9, 1793.

Sir:

I have the honor to enclose your excellency a letter from the Secretary of State, relatively to the designs of four Frenchmen, to excite some enterprise against the possessions of Spain, on the Mississippi, with which Power the United States are at peace. To permit such a measure in any of the United States would be a breach of our neutrality, and of course violate the United States in the existing war between the belligerent parties, and therefore the enterprise is not to be tolerated in the least degree. The Secretary of State has suggested how this design may be prevented by the usual course of the laws. But if this mode should be ineffectual, I am instructed by the President of the United States to request that your excellency will use effectual military force to prevent the execution of the plan of the said Frenchmen, or any other persons who may support orabet their design; for the lawful expenses of which the United States will be responsible.

Any proceedings which may take place in consequence of the letter from the Secretary of State, or of this letter, you will please report, in order to be submitted to the President of the United States.

Copy of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Governor of Kentucky, dated Head Quarters, Greeneville, January 6, 1794.

Sir:

I have the honor to enclose your excellency a copy of a letter to the commanding officer of the legionary cavalry, stationed between Georgetown and Lexington, in the State of Kentucky, directing him to receive and obey your excellency's orders, should you find any occasion for their services in suppressing the design mentioned in the enclosed extracts of letters from Governor St. Clair, and the Secretary of War: the original letter from the War Office you have undoubtly received before this period.

Should the force now offered be deemed insufficient, or should more be wanted, it shall not be withheld upon this interesting occasion; notwithstanding our proximity to the combined force of the hostile Indians, who are now kept in double check by the troops on this ground, and those posted on the field of battle of the 4th November, 1793, which we took possession of on the 24th ultimo.

The measures which I have taken for the security of the Northwestern frontiers, I hope and trust will be found salutary and effectual.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. WAYNE.

His Excellency ISAAC SHELBY, Esq. Governor, Kentucky.

Extract of a letter from Lexington, Kentucky, dated

March 31, 1794.

"Monday—An agent from General Clarke, properly authorized by him, made his appearance here, for the express purpose of purchasing, on the credit of General Clarke, such articles as were absolutely necessary, in order that he might depart immediately.

"He called on me, shewed me his authority, and offered to purchase my two boats. The articles wanted were two, viz. five hundred pounds of powder, and one ton cannon ball. The purchases were completed; the powder is at this instant in my cellar; to-morrow it leaves this place for the falls. The boats will start next week; their provisions are all ready, and the 15th April is appointed for the day of their departure from the falls.

"Friday, April 4.—Yesterday the powder left this place."

The writer is expected in town in a few days.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Wayne, dated

March 31, 1794.

"The idea of a post to be established at Fort Massac, was held forth on the 17th of May last, and left optional with you; but certain circumstances at that time prevented your adopting the idea. The late intention of some restless people of the frontier settlements, to make hostile incursions into the dominions of Spain, renders it indispensable that you should immediately order as respectable a detachment as you can, to take post at Fort Massac; and to erect a strong redoubt and block house, with some suitable cannon from Fort Washington.

"The officer who should command, ought to be a man of approved integrity, firmness, and prudence."

"Besides the directions for erecting the works, the supplies, discipline, and police of his garrison, he ought to be instructed somewhat in the following manner:

"Secret and confidential.—It has not been unknown to you, that a number of lawless people, residing on the waters of the Ohio, in defiance of the national authority, have entertained the daring design of invading the territories of Spain. The atrocity of this measure, and its probable effects, are pointed out in the proclamation of the President of the United States, herewith delivered to you."
"If this design should be persisted in, or hereafter revived, and any such parties should make their appearance in the neighborhood of your garrison, and you should be well informed that they are armed and equipped for war, and entertain the criminal intention described in the President's proclamation, you are to send to them some person in whose veracity you could confide—and if such person should be a peace officer, he would be the most proper messenger—and warn them of their evil proceedings, and forbid their attempting to pass the fort at their peril. But if, notwithstanding every peaceable effort to persuade them to abandon their criminal design, they should still persist in their attempts to pass down on the Ohio, you are to use every military means in your power for preventing them, and for which this shall be your sufficient justification, provided you have taken all the pacific steps before directed."

Copy of a letter from M. Williamson, Jr., to Captain Thomas Martin, dated Rock Landing, April 9, 1794.

DEAR CAPTAIN:

Agreeable to your request, I have made every inquiry about Murray; he has not been here, and if he should come, Captain Mc'Kinsey will certainly send him to the fort. Iwall set out for Carr's Bluff this evening, and if I should see or hear of him, shall send him immediately up and if any more of the Federal troops should desert, with an expedition of the same kind as that now expected to take place, I would hasten to join them to form a body of troops to march against the enemy. General Clark requested me to urge the necessity of not interfering with Government, particularly in that of persuading the troops of the United States to desert and join them; and that, if he could find out that any officer or soldier had acted in that manner, contrary to the interests of the United States, it should be given into the hands of the law, and be punished as the law directs.

I am, with respect, yours, &c.

M. WILLIAMSON, Jr.

Colonel Carr delivered his advertisement to Captain Mc'Kinsey, with a special command that the within mentioned deserter be safely taken to your quarters, provided he should come to this place, as well as any other that might desert, with an idea to shelter with the republicans, or F—— to F——.

M. W. JR.

Extract of a letter from Constant Freeman, Agent for the Department of War, in Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated Fort Fidus, April 18, 1794.

"We have been for a long time held in suspense by the different reports which have circulated, relative to certain persons being employed in this State to recruit a corps of troops for the service of France. There cannot now be any doubts remaining upon this subject. Officers have been appointed, and are now acting under the authority of the French republic. Parties of recruits have already marched to the rendezvous appointed for them. Several men of this corps have crossed the Oconee, and encamped opposite Greensborough. A small party was found by us some days opposite to the Rock Landings; they had since marched to Carr's Bluff, to join with those that had assembled at that place. The general rendezvous, we are told, is to be on the river St. Mary. An agent is appointed to furnish the supplies; and he has, for that purpose, received ten thousand dollars. A person, who was formerly the contractor's clerk at this post, is employed by him to purchase four thousand rations of provisions.

He has gone down the country to execute this business.

On the 8th instant, a Colonel Carr, and Major Williamson, came to this garrison; they stayed the day and night with Captain Martin; they are said to be officers in the French service. This was confirmed by Major Williamson, who showed Captain Martin a letter of instructions which he had received from General Clark, directing him to repair to Fort Fidus, the Rock Landings, and Carr's Bluff; for the purpose of paying to the recruits of the French legion an allowance for mileage from their homes to the places of rendezvous. He showed Captain Martin a list of the men whom he had paid, and who are encamped on the other side of the Oconee, opposite to Greensborough, under the command of the late Lieutenant Bird, who is now a captain in the said legion; and he also showed Captain Martin his saddles and trunks, and told him that he had more than a thousand dollars in them for the purposes above mentioned; and he further informed him that General Clark would cross the Oconee in ten days from that time to take the command, and that Colonel Carr would be one of the adventurers. Major Williamson has been employed as paymaster.

Colonel Carr told me that large detachments had marched from the back settlements of South Carolina, and from the State of Kentucky; that the men were to be engaged for three months, and were to receive bounties of land in the provinces of East and West Florida, and Louisiana, which they were to conquer from the Spaniards; that M. Girod is appointed a major general, and is to command in chief, and that measures would be taken to connect the Creeks, that the legion might march through their country.

The next day they left this garrison, and proceeded on their journey to Carr's Bluff. That morning a soldier deserted from Captain Martin's company, and as it was apprehended he had joined the party of the French legion, then encamped opposite to the Rock Landings, Captain Martin sent a message to Major Williamson, requesting him that the man might be returned. He has received the enclosed letter as an answer, which I have desired him to give me that I might send it to you. This letter confirms what I have above written, relatively to Major Williamson being connected with this business.

There are many other persons named as officers in this new corps, but as it would be rather imprudent to mention them without some evidence of the fact, I forbear to send you their names.

Mr. John S. Gano, of Cincinnati, Northwestern territory, came through Kentucky, was at Lexington and Frankfort six days, and left Lexington on the 8th or 9th of April.

He says that the expedition of General Clark, to open the free navigation of the Mississippi, which had been suspended, apparently for want of money, had again revived; and it was said, owing to a supply of money which had arrived by a Frenchman, said to be a major, but whose name the informant does not recollect.

He says that the expedition had again recommenced, vigorously, their work at the rapids of the Ohio. That some persons of Kentucky, who had been appointed officers, had sold their property by auction.
That the measure of the expedition was openly advocated, and not opposed by any considerable numbers, by some did speak against it. That the President's proclamation had been received in Cincinnati, but he did not see any of them in Kentucky.

That they had provided some cannon and ammunition; and Mr. Gano was informed that they were casting more cannon at the iron works in Kentucky.

That it was understood that the inhabitants of Lexington had subscribed ammunition.

That Mr. Charles Smith, of Kentucky, informed Mr. Gano that he had actually received a commission of a major; that upon the arrival of the French major with the money, he had received orders to hold himself in readiness to receive it, at an early hour, upon the banks of the Ohio; but having more maturely reflected upon the business, he enclosed his commission to the said French major.

Extract of a letter from Major Henry Gaither, commanding the Federal troops in Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated St. Mary's, April 13, 1794.

"The French are going on with an expedition against the Floridas from this place, and appear to have many friends in this undertaking among the inhabitants of this State. There is now at anchor, within musket shot of my fort, the sloop of war Las Casas, of eighteen guns, with two hundred men, most of them French, and one company of them infantry; they are last from Charleston. They say there are thirteen sail, equally large, and well manned, yet to come from different ports in the United States. There is a recruiting post at Temple, eighteen miles up the river from this; the last accounts say they have eighty men, and expect three hundred from the upper part of this State. This armament and land force they talk of will be sufficient, they say, to take the Floridas as soon as they please. The sloop of war, on her first arrival, saluted the fort. I have not returned the salute; the captain and officers are much offended; this has caused me to begin a three gun fascine battery in front of the fort, and next the river, for my own defence. I shall be very particular with the French troops, and avoid every thing like giving offence. I don't mean to leave this until matters get better settled."

May 6, 1794.

Mr. John Holland, an inhabitant of Savannah, left that place on the 9th ult. in the sloop Harmony, Captain M'Cormack, and arrived here on the 5th of May.

This gentleman informs, that the French sloop of war Las Casas, supposed to belong to the French fleet, lately from the Chesapeake, had landed some men on the Island of Amelia, to the southward of the St. Mary's; and that they were there erecting some works, and had landed some cannon. That General Clarke was on the Georgia side of the St. Mary's with a few men; their numbers said to be various, from one hundred and fifty to three hundred, but were daily augmenting and it was supposed intended to join the French, and to take the oaths of allegiance to them, in order to invade the Floridas. Clarke was said to have provisions and ammunition. The people of Savannah strongly reproached the measure. A person, name unknown, attempted to beat up for volunteers in Savannah, but he was forced to desist, and to give bail in the federal court.

A captain of a privateer, named Curvy, also attempted to beat up, but was also obliged to give bail and desist. The Governor was daily expected in Savannah.

A Colonel Hammond from Savannah is one of the principal officers. He was of the continental troops during the late war.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 14, 1794.

Sir: By certain information, recently received from Georgia, it would appear that a General Clarke and others have organized themselves into a military corps, within the limits of the United States, and are thence about setting out upon some military expedition against the dominions of Spain, with whom we are at peace.

Any comments upon the illegality and criminality of such a conduct is entirely unnecessary to your excellency, as you have already issued your proclamation against the design.

But it may be necessary that further and more effectual measures be taken to prevent, entirely, the expedition, and bringing to punishment the authors, actors, and abettors thereof; otherwise the United States may become responsible for the consequences.

I am therefore desired by the President of the United States to request that your excellency will, if the same should be necessary, take the most energetic and decisive measures within your power for suppressing the said design. If the circumstances should require the employment of the militia, I am authorized to assure you that it may be done at the expense of the United States; and I am also directed to put under your direction the regular troops of the United States; for which purpose I have given Lieutenant Colonel Gaither the necessary orders, herein enclosed. And I have also further directed John Habersham, Esquire, the agent for furnishing the supplies in Georgia, to afford every necessary aid of provisions and quartermaster's stores, which you may require for this object.

I have the honor to be, &c. H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Lieutenant Colonel Gaither, dated May 14, 1794.

Sir: If the Governor of Georgia should call upon you to assist him with the public force under your command, for the purpose of suppressing an illegal combination of men, alleged to be organized within the United States for the purpose of invading the dominions of Spain, you are promptly and cordially to place yourself, and all the troops and military stores, under his orders, for the said purpose.
GREAT BRITAIN.  461

3d CONGRESS.]  SPOILATIONS UPON AMERICAN COMMERCE.  [1st Session.

Sir:  I now do myself the honor of transmitting to the Senate the abstract of vexations and spoliations of our commerce, which was required by their resolution of the 13th day of March last.  The volume sent will show that such a business could not be immediately completed.  Indeed, sir, I was compelled, by the burthen of business daily depending and arising in the office, to engage a gentleman of the law to assist me in preparing the abstract.

Permit me to remark that the documents which have been forwarded to me, are in many instances so imperfect as to render it impossible to make such regular statements as I wished.

I ought, at the same time, to observe, that, on the 2d day of March, 1794, when I wrote my letter to the President of the United States, the cases of complaint against the British were thirty-two; against the French, twenty-six; against the Spanish, ten; and against the Dutch, one.  The propriety, therefore, of what that letter contains, will not be determined by the great list, which has been exhibited since; nor will it be supposed that I ever have undertaken, or do now undertake, to vouch for a single fact; having made, and being able to make, no inquiry beyond the allegations of the parties interested.

The abstract would have been drawn in the first instance, had it not been intended to endeavor to settle the business by representations to the foreign courts.  Unless the Senate desire that the papers be retained here, it is probable that many of them will be sent abroad.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with very great respect, your most obedient servant.

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

[The abstract referred to in the above is not on file.]

3d CONGRESS.]  No. 98.  [1st Session.

GREAT BRITAIN.  Communicated to Congress, May 21 and May 23, 1794.

United States, May 21, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, in confidence, sundry papers, by which you will perceive the state of affairs between us and the Six Nations, and the probable cause to which it is owing.  And also, certain information, whereby it would appear that some encroachment was about to be made on our territory, by an officer and party of British troops.  Proceeding upon a supposition of the authenticity of this information, although of a private nature, I have caused the representation to be made to the British minister, a copy of which accompanies this message.

It cannot be necessary to comment upon the very serious nature of such an encroachment, nor to urge, that this new state of things suggests the propriety of placing the United States in a posture of effectual preparation for an event, which, notwithstanding the endeavors making to avert it, may, by circumstances beyond our control, be forced upon us.

G. WASHINGTON.

United States, May 23, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you the copy of a letter from the minister plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, in answer to a letter from the Secretary of State, communicated to Congress yesterday; and also the copy of a letter from the Secretary, which is referred to in the above mentioned letter of the minister.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Hammond.

Philadelpia, May 20, 1794.

Sir:  It cannot be unknown to you, that a speech, said to be addressed on the 10th of February, 1794, to several Indian nations, and ascribed to the Governor General of His Britannic Majesty at Quebec, has appeared in most of the public prints in the United States.  With so many circumstances of authenticity, after remaining so long without contradiction, it might have justified us in inquiring from you, whether it was really delivered under British authority.  Our forbearance thus to inquire is conformable with the moderation which has directed the conduct of our Government towards Great Britain, and indicates at the same time our hope, from the declarations of yours, that its views would prove ultimately pacific, and that it would discomfitence every measure of its officers, having a contrary tendency.

Even now, sir, while I entertain a firm persuasion that, in assuming this speech to be genuine, I cannot well err, I shall be ready to retrace the comments which I am about to make, if you shall think proper to deny its authenticity.  At the very moment when the British ministry were forwarding assurances of good will, does Lord Dorchester foster and encourage in the Indians hostile dispositions towards the United States?  If it was a part of the American character to indulge suspicion, what might not be conjectured as to the influence by which our treaty was defeated in the last year, from the assembling of deputies from almost all the nations, who were at the late general council on the Miami, and whose enmity against us cannot be doubtful?  How nearly would that suspicion approach to proof, were we to recollect that so high an officer as himself would not rashly hazard this expression: "I should not be surprised if we are at war with the United States in the course of the present year; and if we are, a line must then be drawn by the warriors."

But this speech only forebodes hostility: the intelligence which has been received this morning is, if true, hostility itself.  The President of the United States has understood, through channels of real confidence, that Governor Simcoe has gone to the foot of the rapids of the Miami, followed by three companies of a British regiment, in order to build a fort there.

I permit me then to ask, whether these things be so?  It has been usual for each party to a negotiation, to pay such a deference to the pretensions of the other, as to keep their affairs in the same posture, until the negotiation was concluded.  On this principle, you complained, in your letter of the 5th of July, 1792, of the jurisdiction attempted to be exercised under the State of Vermont, within the districts occupied by the troops of your King; and demanded the same arrangement should be made, in respect to the districts which we have agreed to occupy, as was made with your predecessor, which you were assured that proper measures should be adopted. On the same principle you renew, on the 10th of March, 1794, a similar application; and are assured that the measures of the Government should correspond with its assurances. Accordingly, although the forts, garrisons, and districts, to which your letters relate, are confessedly within the limits of the United States, yet your citizens have been, and still are, forbidden to take possession of them. What return then have we a right to expect?

But you will not suppose that I put the impropriety of the present application upon the pendency of the negotiation. I quote this only to show the contrast between the temper observed on your part towards us, and on our part towards our predecessor in all precedents of the kind. The right and the discretion that the British government have is, to suppress this hostile movement; to remonstrate, it is an act, the hostility of which cannot be palliated by any connexion with that negotiation; it is calculated to support an enemy whom we are seeking to bring to peace.

Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty.

Sir,

In answer to your letter of the 20th current, which I did not receive until late in the afternoon of yesterday, it is necessary to state to you, that it may be my personal opinion with respect to the style and manner in which you have thought proper to address me upon this occasion, and the manner of proceeding in your proposals, that you have thought proper to address me upon this occasion, and in your style of proceeding in your proposals, I have thought it proper to address you upon this occasion, and to request you to proceed with temper and candour to the examination of the subject of your letter. Though I never can acknowledge the right of this Government to require from me, so categorically as you have requested, the removal of any measures taken from the assistance of the British garrisons, which you consider to be beyond my control, and for whose conduct I am responsible. I am willing to admit the authenticity of the speech to certain Indian nations, to which you have alluded, and which you have ascribed to the Governor General of His Majesty's possessions in North America. But in order to ascertain the precise sense of the only passage of that speech to which you have referred, and at which you have given merely a partial citation, I shall quote the passage at length.

"CHILDREN: Since my return I find no appearance of a line remains, and from the manner in which the people of the States push on, and act, and talk on this side, and from what I learn of their conduct towards the sea, I shall not be surprised if we are at war with them in the course of the present year; and if so, a line must then be drawn by private or public adventurers."

From the context of this whole passage, it is manifest that Lord Dorchester was persuaded that the aggression which might eventually lead to a state of hostility, had proceeded from the United States. And so far as the State of Vermont, to which I presume, his lordship principally alluded, was implicated, I am convinced that that persuasion was not ill founded. For, notwithstanding the positive assurances which I received from your predecessor, on the 9th of July, 1794, in answer to my letter of the 28th of the same month, of the determination of the General Government to discourage and repress the encroachments which the State and individuals of Vermont had committed on the territory occupied by His Majesty's garrisons, I assert with confidence, that not only those encroachments have been in any manner repressed, but that recent infringements in that quarter, and on the territory in its vicinity, have been strictly suppressed. In fact it has been intimated to me, by a public official, of the Indian Department, that the Government, would I remark that, though the space of fifty days elapsed between my letter of the 10th of March, 1794, upon this subject, and your answer of the 29th of April, 1794, you did not attempt to deny the facts which I then stated, and that you consider them as established.

In regard to your declaration that "Governor Simcoe has gone to the foot of the rapids of the Miami, followed by three companies of a British regiment, in order to build a fort there," I have no intelligence that such an event has actually occurred. But even admitting your information to be accurate, much will depend on the place in which you intend to build the fort, and the parties you select to found it from. And I am under the impression that His Majesty's government, or the officers, are so very anxious to avoid the approach of the American army. To either of which cases, I imagine that the principle of the status quo, until the final arrangement of the points in discussion between the two nations shall be concluded, will strictly apply.

In order, however, to correct any inaccurate information you may have received, or to avoid any ambiguity relative to this circumstance, I shall immediately transmit copies of your letter, and of this answer, as well to the Governor General of His Majesty's possessions in North America, and the Governor of Upper Canada, as to His Majesty's ministers in England, for their respective information.

Before I conclude this letter, I must be permitted to observe, that I have confined to the unprepared and continued aggressions of the State of Vermont alone, the persuasion of Lord Dorchester which they were indicative of an existing hostile disposition in the United States against Great Britain, and might ultimately produce an actual state of war, upon the principle of which his lordship has based his views of the conduct of this Government toward the sea. But even admitting this would be of no advantage to the British government, and of no force in law to the conduct of this Government toward the sea, the conduct of this Government toward the sea, it may be advantageously considered as a "contrast between the temper observed on your part towards us, and the temper observed on our part towards you."

I might have adverted to the rights made by those privates, of which the legality was in some measure admitted by the British Government, and the conduct of this Government to restore to Canada the forts and posts which has not been so strictly adhered to by the States. I might have adverted to the permission granted by this Government to the commanders of French ships of war and of privates, to dispose of their prizes by sale in ports of the United States, to the two private vessels, that had been fitted out at Charleston, at the commencement of the present hostilities, and which were allowed to depart from that port, not only with the consent, but under the express permission of the Governor of South Carolina, I might have adverted to the prizes made by those privates, of which the legality was in some measure admitted by the British Government, and the conduct of this Government to restore to Canada the forts and posts which has not been so strictly adhered to by the States. insult which has been recently offered at Newport, Rhode Island, not by a lawless collection of the people, but by the Governor and Council of that State, to the British flag, in the violent measures pursued towards His Majesty's sloop of war Nautilus, and in the forcible detention of the officers by whom she was commanded. I have, however, borne to expiate upon these points, because I am not disposed to consider them, as I have before stated, as necessary elucidations of the immediate object of your letter, and much less to urge them in their present form as general topics of recrimination.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GEO. HAMMOND.

The Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Hammond.

Philadelphia, April 29th, 1794.

Sir:

Very soon after the receipt of your letter of the 10th ultimo, I took more than one opportunity of mentioning to you verbally, that the Government of the United States was sincere and constant in its determination to fulfill its assurances concerning the districts occupied by the British troops, and the acts of violence said to be committed under the authority of the State of Vermont, on the persons and property of British subjects residing under the protection of your garrisons. I indeed promised to give you an answer in writing at an earlier day than this. But being anxious to obtain particular information from a gentleman, who was in town, well acquainted with the places to which you refer, and from some accident not being able as yet to lay my hands upon the letter of Mr. Jefferson to you, on the 9th of July, 1792, I was hopeful that my personal declarations to you would continue to receive such full confidence as to afford sufficient opportunity for the most particular inquiry. But being disappointed in seeing that gentleman, I think it best to answer your letter without further delay.

I have it in charge from the President of the United States again to assure you, that his purpose to cultivate harmony with your nation, and to prevent the measures of which you complain in the above letter, continues unchanged. Orders will be therefore immediately repeated upon this head, to repress the violence which you state, and they shall be accompanied with an injunction to use against the refractors every coercion which the laws will permit. We have received no intelligence of the particular facts to which you refer. But, to prevent all unnecessary cir-

In these measures, sir, you will see a real disposition in us to friendship and good neighborhood; and I shall be justified by your own recollection, when I claim the merit of our having been uniform in the same demonstrations.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain.

SPAIN.

Communicated to Congress, May 26, 1794.

United States, 26th May, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The commissioners of His Catholic Majesty having communicated to the Secretary of State the form of a certificate, without which, the vessels of the United States cannot be admitted into the ports of Spain, I think it proper to lay it before Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

Form of a certificate which is required, in order that the produce of the United States may be admitted into the ports of Spain, to wit:

Before me, &c. personally came —— of the city of ——, merchant and citizen, who being duly sworn according to law, on his solemn oath doth depose and say, that the cargo here shipped by him in the ship ——, whereof —— is master, now bound from this port of ——, for ——, in Spain, to wit: ——, are of the growth or produce of the United States of America, (which I the said notary or magistrate also attest) and that no part thereof are of the produce of France or her colonies, nor have the same, or any part thereof, received any advantage or improvement in France, or any of its dependencies, nor in any manner contributed to its revenues, and the said depo-

nent further says, that the said cargo so shipped is the sole property of him, the deponent, and that they are citizens of the United States of America, and resident merchant of the said city of ——.

Sworn as above, before me, ——. In testimony whereof, and that the said goods are of the produce or manufacture of the said United States of America, and that I am well informed that the said shipment is bona fide intended for the port of ——, in the kingdom of Spain, I, the said magistrate and notary, have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my notarial seal, the day and year above written.

FRANCE.

Communicated to the Senate, May 27, 1794.

United States, May 27, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The Executive Provisory Council of the French republic having requested me to recall Gouverneur Morris, our minister plenipotentiary in France, I have thought proper, in pursuance of that request, to recall him. I therefore nominate James Monroe, of Virginia, as minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the said republic.

G. WASHINGTON.
Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before Congress the copy of a letter, with its enclosure, from the Secretary of State to the minister plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty; it being an answer to a letter from the minister to him, bearing date the 29th ultimo, and already communicated.

G. Washington.

No. 101.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 4, 1794.

United States, 4th June 1794.

SIR: The letter which you honored me on the 29d ult. had not entered into a train of recrimination against the United States, I should not now trouble you with a return to its unpleasant topics. Among the reasons which would have induced me to add nothing to my letter of the 1st of the last month, it would have been of some weight, that, by silence, I should avoid the repetition of a style and manner, which seem to have produced a personal excitement.

As you are willing to admit the authenticity of Lord Dorchester's speech, we will, with your approbation, reserve, for a future discussion, on what occasion, and to what degree, an explanation may be required by the Government of the United States from a plenipotentiary.

I selected only one passage of that speech, because, in it, was centered the real object of the whole; which was to declare an expectation that Great Britain would be at war with the United States in the course of the present year, and, if she were, to cause the warriors to draw a line. This is the undisguised sense of the Governor General, unaffected by the preliminary words which you have not proper to quote. It is your own interpretation. For, so far are you from contradicting my assertion, that Lord Dorchester fostered and encouraged in the Indians hostile dispositions towards us, that you confine the greater part of your remaining observations to vindicate his persuasion and your own, that the principal aggression, leading to hostility, proceeded from the United States, and to suggest many others of the same tendency, upon which you would not dilate.

I shall not shrink, sir, from your charges.

1st. Notwithstanding the territory upon which certain inhabitants of Vermont are represented, in your letter of the 5th inst. you have attached to the transactions with the United States, yet, on the 9th of the same month, did my predecessor give you, as is admitted, positive assurances of the determination to discourage and repress the subject of your complaint. The necessary instructions were, accordingly, forwarded to that State. On examining your correspondence with our Department, it does not appear, that, from the 9th of July, 1792, to the 10th of March, 1794, upwards of nineteen months, our Government ever understood, from yourself or any authority of His Britannic Majesty, that the original dissatisfaction continued. Nor was any dissentient heard from that quarter through other channels, except what related to outrages upon our own citizens by British subjects. Then, indeed, thirty days after the hostile tribes of Indians had been assembled by Lord Dorchester, at Quebec, you renew your remonstrances.

Although it cannot be, by any means, believed, that this was written in order to usher in their intelligence, which soon after arrived, of his speech, yet it is difficult to account for so long an interval, under the circumstances supposed. Nor ought my answer, although delayed for fifty days, until the 5th of April, 1794, to be construed into an assent to any charge, since, at the end of that period, having been disappointed, as my letter shows, in one opportunity of information, and no other presenting itself, we were not in a capacity of contradicting your assertions. However, sir, the instructions issued in consequence of your application, conveyed positive orders for the correction of what, upon examination, should be found irregular.

Among the points to which, you intimate, that you might have adverted, is enumerated the fitting out of two privateers, at Charleston, in South Carolina. Whatever this transaction might have been, it probably occurred at the commencement of the war, and before the existence of the war was communicated to our Government, by your predecessor, Mr.头部. Had he a transaction been known to the President, in time, you would have judged, from his actual conduct, what he would then have done on that occasion, on the 22d of April, 1793; his call to the State Governors, on the 5th of the same month, to co-operate with him in the work of impartiality and peace; the system of rules which he established, and which were imparted to your prisoners: are unerring indications of the spirit of the measures on which he had directed his influence. He supersedes, in this particular case, to the ends of condemnation on captures; he restored several vessels to British owners; prosecutions have been instituted against the violators of neutrality; in a word, sir, what has been required, under the sanction of the laws of nations, which has not been fulfilled?

How many things have been spontaneously done, to evince our impartiality? Let me request you to review my predecessor's letters to you, of April 22d, May 12, June 5, August 7, 8, 22, September 5 and 12, 1793, and to say if more could be well expected from us? After such demonstrations, it might have been hoped that the equipment of these two privateers would not rise again in the shape of a change. But the letter of the 3d of June, being conceived of itself to be satisfactory, is here inserted:

"In the letter which I had the honor of writing you on the 15th of May, in answer to your several memorials of the 8th of that month, I mentioned that the President reserved for further consideration, a part of the one which related to the equipment of two privateers in the part of Charleston. The part alluded to was that wherein you express your confidence that the Executive Government of the United States would pursue measures for repressing such practices in future, and for restoring to their rightful owners any captures which such privateers might bring into the ports of the United States.

The President, after a full investigation of this subject, and the most mature consideration, has charged me to communicate to you, that the first part of this application is found to be just, and that effectual measures are taken for preventing repetitions of the act therein complained of; but that the latter part, desiring restitution of the prizes, is understood to be inconsistent with the rules which govern such cases, and would, therefore, be unjustifiable towards the other party.

The principal agents in this transaction were French citizens. Being within the United States, at the moment a war broke out between their own and another country, they determine to go in its defences; they purchase, arm, and equip a vessel, with their own money, man it themselves, receive a regular commission from their nation, depart out of the United States, and, by the 17th of April, 1793, and then commence hostilities by capturing a vessel. If, under these circumstances, the commission is not valid, by the law of war, or by the law of nations, they are agents of the privateers, and it would be an aggression on their nation, for the United States to rescue it from them, whether on the high seas, or on coming into their ports. If the commission was not valid, and consequently the property not transferred by the laws of war to the captors, then the case would have been cognizable in our courts of admiralty, and the owners might have gone thither for redress. So that on neither supposition would the Executive be justifiable in interfering.

With respect to the United States, the transaction can in no wise be imputed to them. It was in the first moment of the war, in one of their most distant ports, before measures could be provided by the Government to meet all the cases which such a state of things was to produce—impossible to have been known, and, therefore, impossible to have been prevented by that Government.

The moment it was known, the most energetic orders were sent to every State and port in the Union to prevent a premature departure. The 6th of the month, upon which the President was designated, was instantly committed to prison for prosecution; one or two others have been since named, and committed in like manner; and should it appear that there were still others, no measures will be spared to bring them to justice. The President has even gone further. He has required, as a reparation of their breach of respect to the laws of the land, that such persons shall disgorge themselves.

You will see, sir, in these proceedings of the President, unequivocal proofs of the line of strict right which he means to pursue. The measures now mentioned are taken in justice to the one party; the ulterior measure of seizing and restoring the prizes is declined, in justice to the other; and the evil, thus early arrested, will be of very limited extent. Indeed, if contrary, it is the unparalleled instance of the rule of law.

As to the permission from the Governor of South Carolina, for the departure of those privateers from port, you may assure yourself of a proper inquiry; and I take the liberty of requesting any evidence which you may have of it.

3d. With so many direct proofs in your hands of the opinion constantly maintained by our Government against the doctrine of privateering, it is certain, sir, that no plan can be more improper, than before the 5th of June, 1793, should be argued from a refusal to restore them. The above recited letter of that date neither affirms nor disaffirms their validity; but declines the granting of restitution, as being inconsistent with the rules which govern in such cases. These rules are, that, if the commission be good, the capture is good; if the commission be bad, but whether it be good or bad, is not decided; it being enough to prove, by the nature of the transaction, for the reasons assigned, can in no wise be imputed to the United States. But, if captures of this kind, prior to the 5th of June, 1793, do really amount (as is conceived by some) to no very considerable value, this would, of course, dispose of the reward.

4th. The Secretary of War has undertaken to ascertain the precise state of the privateers le Petit Démocrate, and le Carmagnole, and the result will be communicated to you. In the mean time, it is a matter of some surprise, that vessels, whose single employment and profit must consist in cruising on the ocean, should have remained in the port of Newport, during the whole winter, and have been permitted to continue a freedom to sell, the next requisite to the law of nations, which was scrupulously searched by the Executive, with the pure desire of discovering truth and justice to all. Upon this, as on many other occasions, the civilians differ—Vattel declaring that a privateer commanded by the President is lawful to sell his prizes needed, if it has not been otherwise regulated by treaty; and others opposing it. In this schism among writers, it was an occasion for the President of the United States, to impose no restraint upon those sales; and to refer them, as affairs of legislation, to Congress, at the earliest moment of their session. Thus much has been observed, not as my final answer, but merely to induce an assurance that I will follow you in the main discussion, whenever you shall bring it forward in detail.

5th. Undoubtedly, sir, you have been misinformed, that the vessels of France have been permitted to depart from our ports, notwithstanding the embargo. As the history of the Executive proceedings is neither long nor entangled, it shall be frankly stated to you. As soon as the embargo was laid, expressives and advice boats were despatched to notify the officers of the customs and revenue cutters, and all others concerned in its execution. The resolution imposing it involved all foreign nations; the instructions from the President of the United States favored the French cruisers, as a warlike, while the general objects of the President were to establish New Castle, on her voyage, was stopped by an officer of the United States; and the President, adhering to perfect impartiality, could not think himself justified to gratify the minister of the French republic with a passport. Passports being kept under the special view of the President, were issued only after his examination of each case, and passports were never granted among them. If you have seen any of the Napier orders, allow me to direct your attention to an agent, who was sent to the West Indies, upon a business connected with the late captures and condemnations in various British courts of admiralty; one to a citizen, whose vessel was under trial in Bermuda, and who was anxious to forward the British instructions of the 8th of January, 1794, with a hope of rescuing her from confiscation; one to the friends of the Parners of Jamaica; twenty for the accommodation of several unpunished inhabitants of St. Domingo; and to some of whom our Government was advancing money for their support, and who could no longer endure their separation from home; one to some other persons in peculiar circumstances, desirous of returning to the West Indies. The French, after a series of other passports, without permission, the embargo has been relaxed, it was unauthorized by the President, and unlawful. The distance of Hampton Roads from this city, being more than three hundred miles, the officers of Government, resident here, could not learn at the moment what was passing there. No intelligence of an official nature, or of any real importance, has reached us from Boston, or elsewhere. If the President has required us to possess the information, I ask it as a favor of you to designate who granted the permission, and under what circumstances the French vessels left that road? An investigation, however, has been, and shall be, pursued, on our part, without delay. If the law has been violated, it shall be vindicated; but a violation of law is very remote from a permission of the Government.

6th. The uniformly unfriendly treatment, which the British officers are said to have experienced in the United States, cannot be answered until it shall be more explicitly defined. Did this treatment break forth in words or actions, not cognizable by law? If so, no complaints can be offered to Government. Or in words or actions, which were so cognizable? Our courts are free to foreigners against citizens, and independent of influence. To yourself let me appeal, that on the representations which you thought proper to lay before the President, in relation to the British consul at Baltimore, the British consul at Norfolk, and the commander of the Dextrous frigate, the necessary measures were not transmitted to another, and none returned. Nor was the Government backward in its interference in the late affair at Philadelphia. And these being the only occurrences of the kind in my knowledge, I trust that no example can be produced of Government refusing to enforce the laws, even against every such case.

7th. The events at Newport, in Rhode Island, are accurately detailed in the proceedings which I have the honor of enclosing to you. Within the limits of the present letter, I cannot do more; as it might be an useless task to detain me with my remarks, when none of them might be adapted to the animadversions which you meditate. It is enough, therefore, for me to engage, that these animadversions, whenever they shall appear, shall receive particular attention.

Although, sir, your charges against the United States are sketched only, the impressions, which may have been intended, cannot be counteracted too soon, by such extra generalizations as, at a future day, may be more minutely unfolded. By the existing conduct of the United States, one might be led to think they were desirous of alarming the world, and to be ultimately to produce a state of war? This is not the place for us to retract our complaints. But compare them with the whole of your catalogue, and say, what may our feelings be? Yet we prefer peace.

Your present direction to be more a favor to the Indians against us is without justification, as the very expulsion of Governor Simcoe without pretext.

That you have received no intelligence of such an event having actually occurred, leaves room to conjecture that you may possibly have been without intelligence of it having been designed; and that it has therefore probably taken place. But you insist that you are not for the first time informed; but that all is perfectly unknown; the place is, for our immediate purposes, adequately marked out, by being on that river. A single glance of the eye over the map proves that its source is within the limits of the United States. In its whole length it is a marked line by our territory. Its very mouth is to the southward of our line, as recognized by our treaty with His Britannic Majesty. On no part, therefore, of the rapids, can a fort be built, but within our country.
This being fixed, your argument is, that, if the fort be for the purpose of protecting subjects of His Majesty, residing in districts dependent upon the fort of Detroit, or of preventing that fortress from being straitened by the approach of the American army, the principle of sta.tus quo, until the final arrangement of the point in discussion between the two countries shall be concluded, will strictly apply.

I conceive there is no movement of a nature concerning which a treaty is opened, not being consonant with a spirit of adjustment, the principle of status quo has been generally adopted. The nearest point of the rapids to Detroit cannot be less than thirty miles. They have never been considered—they never could be considered, as appendages to Detroit. But you proceed and say, that the proposed assumption of territory may depend on a question between the two nations with respect to a point in the United States, becomes the first station from which a district, still further in, may arise, and that from this district another district may be generated, one encroachment may beget anot.her ad infinitum. It will, however, be objected, that this is not a matter of controversy, but is, how much of our territory towards the Mississippi being wholly occupied by the military establishment of Detroit at the time of the peace. I mention the military establishment, because, if any subjects of His Britannic Majesty reside beyond the line of actual possession, they are, as being within our limits, under our jurisdiction.

That prevents the fortress of Detroit from being straitened by the approach of the American army, is either a new modification of the preceding idea, or founded upon an untenable suspicion. For the question must recur, are the rapids an appendage to Detroit? Were they connected with it at the peace? If convenience, only, were to be considered, and a wide range of unsettled territory, by being divided into the momentary circumstances of one nation, is an argument for peace or for war; whether, or whether not the concession of the rapids to Detroit. If right be consulted, our right is complete. Is rea.« then our territory to be thus seized? Nay, more, sir, I am authorized to say to you, explicitly, that the American army has no instructions to straiten or annul any part of the territory. If present consent to the rapids was dictated by this consideration, it ought to be discontinued, as being without cause. I have the honor, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty.

Sir: Providence, May 19, 1794.

Agreedly to the request of the General Assembly, I enclose you a report of the Justices of the Superior Court of this State, and of the District Judge of Rhode Island, respecting certain Americans detained on board a British vessel, and the story of war.

The moderation which accompanied the determined resolution of the Legislature in the progress of this business, with the accomplishment of the release of our fellow-citizens, gave universal satisfaction.

I also enclose an account of the supplies granted the Nauitis, that it may be known they were limited to the necessary supplies for carrying her to her destined port, and were not agreeable to our treaty with France.

I am, sir, &c.

EDMUND RANDOLPH, Esq. Secretary of State.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, &c. In General Assembly, May Session, A. D. 1794.

The following report was made to this Assembly, to wit:

A statement of facts in the case of the six American sailors illegally detained on board of His Britannic Majesty's ship of war the Nauitis, H. W. Baynton, commander.

On the 8th day of May, A. D. 1794, the said ship arrived in the harbor or port of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations: on the same day, the commander of said ship made application to the General Assembly of said State, then in session at said Newport, for liberty to purchase supplies of provisions for the people on board of her. The General Assembly immediately took the application into consideration, and, during the progress of that business, they were informed that there were thirteen American citizens detained on board said ship, in consideration of their consent, three of which had been pressed in the West Indies; and that great anxiety was occasioned thereby in the minds of the people. The General Assembly immediately proceeded to measures for investigating the facts: sent a message to Capt. Baynton, then on shore, requesting his attendance before them: The captain immediately attended; with his chief officers, to the General Assembly, and was questioned by the judges of the district court, to confer with said officers on the subject, to inform them of the information they had received, of the unreasonableness thereof, and of their expectation that, if there were any American citizens on board their ship, they might be immediately released; and if not released, to demand the ship, and the discharge of the American so detained. The judges accordingly met the said officers in the council chamber where the said officers, with the British vice consul, Mr. Moore, who attended them, were waiting, upon the request of the General Assembly. The judges informed them of the information which had been obtained, in order to satisfy themselves of the facts. The captain declared there were none on board of that description, at least within his knowledge, and so declared the lieutenant; that he did not choose to take such seamen on board; that he had never pressed such; and requested their names. The judges told him they were not able to give their names: he appeared altogether to doubt the fact; herewith, John Carr, gunner of the said ship, was called upon, who, on solemn oath, declared, that he informed one of the ship's large men if there were any Americans on board of said ship, who answered that there were thirteen, ten of which had voluntarily entered on board, and that the three others had been pressed. The captain still appeared to disbelieve the matter: it was then proposed to him, that he might satisfy himself and the authority, by permitting a gentleman or two, with himself or lieutenant, to go on board, and there to make the necessary inquiry, that if there should be American citizens on board, it was presumed he would not hesitate to discharge them; if there were none, the public mind would be at ease, and mutual confidence would be restored. He agreed to the proposition, and the three cases of men, first an American consul, viz.: the ship to be searched, he withdrew his assent, and declared he would by no means consent to the proposition. Much argument was used to convince him of the propriety of it, or that he ought to point out some way to come to the truth, but to no purpose; he thought his word sufficient. It was observed to him that it was impossible he could believe to the satisfaction of the themselves or of their own people, and it was not probable he could be certain of the fact. He said he would not say so positively, but he was very confident there were none such, and that the information was groundless. It was observed to him, he must be sensible that that kind of argument would give no satis-factory answer to the question: he was rather disposed to look towards him with the utmost candor, and that he would exhibit the same; it was highly reasonable that the authority should be satisfied; it was presumed that the British Government would, under a like occasion, show the same solicitude for the relief of their subjects, and were possessed of sufficient spirit to obtain entire satisfaction; the propriety of it, would be expected he would be entitled to the necessity? But it was still wished he would be induced to obviate that necessity by a ready compliance with the proposition, or by proposing something equally satisfactory. He replied he could do nothing further, was surprised at being thus called upon this business, asked if he was a prisoner, and if he was to be going out of the room: it was said he was not; but to remain to consider the matter. He then consented to have the ship searched, and to be present at the time. He was permitted to leave the room to the officers with the caution, that, as much had been said, he might further deliberate on the matter, and consult what might conduci most to a fair and just settlement of the business. This was refused; and the captain and his lieutenant both, against the advice of the judges, burst out of the room, but instantly returned, declaring they were stopped by the people in the lobby, who were there in great numbers, and they were under apprehensions of danger. The lieutenant said he was kicked; it was asked him with earnestness, "was you kicked?" he said "no, but what was next to it, he was jaw'd up:" they were desired to be composed, and to sit down; that it was wished they had taken advice for while with the judges they should be protected. The captain again declared he could not comply with the proposal made, or give further satisfaction than he had, as to the Americans said to be on board his ship. Information was then given to the General Assembly of the proceedings thus far, when they passed the following resolution:

Lower House of Assembly,
May 8, 1794.

Whereas complaint hath been made to this Assembly that sundry citizens of the United States are illegally detained on board of a certain sloop of war, called the Nautilus, belonging unto His Britannic Majesty, commanded by H. W. Baynton, now riding at anchor in the road of Newport within this State: It is hereby voted and resolved, that the said Captain H. W. Baynton, and the lieutenant of said sloop of war, who are now on shore, remain there until investigation of the subject of said complaint be made, and the judicial authority of this State and district, To effect which purpose, it is further voted and resolved, That, on condition the said H. W. Baynton consent thereto, Messrs. Henry Sherburne, John L. Boss, Samuel Wardwell, Christopher Ellery, and William Davis, be a committee from this Assembly, to go on board the said sloop of war, with Mr. Thomas W. Moore, vice consul of His Britannic Majesty for the district of Rhode Island, and request of the commanding officer now on board said sloop of war, an examination of the crew thereof, and report to the judicial authority of this State and district, the names of any citizens of the said United States there detained as aforesaid: and that the said judicial authority take examination of the birth and residence of such citizens, and enlarge those who, on such examination, are found to be citizens of any of the said United States.

Voted, &c. SAMUEL EDDY, Clerk.

In the Upper House.

Read the same day and concurred.

By order:
HENRY WARD, Secretary.

The officers were informed of this resolution, and a conversation more cool and candid soon after took place; and the captain agreed that the gentlemen mentioned in the foregoing act of the General Assembly might go on board his ship. The captain agreed to go with them, and the captain sent a letter (which he first showed to the judges, to the commanding officer on board, directing him to give those gentlemen all the satisfaction in his power, as to there being any Americans on board. Those gentlemen proceeded on board, and were received with the utmost politeness; the books and lists of the men were shown, the people called upon to declare whether there were then any Americans unwilling to remain on board; six appeared, as by the following copy, taken by the committee, from the shipping book itself, and by their own declaration, to be Americans:

John M'CCarthy, Martha's Vineyard, entry June 27, 1793.
John Johnson, Charleston, South Carolina, entry December 17, 1793.
Nicholas Martin, Boston, entry February 16, 1794.
Anthony Dwyer, Georgetown, South Carolina, entry June 14, 1793.
William Brown, Portsmouth, Virginia, entry December 2, 1793.
William Denning, New City, New York, entry April, 1794.

N. B. The entries appeared to be made by some officer of the ship, and no signature of the sailors.

The above is a true copy of the extract from the books of the sloop Nautilus, belonging to His Britannic Majesty, now riding in the harbor of Newport, by the subscribers, who were appointed by the Honorable General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, a committee, for the purpose of determining the number of Americans on board said sloop, and which was reported on the 8th day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, to the said honorable body, by

HENRY SHERBUNER,
JOHN L. BOSS,
SAMUEL WARDWELL,
CHRISTOPHER ELLERY,
WILLIAM DAVIS.

The captain immediately declared that he was surprised; that four of them he now believed were Americans, but he was, however, willing the six should be brought on shore; and as many as were Americans he would immediately discharge. His large boat went again on board with his written orders, as follows:

"DEAR MR. PINNARIENTY:

Send the six men on shore to be examined, immediately.

Yours, &c.

John M'Carty,
Nicholas Martin.
John Johnson,
Anthony Dwyer.

Mr. Thomas to come on shore to take care of the boat, and not leave her."

The six sailors were soon brought on shore; the officers were convinced that they were all Americans, and the captain agreed that they might go where they pleased; and that, in the morning, he would send their clothing on shore, give them written discharges, and certificates for their wages; and the consul freely offered to take them, and give the sailors the money for them: whereupon entire good humor appeared fully restored, and the officers, with the consul, retired. In the morning the captain sent an officer on shore, who fully completed the business, agreeably to the captain's agreement.

The certificates were in the following form:

These are to certify the honorable the principal officers and commissioners of His Majesty's navy, that Samuel Brown served as able seaman on board His Majesty's sloop Nautilus, under my command, from the 2d day of December, 1793, to the date hereof, when he was discharged—he being a subject of the United States of America; and the sum of one thousand pounds eleven shillings and eight pence, Navy slops, Beds, Tobacco, £1 19 10

£2 18 8

Wages due, £3 2 8

Given under my hand, on board the said sloop, at Newport, Rhode Island, the 9th day of May, 1794.

H. W. BAYNONT.
The whole amount of the wages due to the sailors, as adjusted by the captain, and agreed to by the sailors, was £39 9s. 1d. sterling.

The foregoing statement, made by the request of the General Assembly, is humbly submitted by the judges of the superior court, and the judge of the district court.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, &c. In General Assembly, May Session, A. D. 1794.

Upon the application of H. W. Baynton, commander of the British sloop of war the Nautilus, for permission to purchase the necessary supplies to enable him to proceed to the port to which he is bound,

_It is voted and resolved_, That his Excellency the Governor cause the said ship to be supplied with four or five thousand pounds of bread, five hundred and sixty pounds of fresh beef and veal, and one hundred and fifty pair of shoes, with such precautions, and under such directions, as he shall think proper.

3d CONGRESS.] No. 102. [1st Session.

FRANCE.

REPORTED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 6, 1794.

Mr. King, from the committee to which was referred the bill, entitled "An act providing for the payment of a certain sum of money due to the French republic," submitted the following report:

It appears by a statement of the account between the United States and France, reported to the House of Representatives, that, according to the view which is entertained at the treasury of that account, the United States, on the 1st day of January, 1794, were in advance to France the sum of two millions one hundred and eleven thousand and eighty-six livres tournois and five deniers, (being three hundred and eighty-three thousand one hundred and sixty-two dollars and thirteen cents) beyond the instalments of principal, and all interest which had accrued to that period.

It further appears, upon inquiry at the treasury, that, since that period, there has been advanced, on account of our debt to France, the further sum of seventy-one thousand two hundred and forty-two dollars and eighty-one cents.

And it appears, likewise, from the papers referred to the committee, that the President has promised further payments upon the same account, of one million five hundred thousand livres, on the 3d of September next, and of one million of livres on the 5th of November next, making together four hundred and fifty-three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars; which payments, it is understood, may be anticipated at the Bank of the United States, in the proportions and at the epochs which are desired by the minister of the French republic.

These sums embrace all the parts of principal which by contract would become payable to France during the year 1794, beyond which, were there no anticipations, nothing would be demandable during the present year, but the interest on the balance of the entire debt, which balance, on the 1st day of January, 1794, is computed at the treasury at two millions six hundred and eleven thousand five hundred and eighty-seven dollars and eighty-eight cents; whence it results, that the payments which have been made, and engaged to be made, exceed those which, by the terms of contract, could be demanded.

This being the case, and the loan in question having been in its origin specifically appropriated to the purpose of the sinking fund, it is the opinion of the committee that it is not advisable to divert it from its destination, as is proposed by the bill referred to them, and consequently, that the bill should not pass.
Gentlemen of the Senate:

In the negotiation between the United States and his Catholic Majesty, I have received satisfactory proofs of attention and ability, exerted in behalf of the United States, to bring it to a happy and speedy issue. But it is probable that, by complying with an intimation made to the Secretary of State by the commissioners of His Catholic Majesty, much further delay in concluding it may be prevented. Notwithstanding, therefore, I retain full confidence in my minister resident at Madrid, who is charged with powers as commissioner plenipotentiary, I nominate Thomas Pinckney to be envoy extraordinary of the United States to his Catholic Majesty, for the purpose of negotiating, of and concerning the navigation of the river Mississippi, and such other matters relative to the confines of their territories, and the intercourse to be had thereon, as the mutual interests and general harmony of neighboring and friendly nations require should be precisely adjusted and regulated, and of and concerning the general commerce between the said United States and the kingdoms and dominions of his said Catholic Majesty.

It is believed that, by his temporary absence from London, in the discharge of these new functions, no injury will arise to the United States.

G. WASHINGTON.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE, SPAIN, PORTUGAL, MOROCCO, AND ALGIERS.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In my first communication to Congress, during their present session, I gave them reason to expect that "certain circumstances of our intercourse with foreign nations" would be transmitted to them. There was at that time every assurance for believing that some of the most important of our foreign affairs would have been concluded, and others considerably matured, before they should rise. But, notwithstanding I have waited until this moment, it has so happened that, either from causes unknown to me, or from events which could not be controlled, I am yet unable to execute my original intention. That I may, however, fulfill the expectation given, as far as the actual situation of things will, in my judgment, permit, I now, in confidence, lay before Congress the following general statement:

Our minister near the French republic has urged compensation for the injuries which our commerce has sustained from captures by French cruisers, from the nonfulfillment of the contracts of the agents of that republic with our citizens, and from the embargo at Bordeaux. He has also pressed an allowance for the money voted by Congress for relieving the inhabitants of St. Domingo. It affords me the highest pleasure to inform Congress that perfect harmony reigns between the two republics, and that those claims are in a train of being discussed with candor, and of being amicably adjusted.

So much of our relation to Great Britain may depend upon the result of our late negotiations in London, that, until that result shall arrive, I cannot undertake to make any communication upon this subject.

After the negotiation with Spain had been long depending, unusual and unexpected embarrassments were raised to interrupt its progress. But the commissioner of His Catholic Majesty near the United States having declared to the Secretary of State, that, if a particular accommodation should be made in the conducting of the business, no further delay would cause, I thought proper, under all circumstances, to send to His Catholic Majesty an envoy extraordinary, specially charged to bring to a conclusion the discussions which have been formerly announced to Congress.

The friendship of Her Most Faithful Majesty has been often manifested in checking the passage of the Algerine corsairs into the Atlantic Ocean. She has also furnished occasional convoys to the vessels of the United States, even when bound to other ports than her own. We may, therefore, promise ourselves, that as, in the ordinary course of things, few causes can exist for dissatisfaction between the United States and Portugal, so the temper with which accidental difficulties will be met on each side will speedily remove them.

Between the Executive of the United States and the Government of the United Netherlands but little intercourse has taken place during the last year. It may be acceptable to Congress to learn that our credit in Holland is represented as standing upon the most respectable footing.

Upon the death of the late Emperor of Morocco, an agent was despatched to renew with his successor the treaty which the United States had made with him. The agent unfortunately died, after he had reached Europe, in the prosecution of his mission. But, until lately, it was impossible to determine, with any degree of probability, who of the competitors for that empire would be ultimately fixed in the supreme power. Although the measures which have been since adopted for the renewal of the treaty have been obstructed by the disturbed situation of Amsterdam, there are good grounds for presuming, as yet, upon the pacific disposition of the Emperor in fact towards the United States, and that the past injustice will be shortly remedied.

Congress are already acquainted with the failure of the lean attempted in Holland for the relief of our unhappy fellow-citizens in Algiers. This subject, than which none deserves a more affectionate zeal, has constantly commanded my best exertions. I am happy, therefore, in being able to say, that, from the last authentic accounts, the Dey was disposed to treat for a peace and ransom, and that both would in all probability have been accomplished, had we not been disappointed in the means. Nothing which depends upon the Executive shall be left undone, for carrying into immediate effect the supplementary act of Congress.

BARBARY STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 2, 1795.

United States, March 2d, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

It appears from the information which I have lately received, that it may be probably necessary to the more successful conduct of our affairs on the coast of Barbary, that one consul should reside in Morocco, another in Algiers, and a third in Tunis, or Tripoli. As no appointment for these offices will be accepted without some document annexed, I submit to the consideration of Congress whether it may not be advisable to authorize a stipend to be allowed to two consuls for that coast, in addition to the one already existing.

No. 106.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 8, 1795.

United States, June 8th, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In pursuance of my nomination of John Jay, as Envoy Extraordinary to His Britannic Majesty, on the 16th day of April, 1794, and of the advice and consent of the Senate thereto, on the 19th, a negotiation was opened in London. On the 7th of March, 1795, the treaty resulting therefrom was delivered to the Secretary of State. I now transmit to the Senate that treaty, and other documents connected with it. They will, therefore, in their wisdom decide whether they will advise and consent that the said treaty be made between the United States and His Britannic Majesty.

G. WASHINGTON.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To John Jay, greeting:

Reposing especial trust and confidence in your integrity, prudence, and ability, I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint, you, the said John Jay, Envoy Extraordinary from the United States of America to the Court of His Britannic Majesty, authorizing you hereby to do and perform all such matters and things as to the said place or office doth appertain, or as may be duly given you in charge hereafter, and the said office to hold and exercise during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Philadelphia, the nineteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and of the independence of the United States of America the eighteenth.

By the President:

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND:

Being desirous of confirming, between your Majesty and the United States of America, perfect harmony and a good correspondence, and of removing all grounds of dissatisfaction by a friendly discussion, I have made choice of John Jay, Chief Justice of the United States, to repair to your Majesty, in the quality of their Envoy Extraordinary. From a knowledge of his fidelity, probity, and good conduct, I have entire confidence that he will render himself acceptable to your Majesty, and will contribute, to the utmost of his power, to preserve and advance, on all occasions, the interest and happiness of the two nations. I beseech your Majesty, therefore, to give full confidence to whatever he shall say to you on the part of the United States, and, most of all, when he shall assure you of their friendship and wishes for your prosperity. And I pray God to have your Majesty in his safe and holy keeping.

Written at Philadelphia, this fifth day of May, in the year of our Lord 1794.

By the President:

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

MADAM OUR GOOD FRIEND:

I have named John Jay, Chief Justice of the United States of America, Envoy Extraordinary to your royal consort. My knowledge of his good qualities gives me full confidence that he will so conduct himself as to merit your esteem. I pray, therefore, that you yield entire credence to the assurances which he will bear to you of our friendship and that God may always have you, madam, our good friend, in his holy keeping.

Written at Philadelphia, this sixth day of May, in the year of our Lord 1794.

G. WASHINGTON.

By the President:

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Instructions to Mr. Jay.

Philadelphia, May 6, 1794.

SIR:—The mission upon which you are about to enter, as envoy extraordinary to the court of London, has been dictated by considerations of an interesting and pressing nature.

You will doubtless avail yourself of the opportunity to convince Mr. Pinckney, our minister in ordinary there, of the necessity of this measure, and will thus prevent any wound to his sensibility. He may be assured that it is the impression, which will naturally accompany this demonstration of the public sentiment, and not the slightest abatement of confidence in him, which has recommended a special appointment; nor will any of his usual functions be suspended, except so far as they may be embraced in the present establishment.

It would be unnecessary to add, for the sake of manifesting this fact, and removing difficulties which may arise in your own breast, that you will communicate with him without reserve.

It is well known that, throughout the whole negotiation, you will make the following its general objects: To keep alive in the mind of the British minister that opinion which the solemnity of a special mission must naturally inspire, of the strong agitation excited in the people of the United States, by the disturbed condition of things between them and Great Britain; to repel, for which we are not disposed, and into which the necessity of perfecting, out of our property, which can peacefully be restored on war, from carrying with them the British nation; and, at the same time, to assert, with dignity and firmness, our rights, and our title to reparation for past injuries.

One of the causes of your mission being the vexations and spoliations committed on our commerce by the authority of the British Government, you will receive from the Secretary of State the following documents: viz, the instructions of the 8th of June, 1793, 6th of November, 1793, and 8th of January, 1794; the Secretary of State's letter to Mr. Pinckney, on the 7th of September, 1793; Mr. Hammond's letter to the Secretary of State, on the 10th of September, 1793; Mr. Pinckney's note and memorial to Lord Grenville; Mr. Hammond's second letter to the Secretary of State, on the 11th of April, 1791; the Secretary of State's answer on the 1st Inst., a list and sketch of the cases upon which complaints have been made to our Government; and the instructions given to N. C. Higgenson, who has been lately sent as agent to the British Islands in the West Indies.

These several papers develop the source of our discontent on this head; the representations which have been offered; the answers which have been rendered; and the situation of the business at this moment.

You will perceive that one of the principles, upon which compensation is demanded for the injuries under the instructions of the 8th of June, 1793, is, that provisions, except in the instance of a siege, blockade, or investment, are only to be considered as incidents of a country remote as the United States are from Europe and its troubles, it will be of infinite advantage to obtain the establishment of this doctrine.

Upon the instructions of the 6th of November, 1793, Mr. Pinckney has made a representation, and perhaps a memorial, to the Lord of the Admiralty of England until the 26th, the 27th, and the 30th of November, 1793, in consequence of a private notification of them, a considerable number of new privatists were fitted out; the terms of "legal adjudications," in the cases of the United States, being that of the 21st of January, 1793, was most probably intended to be construed away or not, according to events; and many vessels have been condemned under them.

Compensation for all the injuries sustained, and captures, will be strenuously pressed by you. The documents which the agent in the West Indies is directed to transmit to London will place these matters in the proper legal train, to be heard on appeal. It cannot be doubted that the British ministry will insist that, before we complain to them, their tribunals, in the last resort, must have refused justice. This is true in general; but peculiarities distinguish the present from past cases. Where the error complained of consists solely in the misapplication of the law, it may be corrected by a superior court; but where the error consists in the law itself, it can be corrected only by the law maker, who, in this instance, was the King, or it must be compensated by the Government. The principle, therefore, may be discussed and settled without delay; and, even if you should be told to wait until the result of the appeals shall appear, it may be safely said to be almost certain that one judgment in the West Indies will be confirmed; and this will be sufficiently to bring the principle in question with the British ministry.

Should the principle be adjusted, as we wish and have a right to expect, it may be advisable to employ some person to examine the proper offices in London, for such vessels as may have been originally tried or appealed upon, and finally condemned. You will also reserve an opportunity for new claims, of which we may all be ignorant for the present, but which we should be resolved to examine and put in the United States in British courts. As far as the negligence of the British Government in the matter of the commissions and the non-payment of the rewards due to them may be attended to, by demanding compensation for the agricultural produce of the negroes, you will be able to show, in the British courts, which are of a superior, to what extent the violation of the law has been committed.

Whatever matters shall be brought to such a point as that nothing remains for settlement but the items of compensation, this may be entrusted to our skillful and confidential agent whom you may appoint.

You will mention, with due stress, the general irritation of the United States in consequence of the vexations, spoliations, captures, &c. And being on the field of negotiation you will be more able to judge, than can be prescribed now, how far you can state the difficulty which may occur in restraining the violence of some of our 가능한 citizens.

If the British Government could predict the success of your mission, in the United States, the British ministry, as warranting the whole or any part of these instructions, you will stop the progress of this subject, as being irrelevent to the question in hand. It is a circumstance which the British nation have no right to object to us; because we are free in our actions, and independent in our government. But it may be safely answered, upon the authority of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Hammond, that our neutrality has been scrupulously observed.

The second cause of your mission, but not inferior in dignity to the preceding, though subsequent in order, is to draw to a conclusion all points of difference between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the treaty of peace.

You will therefore be furnished with copies of the negotiation upon the inexcusable and infractions of that treaty, and will resume that business. Except in this negotiation, you have been personally conversant with the whole of the transactions connected with the treaty of peace. You were a minister at its formation, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs when the sentiments of the Congress, under the confederation, were announced through your office; and as Chief Justice you have been witness to what has passed in our courts, and know the real state of our laws, with respect to British debts. It will be superfluous, therefore, to add more to you, than to express a wish that these debts, and all others occasioned by the war, may be paid at once, and to express also a wish that everyourt which you cannot distinguish, being certainly of a judicial nature, to be decided by our courts; and if this cannot be accomplished, that you support the doctrines of Government with arguments proper for the occasion, and with that attention to your former public station, which will always actuate you without relaxing the pretensions which have been hitherto maintained.

In this negotiation as to the treaty of peace, we have been amused by transferring the discussions concerning its inelegance and infractions from one side of the Atlantic to the other. In the mean time, one of the consequences of holding the posts has been much bloodshed on our frontiers by the Indians, and much expense. The British Government has avowed, in a public communication, that they have, without allowing the British agents to have satisfaction, or to satisfy the Indian tribes, who would not listen to them. But we have satisfactory proofs, (of some which, however, cannot, as you will discover, be well used in public) that British agents are guilty of stirring up, and assisting with arms, ammunition, and warlike implements, the different tribes of Indians against us. It is incumbent upon that Government to restrain those agents; or the forbearance to restrain them cannot be considered as a determination, or as a determination to counsele them. It is a principle from which the United States will not easily depart, either in their conduct towards other nations, or what they expect from them, that the Indians dwelling within the territories of one shall not be intermixed with by the other.

It may be observed here, as comprehending both of the foregoing points, that the United States testify their sincere love of peace, by being nearly in a state of war, and yet anxious to obviate absolute war by friendly advances; and if the desire of Great Britain to be in harmony with the United States be equally sincere, she will readily discover what kind of sensations will at length arise, when their trade is plundered; their resources wasted in an impolitic manner; and the United States are at the same time those of Great Britain enforced in our courts. But you will consider the inelegance and infraction of the treaty as standing on distinct grounds from the vexations and spoliations: so that no adjustment of the former is to be influenced by the latter.

II. It is referred to your discretion whether, in case the two preceding points should be so accommodated as to promise the continuance of tranquillity between the United States and Great Britain, the subject of a commercial treaty may not be listened to by you, or even broken to the British minister. If it should, let these be the general objects:

1st. Reciprocity in navigation, particularly to the West Indies and even to the East Indies.
2d. The admission of wheat, fish, salt meat, and other great staples, upon the same footing with the admission of the great British staples in our ports.
3d. Free ships to make free goods.
4th. Security for the safety of neutral commerce in other respects; and particularly,
   By declaring provisions never to be contraband, except in the strongest possible case, as the blockade of a port, or, if attainable, by abolishing contraband altogether;
   By protecting our neutral commerce in some degree, as it is defined in the armed neutrality;
   By respecting the opportunities of vaxation in visiting vessels;' and
   By bringing under stricter management privateers; and expediting recoveries against them for misconduct.
5th. Exemption of emigrants, and particularly manufacturers, from restraint.
6th. The exclusion of the terms "the most favored nation," as being productive of embarrassment.
7th. The convey of merchant ships by the public ships of war, where it shall be necessary, and they being the same.
8th. It is anxiously to be desired, that the fishing grounds now engrossed by the British should be opened to the citizens of the United States.
9th. The intercourse with England makes it necessary that the disabilities, arising from alienage in cases of inheritance, be abolished, or, at least, that the laws which make alienage except in the case of a title by descent be abolished.
10th. You may discuss the sale of prizes in our ports while we are neutral; and this perhaps may be added to the considerations which we have to give, besides those of reciprocity.
11th. Proper shelter, defence, and succor, against pirates, shipwreck, &c.
12th. Security for the retiring of the citizens of the United States from the British dominions, in case a war should break out.
13th. No private commissions to be taken out by the subjects of the one, or citizens of the other party, against each other.
14th. No public commissions to be admitted in Europe, the West and East Indies.
15th. In case of an Indian war, none but the usual supplies in peace shall be furnished.
16th. In peace, no troops to be kept within a limited distance from the Lakes.
17th. No invasion whatever is to interfere with our obligations to France.
18th. A treaty is not to continue beyond fifteen years.

IV. This presentation generally gives the objects which it is desirable to comprise in a commercial treaty; not that it is expected that one can be effected with so great a latitude of advantages:

If to the actual footing of our commerce and navigation in the British European dominions could be added the privilege of carrying directly from the United States to British Dominions, in our own bottoms generally, or of certain enumerated articles, besides the articles which, by the act of Parliament, 29 Geo. III. c. 6, may be carried by British bottoms, and of bringing from thence, directly to the United States, in our bottoms, of like description, the articles which, by the same act, may be brought from thence to the United States in British bottoms, this would afford an ample basis of treaty for a term not exceeding fifteen years; and it would be advisable to conclude a treaty upon that basis. But such a treaty, instead of the usual clause concerning ratification, must contain the following: "This treaty shall be obligatory and conclusive, when the same shall be ratified by his Britannic Majesty the one part, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of the other."

But if a treaty of commerce cannot be formed upon a basis as advantageous as this, you are not to conclude or sign any such; it being conceived that it would not be expedient to do any thing more than to digest with the British ministers the principles of such a treaty as they appear willing to accede to referring them here for consideration and further instruction previous to a formal conclusion.

Some of the other points, which it would be interesting to comprehend in a treaty, may not be attended with difficulty. The principle of such a treaty as they appear willing to accede to, is the freedom of our commodities and manufactures, generally, into the British European dominions, upon a footing equally good with the same commodities going to other foreign countries. At present, certain enumerated articles only are admitted; and though the enumeration embraces all the articles which it is of present consequence to us to be able to export to those dominions, yet in process of time an extension of the objects may become of moment.

The British ministers, the British East Indies Company, by toleration of the company's government, if any arrangement can be made, with the consent of the company, for that purpose, would be also a valuable ingredient.

V. There will be no difficulty in gaining access to the ministers of Russia, Denmark, and Sweden, at the court of London. The principles of the armed neutrality would abundantly cover our neutral rights. If they be disposed to enter into a stipulation of things with respect to Great Britain which should dictate the necessity of taking the precaution of foreign cooperation upon this head; if no prospect of accommodation should be thwarted by the danger of such a measure being known to the British court; and if an entire view of all our political relations shall, in your judgment, permit the step, you will sound those ministers of a probability with their nations to support these principles.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, May 27, 1794.

SIR:—The embargo ceased the day before yesterday; and the William Penn, being the first ship from this port destined to London, will bear my despatches.

It was not to demonstrate our anxiety for the success of your mission, it would be scarcely worth mentioning a circumstance which you will doubtless have ascertained before that part of your instructions relative to Sweden is executed. But it is to show the countenance we have given to the most earnest solicitations, not only of the Dutch, but those of the British minister, at his request, at our urgent desire and with the consent of the Government of France, which, with the three other special, in order that you may be prepared to exhibit your authority altogether, or by detachment, as may be most convenient. Copies of Lord Dorchester's speech to the Indians, the authenticity of which, though not absolutely ascertained, is believed; and of certain affidavits respecting the British interference with our Indians; and a cipher. Your expenses will be paid, together with the allowance of thirteen hundred and fifty dollars per annum for a Secretary.

On your return, you will be pleased to deliver into the Secretary of State's office, such papers as you may possess of importance sufficient to be filed there; and will prepare a general report of all your transactions.

Not doubting you will effectually use the means in your power, I assure you, and salutary, and upon any interesting occasion which may demand it. For the latter of these purposes, you will avail yourself of Mr. Pinckney's ciphers.

You are too well acquainted with the nature of the great functions which you are called to execute, to render it necessary for me to add the earnest wish of the President of the United States that your communications to the Secretary of State should be frequent and full; and that you should correspond with us upon any interesting occasion which may demand it. For the latter of these purposes, you will avail yourself of Mr. Pinckney's ciphers.

You are too well acquainted with the nature of the great functions which you are called to execute, to render it necessary for me to add the earnest wish of the President of the United States that your communications to the Secretary of State should be frequent and full; and that you should correspond with us upon any interesting occasion which may demand it. For the latter of these purposes, you will avail yourself of Mr. Pinckney's ciphers.

EMMUND RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.
GREAT BRITAIN.

while, I enclose to you the proceedings at Newport, in Rhode Island, which involve too much delicacy to be delayed in the communication. But all these events, proceeding, as they do, from a state of inflammation, which the British Government has it in their power to extinguish, manifest the necessity of an immediate adjustment of our disputes.

To prove that we do not suffer the French to take any liberty, not consistent with their duty to us, as neutrals, I beg leave to refer to the publications of our measures in Kentucky, South Carolina, and Georgia.

We take it for granted that the nature of the subject, the opinions expressed to the President, the instructions which were delivered to you, and, indeed, your own judgment and inclination, rendered it unnecessary to use any very pointed prohibition of a surrender of the posts, or any part of our territory, to Great Britain, upon any consideration. The interesting magnitude of the business will, therefore, be my apology for mentioning the decided and irrevocable sense of the President, relative to this affair.

You will be pleased to communicate this letter to Mr. Pinckney; and to be assured that I am, sir, with truth and sincerity, your obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, May 29, 1794.

It will be out of my power to send, by the William Penn, any other of the documents, mentioned in my letter of yesterday, than those which relate to the British spoliations; (in a box) copies from the War Office, respecting Lord Dorchester's and Governor Simcoe's movements; copies of Mr. Hammond's correspondence with me upon this subject; and copies of what has been published by the House of Representatives concerning the expeditions meditated against the Spanish dominions. The other papers will be expedited by the George Barclay, which will sail to-morrow for London.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with sincere respect, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, May 29, 1794.

The remaining papers, referred to in the letter which I had the honor of writing to you yesterday, are here enclosed, according to the list. From No. 1 to No. 25, inclusive, you will find an explication of what relates to the British consul at Baltimore, the British consul at Norfolk, Sir C. H. Knowles, and the Bermudian privateer. From No. 26 to No. 39, inclusive, the affair of the Swift Packet, and the supposed insult to the British officers, are stated. No. 36 contains the despatches against the State of Rhode Island. No. 37 is no further important than to show the sense of Mr. Hammond, while he was in good temper, of the actual civility of our conduct towards him.

I forward by this conveyance, to Mr. Pinckney, some papers relative to a claim of Maryland, for stock in the Bank of England. That State conceives this matter to have been sacrificed by some decree of the Chanceller of Great Britain from forensic jurisdiction, and to be now converted into a diplomatic question. How far this may be the case, I pretend not to determine; but should it be so, and effectual aid can be given to Mr. Pinckney by your intervention, or it can be reasonably mixed with your mission, the President wishes you to take the subject up.

In the box sent yesterday, are my letters, newspapers, and the publications respecting Lord Dorchester's speech, Governor Simcoe's movements, and the expeditions meditated against the Spanish dominions. The publications are now repeated to Mr. Pinckney.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with great and sincere respect, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, June 8, 1794.

I do myself the honor of referring you to my letters of the 27th, 28th, and 29th of the last month, and the papers forwarded with them. By the Atlantic, from this port, will go another bundle of spoliations, according to the list sent, and my answer to Mr. Hammond's letter of the 32d ultimo.

We have not yet received any very authentic documents from Martinique but, if we are to believe a report, which circulates here upon good foundation, the system of plunder, persecution, and cruelty, adopted by Admiral Jervis, after acquiring possession of the island, is unknown in the history of any warfare towards a neutral nation. It is said that, before a vessel could be claimed by the citizens of the United States in the court of admiralty, the captain was obliged to give security to the amount of sixty johannes to answer the costs; that, condemnation being general, this sum was an addition to their loss; that prison-ships are open for the reception of the Americans and that multitudes are crowded in them. So much depends upon your mission, that, if it should be unsuccessful, contrary to the wish of your friends, and the friends to peace, I know not how the general irritation can be checked.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with great respect and esteem, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, June 9, 1794.

Since the writing of my letter yesterday, I have received from Mr. Pinckney the case of the snow Sukey, and from the eastward, that of the brigantine Maria. I beg leave to add these to the long list already in your hands, and to assure you of the great respect and esteem with which I have the honor, sir, to be,

Your most obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 1.

FALMOUTH, June 9, 1794.

I landed here last evening, and immediately informed Lord Grenville and Mr. Pinckney of my arrival, by letters which went by the post last night.

In the course of this day I expect to set out for London, from whence I promise myself the honor of writing to you again very speedily. This letter will be committed to the care of Captain Blair, who will sail next week for Philadelphia. Be so obliging as to forward the enclosed.

I shall request Mr. Fox, our counsel here, to send you some of the latest public papers. As yet I have not had time to read any of them; but am told they mention several interesting events.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

JOHN JAY.

P. S. Mr. Fox, our counsel, informs me that his commission is to Richard Fox, instead of Robert Wore Fox, which is his name: he wishes that another commission may be issued accordingly.
Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 2.
LONDON, June 32d, 1794.

Sir: I had the honor to write to you a few lines at Falmouth, on the 9th instant, mentioning my having arrived there the preceding evening: that letter was committed to the care of our consul, Mr. Fox. He expected to forward it by the Active, Captain Blair, who was soon to sail for Philadelphia, but whose departure has been unexpectedly protracted to this time.

On the 15th I arrived here, and the same day mentioned it by letter to Lord Grenville. He appointed the 18th for my reception, and I then communicated to him my first commission, and left with him a copy of it. This was a visit of ceremony, and nothing passed between us, relative to the objects of my mission. The next day I sent him copies of my letters of credence.

On the 20th I had an interview with him by his appointment, and communicated to him my general power, of which I have since sent him a copy. Much general conversation took place, and the principal topics were touched upon. His lordship did not commit himself on any point; he heard me very patiently, and politely. He promised to appear the next day for another conference, and I should then have been able to procure sentiments favorable to his character and manners.

If this disposition be hostile, he conceals it admirably. What will be the decision of the court, I will not venture even to conjecture. As yet, I have no reason to be dissatisfied, or to consider appearances as being unfavourable. No delays, or arts to procrastinate, have been practised.

It is to be wished that no intelligence of an irritating nature may arrive from America. I do not regard preparations for war as of that nature. They ought not, in my opinion, to be neglected or delayed in the most profound state of peace. I shall not omit any opportunity of giving you such information as will enable you to see precisely the state of the negotiation, and shall endeavor to avoid deceiving you, or myself, by delusive hopes or groundless fears.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 3.
LONDON, June 26, 1794.

Sir: Since my last, the minister has appointed to-morrow for a conference with me. Captain Allen waits for my letter. Nothing new has occurred: appearances continue favorable.

Yours, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 4.
LONDON, July 6, 1794.

Sir: The letters which, since my arrival, I have had the honor of writing to you, are as follows: 9th June, at Falmouth, left with our consul there to transmit by the Active, Captain Blair, for Philadelphia; and the 23d June, by Mr. Francis, of which I also sent a duplicate by the Mohawk, Captain Allen, to New York, and 29th June, by the same.

On the 27th June, I had a conference with Lord Grenville, in the course of which all the topics of difference between the two nations were touched. This conference I considered as intended for more particular discussions. It amounted, however, only to a friendly and informal conversation on these subjects. He appeared to be liberal, candid, and temperate, but did not commit himself, or say anything decisive on any point. He observed that he wished first to inform of the extent of our views and objects, and that a consultation with the rest of the King's ministers would be necessary to enable him to be more explicit. This appeared to me to be perfectly fair and proper.

In conversing on the subject of captures and spoliations, I was surprised that not a single case, under the instructions of November, had been laid before him. He requested me to furnish him with some of the strongest of those cases, and remarked that an accurate knowledge of facts was so peculiar a measurement to his character, that he said, very frankly, that there might be such a state of things as to render the interposition of Government proper and necessary, to satisfy justice; and that he was desirous of having such exact information as would enable him to judge whether, and how far, the captures in question were under that predicament. On applying to Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Jay, I found that no such cases had been transmitted to him; and I told him I was impressed with the opinion, and that in cases of so much dignity, the information of gentlemen from Boston, has furnished me with the case of the Charlotte, decided at Antigua, and from which decision an appeal was made. It unfortunately happens, that this is not among the strongest of those cases. Mr. Crafts took the opinion of counsel on the subject, that opinion is as follows:

"The Charlotte, Coffin.—Appeal from Antigua.

Dr. Nicholl is requested to peruse the proceedings and evidence contained in the process herewith left, and advise whether it is expedient for the claimants to prosecute this appeal. I have perused the proceedings and evidence contained in the process transmitted by you, and it appears that the cargo of this ship, being the produce of the French West India colonies, and coming directly thence to France, was considered as liable to confiscation, although it should be the property of Americans.

"1 In the war before the last, Great Britain condemned neutral vessels and their cargoes, trading to the French islands, upon the ground that the trade was not permitted in time of peace, and that the permission was given by the French during the duration of war; and to protect their property against British capture; which occasional precaution, neutral nations were held to have no right to afford them. In the last war, neutral vessels trading to the French islands were not condemned, but the former principle was not thereby considered to be abrogated. As much as the French were cautious in permitting the commerce of neutrals. No such step (as far as I am informed) was taken by the French, previous to the present hostilities; and, as the Americans and other neutrals were not permitted, before the war, to purchase the produce of the French islands, and carry it in their own vessels thence to France, and, as the instructions of the 8th January, 1794, (revoking those of 6th November, 1792) still direct the seizure of "all vessels, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods, the produce of the French West India islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands, to any port in Europe," I should apprehend that the sentence of condemnation will be affirmed. However, it being understood, that a negotiation between Great Britain and America is now pending, in which it is probable that many of this trade will undergo some discussion and settlement, it will, at all events, be expedient, on the part of the appellants, so far to proceed, as to preserve his right of bringing the sentence to a revision; more especially as no decision of the court, on this point has yet taken place by the lords of appeal; but the expediency of finally bringing the cause to a hearing may depend upon the result of the pending negotiation, or upon some decision to be given by the appellate court.

"July 7, 1794.

The list of captures with which I was furnished does not state the principles or pretexts on which the condemnations mentioned in it were grounded, and consequently is of little use on the present occasion. The case of Marston Watson, which I received from you before my departure, is a very strong one; but then it asserts only the expectation, but not the certainty of condemnation.

J. NICHELL.
No despatches from Mr. Higginson (of whose instructions I have a copy) have as yet reached me. Those instructions are, in my opinion, well devised and if as well executed, will furnish me with all the information which it has become so requisite.

On the 3d of this month I was, in the usual form, presented to the King, and the next day to the Queen. The reception I received from them both was affable and satisfactory, and perfectly calculated to create an opinion of the good will of this Government to the United States. The King seemed to be well prepared for the occasion. He expressed his confidence in the assurances I gave him of the disposition of the United States to cultivate peace and harmony. He intimated (but without any direct application) that it was expedient for all nations who respected order, good government, morality, and religion, to be friends. On this topic he expressed many general sentiments that were liberal and proper. He repeated that the United States, from various facts, time only can decide; they certainly afford some, though not conclusive evidence, of a friendly disposition.

By the arrival of the William Penn, your late correspondence with Mr. Hammond became known to the public. What impression it has made on the Government here, I have not as yet been able to judge. In the conduct of this negotiation, I shall proceed with as much expedition as prudence will permit. It appears to me expedient to be guided by occasions and circumstances, and to give every conciliatory application a fair experiment. Conceiving it to be advisable to afford the minister an opportunity of increasing the evidence of a friendly disposition, I prepared a letter to him, which, after having well considered, I sent to him the next day. It is in these words, viz.

"PALL MALL, ROYAL HOTEL, July 2, 1794.

"MY LORD:"

"Such various and important affairs must necessarily demand and employ your time and attention, that I really feel a reluctance to add to their number; and yet, circumstances as I am, and circumstances as my country is, I find myself irresistibly impelled to submit to your Lordship’s consideration, the expediency of my being authorized to convey to the President (by the vessels which sail next week) such assurances as may tend to compose his and the public mind in America.

"I can find but few authenticated cases of the captures in questions, which have as yet arrived here, and they shall be proper last or your lordship. Would it not, for the present, consist with your ideas on that subject to say, that if these captures, on being investigated, should appear to be of such extent and magnitude as to merit the attention and interposition of Government, that then, &c. &c.?

"Would it not also be right and proper to open the door for appeals, and to instruct His Majesty’s officers in America to communicate to him, by wire conduct, that friendship and mutual good will which the Governments of both countries desire to establish and perpetuate? Delay is often hazardous. Pardon my anxiety, lest new difficulties should arise—to prevent, is generally more easy than to remedy.

"I cannot conclude this letter, without expressing to your lordship how sensibly I feel, and am gratified, by the friendly and harmonious conduct that His Majesty and neutral good will which the Governments of both countries desire to establish and perpetuate. I have been honored by their Majesties, and the magnanimity of the sentiments which the King condescended to express on the occasion.

"It is my duty, and I shall perform it with the most cordial satisfaction, to make known to the President these pleasing circumstances: they perfectly harmonize with the liberality and candor, and with the obliging attentions I have experienced from your lordship; and if these representations should be accompanied with corresponding official assurances, a promising foundation would be laid for the establishment and duration of that friendship and cordiality between our two countries, which I pray God may speedily take place, and become perpetual.

"With very sincere respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, your lordship’s, &c."

J. J.

"P. S. As yet I have received no official letters by the late arrivals from America.

"The Right Hon. Lord Grenville, one of His Majesty’s Principal Secretaries of State," &c. &c.

To this letter I have not as yet received an answer, nor did I expect one so early. You will readily perceive, that, before it can be answered, the administration will probably think it necessary to decide on their line of conduct towards our country. Whatever the answer may be, it will unavoidably contain indications, either of evasion, or suspicion, or that the present situation of the country and liberal conduct with which the government will be, I cannot predict. As yet I have every reason to be satisfied, and it is but just and right that I should say it without reserve.

I shall persevere in my endeavors to acquire the confidence and esteem of the Government, not by improper compliances, but by that sincerity, candor, truth, and prudence, which, in my opinion, will always prove to be more winning, more durable, and less offensive than false and pretentious harmony.

Formal discussions of disputed points should, in my judgment, be postponed until the case becomes desperate. My present object is to accommodate, rather than to convict or convince. Men who sign their names to arguments seldom return them.

If, however, my present plan should fail, and I am far from being certain that it will not, I shall then prepare and present such formal, and, at the same time, such temperate and firm representations as may be necessary to place the claims and conduct of the two Governments in their proper points of view.

On the 9th of July I received the following letter from Mr. Henry Wadell, viz:

"JULY 5, 1794.

"SIR: By the advice of Thomas Pinckney, Esq. I have called upon you to state the particulars of the capture and detention of the American ship Amsterdam Packet, but not having the honor of a personal interview, permit me to do it in this way.

"The American ship Amsterdam Packet, (Henry Wadell, master) of New York, owned by Messrs. Daniel Ludlow & Co. laden with sugar, cotton, coffee, pot and pearl ashes, oil, and tobacco, left said port on the 28th of September last, bound for the port of Havre-de-Grace; but, on the 29th November following, was forcibly taken by the privateers of the United States, under the command of Captain or Princess Elizabeth cutter, and carried into Liverpool, where the vessel, as well as cargo, are still detained, without any other reason assigned than that the captors say they are indemnified by the order of the 5th November, (which I doubt you are acquainted with) and for which she must wait the adjudication. It is now seven months since the vessel was taken, and if we have to wait our turn for the adjudication of the admiralty court, it will be three or four years more before we can hope for a release. Any services rendered by you will be thankfully acknowledged by, sir, &c. &c.

"HENRY WADDELL.

I immediately sent it to Lord Grenville, enclosed in the following letter, viz:

"PALL MALL, July 5, 1794.

"MY LORD: I am persuaded your sensibility will be hurt by the delay mentioned in the enclosed letter from Mr. Wadell. The impressions which it must naturally make, even on the most liberal minds, are to be regretted. It will be sensibly felt by the owner, whose nearest connections have, to my knowledge, done and suffered much from their attachment to this country.

"I forbear to add any thing, accept sincere assurances of the respect and esteem with which I have the honor to be, &c. &c. &c.

"The Right Hon. Lord Grenville, &c. &c.

J. J."
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

This letter needs no comment: it will probably lead the minister to observe that all descriptions of persons amongst us are affected by the injuries of which we complain, and will naturally participate in the sentiments which those injuries cannot fail to excite. It is for the sake of this idea that I mention the transaction, which, in other respects, may not be deemed of sufficient importance to find a place in this letter.

I have many respec[ible and influential characters here, and] from their sentiments and conversation, there certainly is reason to believe that war with us would be an unpopular measure, provided nothing should occur to fix the imputation of aggression on us.

In a late conversation with certain persons attached to the administration, and of weight in that scale, the general conduct of our Government received the most unreserved approbation, and the character of the President was spoken of in the highest respect.

I have not heard that Carleton’s speech or Simcoe’s interference were defended by any body. As yet I have neither heard nor seen anything that looks like a hostile disposition in the mass of this nation towards ours, but the contrary.

The desig[ns may be, or have been, in the cabinet, is another matter. Information of that kind is not readily acquired, but I shall not be inattentive to it. Men are prone to suspect, sometimes, too much, and sometimes too little, to avoid both extremes is more proper than it is easy.

On the subject of the affairs committed to me, I have nothing further to add at present.

I have received a letter from Mr. Bourne, which, together with my answer to it, should, I think, be communicated to you. They are as follows, viz:

"AMSTERDAM, June 27, 1794.

"Sir: I am made happy by the opportunity of tendering to you my congratulations on your safe arrival in Europe, which I beg you to accept of, accompanied with my cordial wishes for the success of your mission, as involving the most important interests of our country.

"I am sorry to observe that the conduct of this Government of late (though perhaps more equivocal than that which has been pursued by Great Britain) must operate as a very serious injury to the commerce of America. In the face of express stipulation of treaty, they have prohibited us from taking away nearly all the articles for which we have a demand, and many others, unless on condition of giving heavy bonds that they shall be landed in America, or, rather, not in France. To short, such are the troubles and vexations which burthen our intercourse with them, that our vessels are generally obliged to depart in ballast.

"We have no friend or assistant here, clothed with public authority, to whom we can resort for advice or protection on the points alluded to; but should it be within the latitude of your powers to remonstrate, I doubt not the issue would be favorable.

"Persuaded that you will not ask an apology for what has been prompted by a sense of duty to my country, I forbear to make one for the trouble I give you by this communication, and pray you to be assured of those sentiments of profound respect and esteem with which I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

"S. BORNE.

"LONDON, July 8, 1794.

"Sir: I have been favored with yours of the 27th of last month; accept my thanks for the friendly congratulations contained in it.

"That the President may be informed of the facts you mention, I shall take the liberty of transmitting a copy of my letter to the Secretary of State.

"Not being within the limits of my commission, I cannot with propriety interfere by making any representations on these subjects. With the wishes for your health and happiness, I am, sir, &c. &c.

"SYLVANUS BORNE, Esq. Amsterdam. J. J."}

July 8, 1794. Nothing new has occurred since the foregoing letter was written.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, July 9, 1794.

Sir: The object of this letter is singly to meet some violent representations which have probably been hurled to Great Britain from Bermuda, that their impression might be free to operate for some time without contradiction. For it is a lamentable thing to believe, with too much reason, that, in general, the agents of Great Britain in America are gratified when they can cast a distant suspicion upon our neutrality. I cannot forbear to remark how singular it is, that the Governor of Bermuda has not forwarded to Mr. Hammond any of the proofs which are said to be possessed by him and that Mr. Hammond has imparted the little which he knew, only on a special application, as if both the one and the other were afraid of enabling us to vindicate our character.

During the existence of our embargo, Mr. Hammond obtained a passport for his despatches to London, by the way of Halifax. A similar privilege being requested by Mr. Fauchet for Port au Prince, a passport was granted, with an express injunction that the vessel, which was caused L’Aimable, or L’Aimable Gentille, should proceed in ballast. We never heard more of her, until, on the 30th ult., intelligence arrived of her having been captured with one hundred and fifty barrels of powder, and may perhaps be different letters and documents, displaying the whole of our conduct up to this day. If, before this letter is put on board of the vessel which is to carry it, any thing else shall occur, it will be added. If not, be assured that you may, with the utmost confidence, declare, that we will not relinquish the investigation until we procure all the proof in our power, and whatsoever punishment the laws in any particular case may impose, shall be inflicted. I can hardly suppose that the British ministry, after such manifestations of our sincerity, will be hastily caught by appearances. No law prohibited the exportation of powder, the resolution of embargo excepted, at the time of the sailing of L’Aimable; and to suspect that Government would, if inclined to aid the French resistance to the combined Powers, resort so petty a manoeuvre, would look strongly like a preconcerted plan. Government disclaims the idea.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with sincere esteem and respect, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 5.

LONDON, 9th July, 1794.

Sir: On the 6th inst I had the honor of writing you a long and particular letter; it was closed yesterday by a postscript informing you that nothing new had occurred.

This morning I received, by the post from Dover, a letter which I suppose was there put into the office from an American vessel lately arrived. I presume it was from your office; it contained a copy of the acts passed during the late session of Congress, but no letter was enclosed with it.

The events which gave occasion to your late correspondence with Mr. Hammond, and the expiration of the embargo, are circumstances which rendered me solicitous to receive from you official accounts of them, as in that case
I might have made them the subjects of an interesting and perhaps useful communication to the minister. Doubts of the propriety of grounding it on newspaper evidence, and the daily expectation of receiving letters from you, which might contain not only information but instructions, have induced me to decline writing or saying anything official- ly on those subjects. I suspect that your letters are still on the way, and will soon arrive.

A new arrangement of the ministry has, it is said, taken place, and will soon be announced; the enclosed paper will inform you of the particulars; if true, it will give strength to the administration by uniting the leaders of the contending parties.

As yet I have received no answer to my letter of the third instant to the minister. It is not improbable that the operation of this change in the ministry has occasioned the delay, as the concurrence and counsels of the new ministers would be necessary to the stability of any system relative to us, that may be in contemplation. What that system may be, I cannot pretend to predict or even conjecture; and, therefore, again take the liberty of hinting, that, in my opinion, our preparations for war should continue unremitted.

The merchants and others, entrenching themselves on expectations that all differences will be amicably settled, and I believe that the ministry has encouraged and countenanced these expectations, though not in a manner so explicit and decided as to have committed themselves. At present, things appear to me to be so circumstanced as that neither a hostile nor a pacific system would surprise me. You shall be regularly and accurately informed of every change that may happen in the prospect of either; and I think it will not be difficult so to manage that the case of a war, our people will be united, and their people divided. This will certainly be the case if we do nothing but what is just and right.

I have the honor to be, with great respect &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, July 10, 1794.

Sir:

You will receive by this conveyance a supplement to the cases of British spoliations, the very abridgment of which makes a large quarto volume in my office; and also duplicates of my letters of 27th, 28th, 29th May, and 8th June.

I have been endeavouring to obtain the particulars of the different instances of capture, covered, as the Americans say, by the armistice; but not being able to succeed, I have selected so much of the case, which you know was brought before the Supreme Court of the United States in another shape, as will give an idea of the general principle of these cases. Some justice, I think, can easily procure full information of the several cases, if your success in the discussion of the principle should render it necessary.

It is an exceedingly happy circumstance for the peace of nations, that they are not obliged to credit the facts or reasoning of their ministers abroad; that they can distinguish their zeal to seem watchful, their irascibility, and the erroneousness of their apprehensions, from a temper of hostility in the nation to which they are sent. How far this is fortunate for us, with respect to Great Britain, will be evinced from my correspondence with Mr. Hammond, upon the rule of twenty-four hours for the sailing of hostile vessels from our ports, and upon his list of charges against our fidelity to the obligation of neutrality. We have too much reason to fear, from the boldness with which he assumes facts to us, he will be less restrained in his declarations to the British ministry. As often, therefore, as you shall be assailed by any strong intelligence, I must request you to keep off any conclusions from being made, until you shall have an opportunity of hearing from my office: for our unalterable desire of peace will not only quicken our communications to you, but authorize me to pronounce beforehand, that the Government can never be chargeable with any wilful breach of neutrality; and, indeed, notwithstanding Mr. Hammond’s insinuations, with any negligence in preserving it inviolate. The papers as to the Charles and Delight will be a fresh testimony of this assertion.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No 6.

LONDON, 12th July, 1794.

Sir:

I had yesterday the honor of seeing Lord Grenville. He assured me that no unnecessary delays should retarde a full discussion of the points in question; and observed that the new arrangement of the ministry involved the necessity of time for their being all informed and consulted. In this assurance I have perfect confidence.

We had an informal conversation relative to Simcoe’s hostile measure. We concurred in opinion that, during the present negotiation, and until the conclusion of it, all things ought to remain and be preserved in status quo; that, therefore, both parties should continue to hold their possessions, and that all encroachments on either side should be done away; that all hostile measures (if any such should have taken place) shall cease, and that, in case it should, unfortunately, have happened that prisoners or property should have been taken, the prisoners shall be released, and the property restored. And we have agreed that both Governments shall immediately give orders and instructions accordingly.

This agreement appears to me so perfectly reasonable, and so conducive to the preservation of mutual confidence and good temper, that I flatter myself it will meet with the President’s approbation; and I have given Lord Grenville explicit assurances (which he has reciprocated) that, on the part of the United States, it will be faithfully observed and fulfilled.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No 7.

LONDON, 16th July, 1794.

Sir:

In my last letter, viz. of the 18th instant, I had the honor of stating to you, particularly, an agreement between Lord Grenville and myself, for preserving all things, between the United States and our Canadian neighbors, in a peaceable state during the negotiation. Yesterday Lord Grenville read to me what he had written to Mr. Hammond on that subject; it exactly corresponded with what I had written to you in my letter of the 12th. His lordship desired I would take charge of his letter, and give it a place among my despatches to you. I received it from him last night; it will be herewith enclosed. You will, I am persuaded, take particular care that it be delivered speedily and in good order. Correspondent letters and orders will doubtless be expedited directly to Lord Dorchester and Mr. Simcoe, by the first packet.

The arrival and obvious effects of such letters and orders cannot fail to have a favorable influence on the hostile Indians; as their expectations of aid abate and diminish, their disposition to peace will increase, and become operative.

It was not until the 14th instant that the Captain of the William Penn knew that there was a box on board directed to me; in the afternoon of that day I received it, and found your letters to me of the 37th and 28th May, and a note covering a list of the papers sent in the box. As yet I have not had leisure to compare the papers with the list. On opening one or two cases of spoliation, I find several papers not important for me to have plain, concisestates are sufficient, and best for diplomatic purposes. I am glad that these cases are come: after making the necessary selections and statements, I will lay them before the minister.
I have also had the pleasure of receiving your letters of the 29th May and 8th June. With the former was a list; but really, sir, I have not yet had time to compare the papers with the list, nor to prepare myself for writing to you on the subject of those letters at present.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, July 18th, 1794.

Sir:

The enclosed letter from Mr. Higginson, of the 18th ultimo, gives me reason to suppose that the opportunities from Barbadoes to London may be sufficiently frequent for the conveyance of the documents which he is sent to collect. I have, therefore, the honor of enclosing to you the records of the brig Despatch, schooner Trial, schooner Hope, (Farley) schooner Hope, (Felt) schooner Resolution, brig Lady Washington, sloop Ranger, schooner Polly, and schooner Fox; and to be, with great respect and esteem, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 8.

LONDON, 30th July, 1794.

Sir:

The great, and, I believe, unexpected events in Flanders, and the unusual number of interesting affairs which constantly demand the attention of the British cabinet, keep their ministers unceasingly employed, and is, doubtless, one reason why more time has not been allotted to our concerns. We are, nevertheless, beginning to do business apparently in good earnest. The minister is (if I may so say) besieged by our British creditors. The subject of the debts is attended with difficulties. The minister has been informed that the law in Virginia relative to the evidence of book debts has, since the war, been made more strict than it was before. If the law has been thus changed, and made to apply to pre-existing transactions, there is room for complaint. I wish to have exact information on this head.

I am to see Lord Grenville to-morrow at 11 o'clock, by appointment, on the business of spoliations and impressments, when I hope he will be prepared to say something decisive. I have laid before him several of the cases you sent me, and also, the statement by the captains of vessels taken at Martinique. Of the facts mentioned in the latter, he had never received any information. I know the impatience that must prevail in our country. At times, I find it difficult to repress my own impatience; but for all things there is a season. The importance of moderation and caution in the present moment is obvious, and will, it is to be hoped, continue to operate on the minds and conduct of our fellow-citizens. As yet, I do not apprehend that I have committed any mistakes in this business. I wish I may be able to say as much at the conclusion of it.

I have read your thirty odd papers to, and from, and respecting, Mr. Hammond and his complaints. You have, in my opinion, managed that matter well; continue, by all means, to be temperate, and put him in the wrong.

Let us hope for the best, and prepare for the worst. I confess I have hopes, but I also perceive circumstances and causes which may render them abortive.

This letter cannot be satisfactory; it amounts to little more than this: That nothing decisive has yet been done, and that I cannot tell you whether any thing, and what, will be done. So is the case; and such will often be the case pending any negotiation, or any game connected with events not in our power to control. In both, chances frequently defeat skill, and as frequently give to skill unmerited reputation. For these things I must take my chance.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, July 30, 1794.

Sir:

I do myself the honor of enclosing to you a copy of my last letter to Mr. Hammond, together with the following duplicates, viz: May 27th, 28th, and 29th, June 8, July 5, with its enclosures.

The reports of a determination in the British to abet the Indians, grow daily more and more serious; and there is great reason to apprehend that British troops will be found mixed with the savages, who are prepared to meet General Wayne.

The gazette of Mr. Bache, published on the 26th day of this month, will give you all the information which we have yet received, of a very unfortunate tumult near Pittsburg. The President has not yet acted upon the subject, as authentic facts are not yet before him.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 9.

LONDON, 31st July, 1794.

Sir:

My letter of yesterday informed you that I should, this day, at 11 o'clock, see Lord Grenville on the subject of spoliations, &c. I have seen him accordingly. Having presented to him an official note on this object of my mission, it became the topic of our conversation. He promised to send me a written answer to-morrow, and I am induced to believe it will, in some respects, meet our wishes, but that it will not extend to immediate compensation by Government; and yet, that it will include eventual compensation in all cases where the ordinary course of appeals, &c. may not afford it. On receiving this answer I shall immediately write to you again, and enclose copies both of my note and of the answer to it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

P.S. I think our affairs here assume a more promising aspect.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 10.

LONDON, August 2, 1794.

Sir:

I had the honor of writing to you on the 31st ult.: that letter was sent to Falmouth, in hopes it would reach Dr. Edwards before he sailed from thence for Boston. He went from hence on Tuesday last. I now enclose a copy.

That letter mentioned my having presented an official representation to Lord Grenville on the subject of spoliations, &c. to which his lordship had given me reason to expect an answer in a day or two. I have accordingly re-
GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. Jay's representation to Lord Grenville.

The undersigned, envoy of the United States of America, has the honor of representing to the Right Honorable, Lord Grenville, His Britannic Majesty's Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs:

That a very considerable number of American vessels have been irregularly captured, and as improperly confined, as their non-admission into His Majesty's ports.

That, in various instances, these captures and condemnations were so conducted, and the captured placed under such unfavorable circumstances, as that, for want of the securities required, and other obstacles, no appeals were made in certain cases, nor any claims in others.

That the proceedings in all these cases will appear from the documents which he has had the honor of submitting to his lordship's consideration; and that it will not be deemed necessary, at present, to particularize these cases, and their merits, or detail the circumstances which discriminate some from others.

That great and extensive injuries having thus, under color of His Majesty's authority and commissions, been done to a number of merchant vessels of America, the United States can, for reparation, have recourse only to the justice, authority, and interposition of His Majesty.

That the vessels and property, taken and condemned, have been chiefly sold, and the proceeds divided among a large number of claimants; some are duty unpaid, to make restitution, and others, from frequent removals, and their particular circumstances, not easily reached by civil process.

That as, for these losses and injuries, adequate compensation, by means of judicial proceedings, has become impracticable, and considering the causes which combined to produce them, the United States confide in His Majesty's justice and magnanimity to cause such compensation to be made to these innocent sufferers as may be consistent with equity; and the undersigned flatters himself that such principles may, without difficulty, be adopted, as will serve as rules whereby to ascertain the cases, and the amount of compensation.

So grievous are the expenses and delays attending litigated suits, to persons whose fortunes have been so materially affected, that so great is the distance of Great Britain from America, that the undersigned thinks he ought to express his anxiety, that a mode of proceeding as summary and little expensive may be devised, as circumstances, and the peculiar hardship of these cases, may appear to permit and require.

And as (at least in some of these cases) it may be expedient and necessary, as well as just, that the sentences of the courts of vice-admiralty should be revised and corrected by the court of appeals here, the undersigned hopes it will appear reasonable to His Majesty to order that the captured in question (who have not already so done) be there admitted to enter both their appeals and their claims.

In order to find out the real irregularities, before mentioned extended not only to the capture and condemnation of American vessels, and property, but to unusual personal severity, but even to the impression of American citizens to serve on board of armed vessels. He forsees to dwell on the injuries done to the unfortunate individuals, or on the evolutions which they must naturally excite, either in the breast of the nation to whom they belong, or in that of the other powers, every cause every reason for public justice and humanity; the consideration of His Majesty leads him to indulge a pleasing expectation that orders will be given that Americans so circumstanced, be immediately liberated, and that persons, honored with His Majesty's commissions, do, in future, abstain from similar proceedings.

It is with cordial satisfaction that the undersigned reflects on the impressions which such equitable and conciliatory measures would make upon the minds of the United States, and how naturally they would inspire and cherish those sentiments and dispositions which never fail to preserve, as well as to produce, respect, esteem, and friendship.

JOHN JAY.

Lord Grenville's reply.

DOWNSIDE STREET, August 1, 1794.

The undersigned, Secretary of State, has had the honor to lay before the King the ministerial note which he has received from Mr. Jay, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America, respecting the irregularity of the capture and condemnation of several American vessels, and also respecting the circumstances of personal severity by which those proceedings are stated to have been accompanied in some particular instances.

The undersigned is authorized to assure Mr. Jay, that it is His Majesty's wish that the most complete and instantaneous measures should be taken to effect a release of all the vessels, and those who may, for any reason, have been injured by any of the proceedings above mentioned. All experience shows that a naval war, extending over the four quarters of the globe, must unavoidably be productive of some inconveniences to the commerce of neutral nations, and that no care can prevent some irregularities in the course of those proceedings which are universally recognized as resulting from the just rights and interests of the belligerent powers, and which, however, may always be denounced as well as some precautions, which stand in the way. It is therefore, the undersigned flatters himself that such principles may, without difficulty, be adopted, as will serve as rules whereby to ascertain the cases, and the amount of compensation.

So grievous are the expenses and delays attending litigated suits, to persons whose fortunes have been so materially affected, that so great is the distance of Great Britain from America, that the undersigned thinks he ought to express his anxiety, that a mode of proceeding as summary and little expensive may be devised, as circumstances, and the peculiar hardship of these cases, may appear to permit and require.

And as (at least in some of these cases) it may be expedient and necessary, as well as just, that the sentences of the courts of vice-admiralty should be revised and corrected by the court of appeals here, the undersigned hopes it will appear reasonable to His Majesty to order that the captured in question (who have not already so done) be there admitted to enter both their appeals and their claims.

In order to find out the real irregularities, before mentioned extended not only to the capture and condemnation of American vessels, and property, but to unusual personal severity, but even to the impression of American citizens to serve on board of armed vessels. He forsees to dwell on the injuries done to the unfortunate individuals, or on the evolutions which they must naturally excite, either in the breast of the nation to whom they belong, or in that of the other powers, every cause every reason for public justice and humanity; the consideration of His Majesty leads him to indulge a pleasing expectation that orders will be given that Americans so circumstanced, be immediately liberated, and that persons, honored with His Majesty's commissions, do, in future, abstain from similar proceedings.

It is with cordial satisfaction that the undersigned reflects on the impressions which such equitable and conciliatory measures would make upon the minds of the United States, and how naturally they would inspire and cherish those sentiments and dispositions which never fail to preserve, as well as to produce, respect, esteem, and friendship.

JOHN JAY.
ceasing, at a very small expense to the parties, and without any interposition of His Majesty's Government than is above stated. Until the result and effect of these proceedings shall be known, no definitive judgment can be formed respecting the nature and extent of those cases, (if any such shall ultimately be found to exist) where it shall not have been practicable to obtain substantial redress in this mode. But he does not hesitate to say, beforehand, that, if cases shall then be found to exist to such an extent as properly to call for the interposition of Government, where, without the fault of the parties complaining, they shall be unable, from whatever circumstances, to procure such redress, in the ordinary course of law, the justice of their cases may entitle them to expect, His Majesty will be anxious that justice should, at all events, be done, and will readily enter into the discussion of the measures to be adopted, and the principles to be established for that purpose.

With respect to all acts of personal severity and violence, as the King must entirely disapprove every such transaction, so by His Majesty's courts are always open to the punishment of offenders of this nature; and the justices will, in every case, where the fact can be established by satisfactory proof; nor does it appear that any case of that nature can exist where there would be the smallest difficulty of obtaining, in that mode, substantial and exemplary justice.

On the subject of the impress, Lord Grenville has only to assure Mr. Jay, that if, in any instance, American seamen have been impressed into the King's service, it has been contrary to the King's desire; though such cases may have occasionally arisen from the difficulty of discriminating between British and American seamen, especially where there so often exists an interest and an Antagonism to deceive. Whenever any representation has been made to Lord Grenville on this subject, he has never failed to receive His Majesty's commands for putting it in a proper course in order that the facts might be inquired into, and ascertained; and to the intent that the persons in question might be released, if the facts appeared to be satisfactorily established.

With respect to the dispatch expressed by Mr. Jay that new orders might be given with a view to prevent, as far as is possible, the giving any past ground of complaint on this head, Lord Grenville has no reason to doubt that His Majesty's intentions respecting this point are already sufficiently understood by His Majesty's officers employed on that service; but he has, nevertheless, obtained His Majesty's permission to assure Mr. Jay, that instructions, to the effect desired, will be renewed, in consequence of his application.

The undersigned avails himself, with pleasure, of this opportunity to renew to Mr. Jay his assurances of his sincere esteem and consideration.

GRENVILLE.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 11.

LONDON, 8th August, 1794.

Sir: I refer you to my letter No. 10, and its enclosures, by Captain Coit, via New York, of which duplicates are also sent by the William Penn. Having understood that one of our Indians had been captured and sent to Halifax, I mentioned it to Lord Grenville. He readily promised to write by the packet, and direct the attention of the Government there to that object, so that nothing improper may take place. My present prospects are not discouraging. I expect to be, in about a fortnight, to give you some interesting details; and I hope some of them will be agreeable, but of this I cannot be certain.

I have the honor to be, &c.

P. S. The Pigou is arrived. I have not yet seen the captain; he probably has letters for me.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 12.

LONDON, 9th August, 1794.

Sir: Last evening I received from Lord Grenville an order of the King and council, dated the 6th instant, relative to appeals from sentences of condemnation passed against American vessels. The enclosed is a copy of it. I have employed Sir William Scott and Dr. Nicholl in behalf of our appeals and claims.

The letter which [from that by Mr. Fisher] I find you have written to me by the Pigou, has not yet reached me.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

At the court at St. James's, the 6th August, 1794.

PRESENT: The King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas in many of His Majesty's vice admiralty courts in the West Indies, sentences of condemnation have passed against ships and goods belonging to the subjects of the United States of America: And whereas, from ignorance of the rules respecting the times of appeal, or from inability to find the security required, or from other just and reasonable impediments, the claimants have been prevented from duly entering and prosecuting their appeals from the said sentences: And whereas it hath been represented to His Majesty, on their behalf, that they are desirous of entering and prosecuting the same: His Majesty is thereupon pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the said parties shall be admitted to their respective appeals, notwithstanding the ordinary times for entering and prosecuting the same, it may have elapsed; provided the same are entered and prosecuted in a reasonable time, to be approved of by the lords commissioners of appeals in prize causes.

STEPHEN COTTRELL.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, August 11, 1794.

Sir: Having regularly transmitted to you copies of my late correspondence with Mr. Hammond, in relation to Lord Dorchester's speech, Governor Simcoe's invasion, and his own criminations of the United States, I now do myself the honor of adding his concluding letter of July 30, 1794. If he wishes any new evidence of our unchangeable neutrality he may be told, and the British ministry likewise, that the militia of Richmond, in Virginia, actually marched, at a moment's warning, between seventy and eighty miles, to seize a vessel supposed to be under preparation as a French privateer. Resistance was at first apprehended; but it was overawed, and the business completely effected.

The discontent, evasions, and occasional oppositions, which have been manifested against the excise, in the counties of Pennsylvania westward of the Allegheny mountains, have at length assumed a menacing and formidable air. The enclosed paper contains the President's proclamation, which is a summary of facts, except that Neville's house and out-houses were destroyed by fire. Commissioners are gone upon the ground, and particularly to be present at a great meeting on the 14th instant. Upwards of twelve thousand militia are ordered to hold themselves in readiness; and if the orders of the commissioners should be unsatisfactory, the militia will, I believe, be commanded to proceed. The experiment upon their temper is untried. The Governor of Pennsylvania is against the calling forth of the militia, until more formal legal measures are pursued. He, too, has sent two commissioners, on the part of the State, and has called the Assembly for the 1st of September ensuing. But he has expressed his persuasion, that a sufficiency of militia of the State cannot be prevailed on to move forward. Hence proportions of the number required will be procured from Virginia, Maryland, and Jersey, as well as Pennsylvania. The temper of the militia is not yet developed; some, however, vibrate between hatred of the excise; and horror of these unauthorized violences. At present it can only be said, that, if an accommodation does not take place, a new era will immediately spring up in our Government.

The letter from Clerke and Bentlou, of Baltimore; the papers of the snow Sukey, ship Charlotte, sloop Sally, schooner Fame, brig David and George, schooner Friendship, and schooner Sarah, brig Union, Captain Cotlle, and brig Dolphin, Captain Knapp, are additions to the cases of spoliation, and now sent.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

P. S. I ought to have mentioned the death of Mr. N. C. Higginson, who was sent to the West Indies to collect documents. This may occasion some delay and disappointment in the transmission of them to London. The spoliations are unavailing delayed for another conveyance.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.
PHILADELPHIA, August 15, 1794.

Sir:

Mr. James King, the owner of the schooner Nancy, the papers in whose case have been forwarded, as far as they were received, has this moment laid before me a copy of the record. From the whole proceedings, it appears, that she was acquired at Nassau upon the payment of duties, and that the captors have appeared. As this vessel and her cargo come within the catalogue of spoliations, I have to request that they may be protected by your attention, and that you will give directions for the employment of counsel in behalf of the United States, unless some adjustment which you may make with the British ministry, on general grounds, shall supersede the necessity of such a step.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.
PHILADELPHIA, August 18, 1794.

Sir:

I had the honor of receiving, on the 16th instant, your letter of the 23 of June, from London, and, on the 17th instant, your first letter of the 9th of June, from Falmouth. Both of them came by the Active, Captain Blair, but the latter was brought, more expeditiously, by Mr. Francis, than the former, which was delivered out with the other letters in the bag of the ship.

It has given great pleasure to the President to hear of your safe and speedy arrival, and of the style of your reception by the minister. You know the temper and conduct of the President so thoroughly, that I need not assure you of the impartiality which he continues to preserve towards all nations. And, yet, the irritation from the British quarter has been exceedingly aggravated. I pass over Lord Dorchester's speech, which, notwithstanding the half disavowal of it in the British Houses of Lords and Commons, on the 26th May last, is believed by every body here, to be genuine, and is argued upon, as you will perceive, in Mr. Hammond's two letters to me, of the 30th May and 7th June, as if it were rather genuine than otherwise. But Governor Simcoe's invasion of the Rapids of the Miami, comes confirmed to us from every source, except Mr. Hammond, who has had near three months for ascertaining the fact, and whose silence, during that time, after his promise to inform us of the truth, is the highest presumption of the act of hostility. So, too, the enclosed copies from the War Office, prove that the British were associated with the Indians in the affair of Fort Recovery, on the 30th of June. We cannot add, upon proof, that British influence has been tampering with the people of Kentucky, and of the neighborhood of Pittsburg, to seduce them from the United States, or to encourage them in a revolt against the General Government. It has, however, been boasted of by them, and an expectation of such an event is supposed to have been excited in the breasts of some.

The impression of our commissioners, and those of the State of Pennsylvania, upon the insurgents near Pittsburg, cannot be yet known, and we can transmit to you no other indications of the issue of this commotion, than what may be drawn from my letter of the 11th of August.

The enclosed copy of Mr. Hammond's letter of the 14th of August, with its enclosure, will be justly appreciated, when you advert to those of my former letters which speak of his facility of complying. But we shall again demonstrate the promptness with which we exert ourselves to redress his grievances, real or supposed, as an injunction will be immediately dispatched to the several Governors to grant to the British ships the most complete hospitality, consistent with our stipulations to other nations. The particular case to which he alludes will be consigned to the special attention of the Governor of Delaware.

The letters which I have written to you since your departure, are of the following dates: May 27, 28, 29; June 6, 9; July 9, 10, 13, 29; August 11. I now enclose duplicates of the four last mentioned, together with sundry other papers, agreeably to the enclosed list; duplicates of all the others having been formerly sent.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 13.
LONDON, 21st August, 1794.

Sir:

I have received the letter you did me the honor to write on the 9th June, enclosing the case of the snow Sukey, and of the brigantine Maria. That letter begins thus: "Since writing of my letter yesterday, I have received," &c. That letter has never come to my hands.

A few days ago I was favored with yours of the 9th July, on the subject of the American vessel carried into Bermuda, and on board of which a large quantity of powder was found, and enclosing copies of several letters relative to it. That letter appeared to me to be well calculated to manifest the sincerity of the Government, and evidently shows a disposition, rather to invite than to evade an investigation into every transaction that afforded color for complaint. I therefore thought it expedient to communicate it, and all the papers which accompanied it, to the minister, without diminution.

Since my last, nothing new has occurred. We are endeavoring to digest and mature a final settlement; whether we shall be able to agree, is uncertain; I have hopes as well as apprehensions. I think our next conference will produce something decisive, at least on some of the great points. If so, you shall be immediately informed of it.

Considering how many urgent affairs, which cannot be postponed, daily call for the minister's orders, we cannot expect that ours should proceed without some occasional delays. As yet, I have no reason to believe that any of them have been avoidable.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Sir William Scott, the King's advocate, who is retained for us, is, at my request, preparing instructions for our people who have appeals or claims to bring forward. When finished, they shall be sent to you. I really do believe that all business will be conducted and concluded with good faith. At Martinique there was no legal court or vice admiralty; consequently, the condemnations there are nugatory, and original claims may be entered and prosecuted here.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 14.

LONDON, 23d August, 1794.

Sir: When you shall have received my letter enclosing copies of my representation to Lord Grenville, on the subject of captures, and of his answer, and a subsequent letter enclosing a copy of the instructions respecting appeals and claims, you will perceive that they who wish to prosecute either, should, without delay, appoint agents here to manage their business, and to whom I may deliver such papers in my possession as relate to those cases of capture which may be committed to their care and direction.

I am inclined to think that the order of council alone will not be satisfactory to the claimants; and, therefore, that the representation, and the answer to it, and, perhaps, my letter No. 10, of the 2d of August, covering them, should be published at large. But of this, the President and you, who are on the spot, will be better able to judge than I can be.

I heard yesterday that Mr. Monroe had arrived at Paris. Be so good as to inform me, from time to time, which of my letters, and also the duplicates (for of some duplicates have been sent) come to your hands.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, August 30th, 1794, one o'clock.

Sir: The treatment which American vessels have experienced from the warring Powers causes a general concealment of their departure, so that I am frequently obliged to snatch an opportunity at a moment's warning. This is the case at present. Having just heard of a vessel ready to sail from New York, I shall despatch an express at two o'clock, P. M. which, I hope, will reach her.

Last night, we received from Captain Williamson, living at Sodus, in Ontario county, in the State of New York, the enclosed letter, containing the most unwarantable and insolent demand from Governor Simcoe, through Lieuten-tenant Sheaff, that he should desist from the prosecution of my settlement there. The original, now in my office, may be proceeded on as authentic. Sodus is probably well known to you. If it be not, I add the only information which I can obtain of its position; that it lies between Oswego, on Lake Ontario, and Niagara, about twenty-five miles from the former, and nearly three times that distance from the latter. What might we not be justified in saying or doing on this new aggression? Mr. Hammond has promised to procure the truth of the report as to Governor Simcoe's seizure of the Rapids of the Miami; but with a full scope of time, he remains silent, while it is firmly believed that British troops were associated with the Indians in the late attack on Fort Recovery; and it is certain that the British Governor of Upper Canada threatens us if we clear our own lands, and build houses to shelter our laborers. The admonition, sir, which your letter of June 23d gives, to prevent the arrival of any irritating intelligence in London, is but a comment upon the unvaried policy of the President, and of every member of the administration. This is evidenced by the step on which the President has now resolved, which is, to transmit copies of the papers to Mr. Hammond, now at New York, (where he has been for a considerable time, and whither he went, after an intermission of visits to the President for more than two months, without taking leave of him, further than his notification to me might be considered as such) to afford to him an occasion to explain this procedure away, or, if he should perchance have power, to check it; to inform Captain Williamson that he is right in his determina-tion to push on his settlement, and that the owner of lands may repel force brought by an invader, and to offer to the Governor of New York, on loan, arms for the purposes of defence. My letter to Mr. Hammond cannot be prepared early enough for the express; but it will not be required as in any manner immediately useful to you, since the outrage of the principle asserted in Governor Simcoe's dispatch, will instantly occur to your mind; and compared with similar acts on the part of the British, will establish our love of peace in triumph over the calamities which British agents, indisposed to us from interest or other motives, may propagate on the other side of the Atlantic.

Mr. Jay has letters addressed to you the insurrection at Pittsburg; and with the gazettes which have been forwarded, gave you the real state of the business up to the 17th instant. At that time, the commissioners wrote that nothing but the physical force of the nation could subdue it. The President, in consequence of this declaration, arranged the march of the militia. But you will perceive how the gloom of bloodshed is brightened by their letters of the 21st and 22d instants, with their enclosures, copies of which I have now the pleasure of transmitting to you. We may count upon an express from Pittsburg in the course of this day, which will enable us to judge whether any difficulty can have arisen in the detail spoken of. But, I flatter myself that this event will close with a return of harmony; will demonstrate the horror of our citizens at an opposition to laws; will prove that the Government can protect itself against insult and rebellion, and will be an era of stability in our affairs. While I wish that the rashness and delusion of some, and the deliberate wickedness of others, had not plunged us into such dangers, I must confess my belief that the catastrophe will show that there is a point—the point of actual opposition to Government—concerning which the desperate may prate with indifference, but at which the very great majority of our cit-izens shudder.

By the present conveyance, I repeat some of my former letters, with various enclosures. The newspapers are also sent.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Shall I beg the favor of you to show this letter to Mr. Pinckney, to whom I cannot in my hurry write at this moment?

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, September 5, 1794.

Sir: I write only to enclose you copies of the papers respecting the commotion at Pittsburg, and of my letter to Mr. Hammond on the 1st instant, and his answer to me on the 3d, concerning the settlement at Great Sodus. We have reason to expect the conclusion of the insurrection without bloodshed; but we are hourly looking for more particular intelligence of the proceedings at Redstone on the 28th ultima. These will be indicative of the final issue.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.
Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

Philadelphia, September 12, 1794.

Sir:

It is said that a vessel will sail from hence on Sunday next for Liverpool, and I cannot lose this chance of conveying to you the acknowledgment of your letters of the 28th June, and duplicates of June 33, and the real state of the inscription of Pittsburg at this moment.

The gazettes sent by a former opportunity, together with those now enclosed, will inform you of the facts. To guide you more certainly, I will refer you to the following dates of Dunlap's paper:—For the President's proclamation, in the paper of the 8th August; and, with the first committee, see Bache's paper of 6th September: for the proceedings at Parkinson's Ferry, and with the new committee, see the paper of this day.

Yesterday the votes of the people were taken on the question of resistance or submission. Mr. Bradford, the Attorney General of the United States, came to town last evening, having left his colleague, Mr. Ross, to be present at Union Town, in Fayette county, on the 16th, when the report of those votes is to be made to him. Mr. Bradford is of opinion that the county of Alleghany will be nearly, if not wholly, unanimous for submission; that those in the eastern part will approach considerably to unanimity; that Westmoreland is very doubtful; and that Washington will probably hold out.

What can be the hopes of the insurgents, with all the men of influence and property residing in those counties against them; without money, without discipline, with no distinguished skill in the use of arms; with no disposability after all to the necessity of having, with no prospect of any redress, of any produce, except in the Alliance States; with a feeble population; with the certainty of punishment before them, or the necessity of flight from their possessions; without ammunition, and even arms? Mr. Bradford thinks that scarce five hundred will take the field. Yet, can the insurgents expect any thing by the sympathy of other States. On the contrary, they have every thing to dread. Virginia will readily produce her quota of the fifteen thousand demanded; her inhabitants are steadfast in the abhorrence of the inscription, and her Governor (Henry Lee) will have the command. General Morgan is in motion also. Maryland, notwithstanding the defects in her militia laws, will act very satisfactorily. New Jersey, probably headed by Governor Livingston, will exhibit a most horrid camp; but so composed as to be supposed to be reluctant, will furnish in volunteers what the incompetency of her militia laws would not yield. The speech of Governor Millfin to the Assembly, and to the officers, the answers of the State Senate and House of Representatives, breathe a spirit determined to subdue the commotion. It has been even proposed (and the proposal seems good) that a very agreeable committee should be elected by themselves and submit to your Excellency, if you, therefore, sir, with safety pronounce, that howsoever painful the appeal may be to arms, howsoever active the insurgents may have been in endeavoring to obtain pretexts, howsoever inconvenient the long distance to the principal scene may be, Government has not the most remote apprehension of difficulty, nor of inflation. Your negotiation cannot, I hope, be exaggerated by any appearance which this affair may have assumed; if it has been, it is by you, you may truly affirm that, instead of shaking, it will terminate in the manifestation of the love of the people for the Government of the United States, and their zealous guardianship of it.

I have to add, Mr. Hammond, that the state is that of Governor Simcoe's perpetual encroachments, threats, and, indeed, hostilities. In support of my letter to him on the 3d instant, the enclosed affidavit of John Kelly presents most a strange fact. Be assured, that I shall rejoice in your honor, in happily closing this and every other branch of your functions. I, Lord Dorchester and Governor Simcoe are to continue uncontrolled in their course, with what consequences we cannot now determine.

The copies of two other letters from me to Mr. Hammond, of the 22d and 27th of August, and of an extract from his reply on the 3d instant, will prove how we are harassed by their conduct respecting American seamen. So, too,/Dk. Shelton's letter of the 8th instant, Governor Clinton's of the 9th, and the affidavits of Lloyd Daubeny and John R. Livingston, show that unjust and oppressive captures continue to be made of our property by British cruisers on our very coasts.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 15.

London, 13th September, 1794.

Sir:

Hitherto my letters have communicated to you but little information of much importance, except on one point. Although all the general objects of my mission were opened at once, and were received with equal satisfaction of the same candor and disposition to agree upon with which they were stated, yet the nature of the business turned the immediate and more particular attention of both parties to the affair of the captures: the result has been communicated to you.

A number of informal conversations on the other points then took place, and every difficulty which attended them came into view, and was discussed with great fairness and temper; the inquiry naturally led to the fact, which constituted the first violation of the treaty of peace. The carrying away of the negroes contrary to the 7th article of the treaty of peace, was insisted upon as being the first aggression. To this it was answered, in substance, that Britain understood the stipulation contained in that article, in the obvious sense of the words which expressed it, viz: as an engagement not to cause any destruction, nor to carry away any negroes or other property of the American inhabitants or, in other words, that the evacuation should be made without deprecatory; that no alteration in the actual state of property was operated or intended by that article; that every slave, like every horse, which escaped or strayed from within the American lines, and came into the possession of the British army, became, by the laws and rights of war, British property; and, therefore, ceasing to be American property, the property therefore was not injured by British troops intervening in such instances, that, to extend it to the negroes, who, under the faith of the proclamations, had come into them, of whom they thereby acquired the property, and to whom, according to protection, liberty had been given, was to give to the article a greater latitude than the terms of it would warrant, and was also, unnecessarily, to give it a construction which, being odious, could not be supported by the known and established rules for construing treaties; To this was replied the several remarks and considerations which are probably then at large in a report which I once made to Congress on this subject, and which, for that reason, it would be useless here to repeat; on which we found ourselves agreed.

In the same instance, as affording us just cause of complaint, antecedent to any of those urged against us, viz: that, from the document received and stated in Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Hammond, it appears, that the posts were not only not evacuated, within the reasonable time stipulated by treaty, but also, that no orders for the purpose had, at least within that time, if ever, been given, I was informed indirectly that it was thought the issue was to be made with Spain, on the 30th November, 1783; that those articles were to constitute the treaty of peace proposed, to be concluded between Great Britain and the United States, but which treaty was not to be concluded till terms of peace should be agreed upon between Great Britain and France that the treaty of peace was not concluded, till the 3d September, 1783; that it was not ratified in America until the 14th of August, 1784; that the ratification was received in London on the 17th, and was accordingly ratified in Great Britain, nor exchanged until the end of that month; that, according to the laws of nations, treaties do not oblige the parties to begin to execute the engagements contained in them, until they have received their whole form, that is, when they shall have been ratified by the respective sovereigns that parties to it, and until after those ratifications shall have been exchanged; that, therefore, it was not until the end of May, 1784, that the treaty of Great Britain was bound to give any orders to evacuate the posts; that such orders could not arrive at Quebec, until in July, 1784, and, consequently, that the allegations of a breach of the treaty by the non-execution of the article respecting the posts, grounded on circumstances prior to the 13th July, 1874, are evidently unfounded; that, in the interval between the arrival and publication in America, of the provisional articles, and the month of July, 1874, by which time, at 1st, orders issued after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of peace, the last of May, could reach Quebec, incontestable violations of the treaty had taken place in the United States; that reason and the practice of nations, the treaties of the United States with Great Britain, and had inscribed, or until the final exchange of ratifications; that, in opposition to this, new legislative acts had, in the interval before mentioned, been passed, which were evidently calculated to be beforehand with the treaty, and to prevent its having its full and fair operation on certain points and objects, when it was signed and taken effect; that these acts were the first violations of the treaty, which was just the Great Britain, in determining the posts until the injuries caused by their operation should be compensated.

That Britain was not bound to evacuate the posts, nor to give any orders for the purpose, until after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of peace, and that the treaty, as to those points and objects which were not the subject of the treaty, was of an incontestable character.

That certain legislative acts did pass in the United States, in the interval aforesaid, which were inconsistent with the treaty of peace, is equally certain; but it does not thence necessarily follow that those acts were without justice even as relative to the treaty: for precedent violations on the part of Great Britain would justify subsequent refusal to the treaty, so far as they were inadmissible, and the same to the present as it was deemed just and necessary to the establishment of the system of their government, and was answered as before. I confess, however, that his construction of that article has made an impression upon my mind, and induced me to suspect that my former opinion on that head may not be well founded.

Thus it became evident that admissions of infractions of the treaty of peace, and that this or that party committed treaty violation, and did so with manifest premeditation.

It then became advisable to quit those topics, and to try to agree on such a set of reciprocal concessions as (balancing each other) might afford articles for a treaty, so beneficial to both parties, as to induce them to bury in its all former questions and disputes. The above idea gave origin to the following propositions of different kinds, which it would be tedious and useless to enumerate, and of which you will readily conceive there were some that could not meet with mutual approbation; among those which were mentioned, was one for altering essentially our boundaries in the northwestern corner of the United States; this I regarded as inadmissible, and hoped would not be persisted in; one for doing us complete justice respecting the captures; one for partially opening to us a trade with the West India Islands; one for our paying the damages sustained by British creditors, by lawful impediments; this was strongly insisted on. I did not think it utterly inadmissible, in case we received proper justice and privileges under other articles: for them, in my judgment, it would not be advisable to part and separate on that point, and the additional terms by which the general object would have been secured, one for putting the ships and merchants of both parties on an equal footing. In short, in order to bring the whole subject comprehensively into view, nothing that occurred was omitted to be mentioned; these were free conversations, neither of us considering the other as being committed to any given purpose.

It was necessary then to select points for mutual consideration, and quitting detestable discussions, to fix our attention on certain propositions, each being at liberty to propose what he pleased, and again to retrace his proposition, if, on mature reflection, he should be so inclined: with this view, after returning home, I selected the following: viz.

- Whereas the line of the West from the Lake of the Woods, which is mentioned in the said treaty, it is agreed that the actual extent of the said river to the northward shall be explored and ascertained by commissioners for that purpose, to be appointed and authorized as follows, viz.

It is agreed that if, from the report of the said commissioners, it shall appear that the said river does not extend so far to the northward as to be intersected by the west line aforesaid, by reason whereof the boundary lines of the United States in that quarter would not close, then, and with thereupon, such a closing line shall be established as shall be adjudged and determined to be most consistent with the true intent and meaning of the said treaty, and the said river shall not be extended in the manner in which the said commissioners may determine to the northward of the said line.

- It is agreed that His Majesty shall withdraw all his troops and garrisons from every post and place within the limits of the United States, by the 1st day of June next, and that all settlers and traders within the present or contemplated boundaries of the United States may and shall be protected in their persons and property, in all their rights and interests.

- It is agreed that His Majesty will cause full and complete satisfaction and compensation to be made to all vessels and property of American citizens who have been, or, during the course of the present war, shall be, illegally captured and detained, under color of authority and commissions derived from him; and that, in all cases where it shall appear that said creditors, by the operation of the said impediments, on the secular and religious laws and customs of the United States, may be obtained and actually had, to the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; and for this purpose — commissioners shall be appointed and empowered in manner following, viz.

- It is agreed that, whereas debts bona fide contracted before the peace, and remaining unpaid by American debtors to British creditors, have probably, in some instances, been prejudiced and rendered more precarious by the lawful impediments which, after the peace, did for some time exist, to their being prosecuted and recovered, it is agreed that, in all cases where it shall appear that the said creditors, by the operation of the said impediments, on the secular and religious laws and customs of the United States, may be obtained and actually had, to the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, (it being understood that in these damages, interest shall be included only in cases where, according to equity and good conscience, all things being considered, it ought to be allowed and paid) the United States will make full and complete satisfaction and compensation to the said creditors for the same and for this purpose commissioners shall be appointed and authorized in the manner prescribed in the preceding articles with these differences only, viz: if the said vessels, so as to clear from the said United States and their citizens to carry, in their own vessels, the burden of one hundred tons, or under, from the said United States, any goods, wares, and merchandise, which British vessels now carry from the United States, to any of His Majesty's islands and ports in the West Indies; and shall as well have and receive rates of freight and charges of every description as British vessels do, or shall be agreed by the United States; and only such other charges, imposts, and duties, as British vessels and cargoes laden in, and arriving from, the United States, now are, or hereafter shall be, lawfully liable to in the said islands and ports; and that it shall and may be lawful for the said American vessels to purchase, take, and carry away, from the said islands and ports, such ordinary and natured goods and manufactures of the said islands as they may think proper, and paying only such duties and charges on exportation as such vessels and cargoes, if British, would be liable to: Provided always, That they carry and land the same in the United States, and at no place whatever out of the same; but being expressly agreed and declared, that West India productions or manufactures shall not be transported in American vessels, either from His Majesty's said islands, or from the United States, to any part of the world except the United States, reasonable sea stores excepted, and excepting, also, rum made in the United States from West India molasses.

It is agreed that all the other ports and territories of His Majesty, whatsoever and wheresoever, (not comprehend within the limits of his chartered trading companies) shall be free and open to the citizens of the United States, to trade and establish themselves therein as well for the profit of their own country as the benefit of His Majesty; and that therein they shall enjoy all the commercial rights, and pay out the same duties and charges, either on importation or exportation, as if they were British merchants' vessels and cargoes, except that they shall pay the same rate of tonnage as may be charged on British vessels in the United States. And, on the other hand, the vessels of the United States, and the citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges that belong to British, and open to British merchants and subjects, and that, and their vessels and cargoes, shall therein enjoy all the commercial rights, and pay only the same duties and charges, as if they were American merchants' vessels and cargoes; it being the intention of this article that, in His Majesty's territories (except as before excepted) American merchant and merchant vessels shall be exactly on the same footing with British merchants and merchant vessels, and that British merchants and merchant vessels shall, in all the territories of the United States, be exactly on the same footing with American merchants and merchant vessels, tonnage only excepted.

The trade between the United States, and the British West India Islands shall be considered as regulated and explained by the present article, and therefore as being excluded from the operation of the following articles: it is agreed that all the productions and manufactures of His Majesty's dominions in any part of the world may freely be imported in British or American vessels into the United States, subject equally and alike to the duties on importation and exportation, as if they were British vessels; and that all the productions and manufactures of other States may be freely imported in American or British vessels into any of the said dominions of His Majesty, subject equally to the duties on importation which may there be established.

And to the end that these duties may be made reciprocal, it is agreed that all articles for that purpose shall have the same rate of duties as may be laid upon them in the United States.

It is agreed that when Great Britain is at war and the United States neutral, no prizes taken from, or by Great Britain, shall be sold in the United States; and that, when the United States are at war and Great Britain neutral, no prizes taken now, or by the United States, shall be sold in His Majesty's dominions. It is further agreed, that if it should unfortunately happen that Great Britain and the United States should be at war, there shall be no privates or commission by them against each other, and that the merchants and others residing in each other's countries shall be allowed nine months to remove with their effects, and shall not be liable to capture on their voyages, or for their respective quarters.

It is agreed that British subjects who now hold lands in the United States, and American citizens who now hold land in His Majesty's dominions, shall continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their estates therein, and may grant, and sell, and devise the same, as, and to whom they please, in like manner as if they were freeholders and entitled to all the incidents and privileges of their respective grants.

It is agreed that neither debts due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares or money which they may have in the funds, or in the public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or national differences, be requisitioned or confiscated; except as the existing circumstances of the case may require, and in case of war, and only during the duration of the same, payment may be suspended, it being both unjust and impolitic that debts and engagements contracted and made by individuals, having confidence in each other, and in their respective Governments, should ever be destroyed or impaired by national authority, on account of national differences and discontents."

From the 6th to the 30th of August nothing of importance occurred. On the 30th day of August, Lord Grenville wrote me a letter, and enclosed two draughts or projects of treaties. The letter is in these words, viz: August 30th, 1794.

Sir: I have now the honor to transmit to you two projects, the one for regulating all points in dispute between His Majesty's subjects, the other for the establishment of commercial regulations. You will perceive that I have proceeded in forming these projects on the foundation of the most pacific terms of commerce communicated to me by the American Commissioners, and have occasionally made such variations as seemed to me to be just and expedient. I have thought that some time might be saved by communicating them to you in this manner. Whenever you shall have sufficiently considered them to be enabled to converse, either on the whole, or on any distinct branches of so extensive a subject, I shall be very much at your order, having very sincerely at heart the speedy and favorable conclusion of our negotiation.

It would have been more satisfactory to me if I had found it practicable to send you these projects sooner: but you will, I am sure, be sensible of the circumstances which must, at this juncture, interfere with the preparation of them. I have always been anxious to conciliate the interests of both nations by a settlement of lasting harmony and friendship between our two countries. Even in the state in which I now send you these papers, I am apprehensive that some verbal corrections may occur as necessary to give full effect to the objects intended to be provided for. I have accordingly marked, for your information, the points on which we have not yet arrived, and I think it very probable that you will occasionally touch on these considerations, for which no provision is made in these projects. But I have preferred saving that the communication in its present shape rather than that any further delay should be created, and I trust, with real confidence, to your candor, respecting such further suggestions as I may occasionally see ground to state to you. I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

The Honorable Mr. JAY, &c. &c.

The draughts, or projects, are as follows, viz:

First, the Preamble.

Article 1. It is agreed that His Majesty will withdraw all his troops and garrisons from the posts within the boundary line assigned by the treaty of peace between the United States and the United States, the other for the establishment of commercial regulations. You will perceive that I have proceeded in forming these projects on the foundation of the most pacific terms of commerce communicated to me by the American Commissioners, and have occasionally made such variations as seemed to me to be just and expedient. It shall at all times be free to His Majesty’s subjects, and to the Indians who are to the southward and westward of the lakes, to pass and repass with their goods and merchandises, and to carry on their commerce within or without the jurisdiction of the said posts, in the manner hitherto accustomed, and without any hindrance or molestation from the officers or citizens of the United States. The several waters, carrying places, and roads, adjacent to the lakes, and by the means of which the above-mentioned purpose is to be effected, are open to His Majesty’s subjects, and to the Indians, for that purpose; and no impediment or obstacle shall be given to the passage of goods or merchandise of any kind, nor shall any duty be attempted to be levied upon them.

Art. 21. In order to remove all uncertainty with respect to the said boundary line, assigned to the United States, and to render the said boundary line ascertained and determinable on the one hand, and to prevent the inconvenience which might arise from the manner of determining it, on the other hand, there shall be appointed, between the two contracting parties to the said treaty, and are to be considered as forming a part thereof:

First. That, whereas doubts have arisen as to what river was truly intended, under the name of the river St. Croix, mentioned in the said treaty, and forming a part of the boundary therein described, that question shall be referred to the final decision of commissioners to be appointed by the said parties, to be named by His Majesty, and his representatives, and by the United States, and their representatives, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the same; and the commissioners shall be named by His Majesty, and one by the United States, and that the said two commissioners shall agree on the choice of a third, or, if they cannot so agree, that they shall each propose one person, and that, of the two thus proposed, the third shall be chosen in the manner hereinafter prescribed; and that the said three commissioners so appointed shall be sworn impartially to examine and decide the said question, according to such documents as shall respectively be laid before them, on the part of the British Government, and of the United States.

Secondly. That whereas it is now understood that the river Mississippi would, at no point thereof, be intersected by such westward line as is described in the said treaty; and, whereas it was stipulated, by the said treaty, that the navigation of the Mississippi should be free to both parties, it is agreed that the boundary line shall run in the manner described by the said treaty, from the Lake Huron, to the northward of the Isle Philipps, in Lake Superior; and that from thence the said line shall extend to the bottom of West Bay, in the said lake; and from thence, in a due west course, to the river of the Red Lake, or eastern branch of the Mississippi, and down the said branch to the main river of the Mississippi, and that, as well on the said branch, as on the lake Superior, and Lake Michigan, the navigation of the waters, there coming from the said branch, or running by those lakes, shall be free and unobstructed; whereupon it is understood, that the navigation of the said water communication shall be intersected by a line running due north from the mouth of the River St. Croix, which falls into the Mississippi below the falls of St. Anthony, and that the boundary line shall proceed from such point of intersection, in a due southerly course, along the said line to the Mississippi, and thence to the nearest point of the shore of the United States, and afterwards to the nearest point of the coasts of the same, or any part thereof, until it comes to the point where the said line will intersect the river Mississippi; and from thence the navigation of the said river shall be free to both parties, and His Majesty’s subjects shall always be permitted to enter freely into the bay, ports, and creeks, on the American side, and to land and dwell there for the purposes of commerce; and, for greater certainty, the undersigned ministers have annexed to each of the copies of the present extract, a map made from the best surveys and reconnaissances, with the situation of the said boundaries, and the boundaries of the United States, as fixed by the said treaty of peace, and by this treaty, together with all the other articles of the said treaty, are hereby recognized, ratified, and forever confirmed.

And it is further agreed, that in all other respects, as well as to the navigation of the British men and goods, in such waters, and to such intercommunications, as shall be preferred to them, by British creditors, or their representatives, in virtue of this article, and impartially to determine the same, according to the true intent of this article, and of the treaty of peace.

And the said commissioners, in awarding such sums as shall appear to them to be due to the said creditors by virtue of the conditions of the said treaty, or by virtue of any former arrangement, shall make due allowances for all amounts, be it principal or interest, in respect of the said debts, and to decide respecting the same, according to the merits of the several cases, due regard being had to all the circumstances thereof, and as equity and justice shall appear to them to require; and the said commissioners shall empower their subordinates, in their several respective regions, to pass all such evidences and releases, and according as they shall think most consistent with equity and justice, all written depositions, or books, or papers, or copies, or extracts thereof, every such deposition, book, paper, copy, or extract, being duly authenticated, according to the legal forms now respectively existing in the two countries, or in such other manner as the said commissioners shall see fit to prescribe and require.

Three of the said commissioners shall constitute a board, and be empowered to do any act appertaining to the said commission; provided that, in every such case, one of the commissioners named on each side, and the fifth commissioner, chosen as above, shall be present; and all decisions shall be made by the majority of voices of the commissioners present.

The award of the said commissioners, or of any three of them, as aforesaid, shall, in all cases, be final and conclusive, both as to the justice of the claim, and to the amount of the sum to be paid to the claimants; and the United States undertake to cause the same to be paid to such claimants as shall be determined in such manner as is above provided for; and at such time as shall be awarded by the said commissioners; and on condition of such releases to be given by the claimant of his demands against individuals, as to them shall appear just and reasonable.

And it is further agreed, that, if it shall appear that, in the course of the war, loss and damage has been sustained by His Majesty’s subjects, by way of vessels and merchandise, such capture having been made, either within the limits of the jurisdiction of the said States, or by vessels armed in the ports of the said States, or by vessels commanded or owned by the citizens of the said States, the United States will make full satisfaction for such loss or damage, the same being to be ascertained by commissioners, in the manner already mentioned in this article.

Art. 8th. It is agreed that, with respect to the neutral commerce which one party may carry on with the European powers, respectively, and in war, the principles to be observed are, in the first place, those of the United States, and reciprocally by the United States towards Great Britain, shall always, and in all points, be the same as those which shall at that time be observed by the said parties, respectively; towards the most favored neutral nations of Europe, with the exception of such particular privileges as may, before the commencement of the war to which this convention relates, have been accorded by one or the other of the said powers, and which may be extended by mutual treaty or extension of privileges or modifications as may occasionally be established by special treaty, between Great Britain and the United States, for their mutual convenience.

Art. 9th. It is agreed that, in all cases, the vessels shall be captured or detained, on just suspicion of having on board enemies' property, or of carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war, the said vessels shall be brought to the nearest or most convenient port; and that all proper measures shall be taken to prevent delay in deciding the case of ships so brought in for adjudication, and in the payment or recovery of any indemnification adjudged to be granted to the said parties, absolutely and without delay.

Art. 10th. When one of the contracting parties is engaged in war, and the other remains neutral, the said neutral Power shall not suffer the ships, vessels, goods, or merchandise, of the other, which may be taken at sea or elsewhere, by the first party, to be brought into any of its ports or dominions, and much less to be there sold or exchanged; but shall publicly forbid any thing of the kind. And in all cases, which may arise, either of the contracting parties, or their people, or subjects, so taken, at sea, or elsewhere, shall be carried into the ports or countries of the other, by the enemy, neither the same, nor any part thereof, shall be allowed to be sold or exchanged in the said country or any other part of the dominions of the said neutral Power: The master of the ship or vessel so taken, as also the mariners and passengers of every description, shall, as soon as they arrive, be immediately set at liberty; and the said ship or vessel so brought, shall not be permitted to stay in that harbor, but shall be obliged immediately to leave the port, with her goods, merchandise, and lading, and without being allowed to return to the same, or to any other port in the dominions of the said neutral party: Provided, nevertheless, that nothing in this article shall be construed to derogate from the public treaties which have already been entered into by either of the contracting parties with other nations; but in so far as such treaties do not interfere, and in all cases to which they do, the said parties shall remain in full force, and shall be executed accordingly. And the contracting parties will not, in future, conclude any treaty in derogation of the same.

Art. 11th. It is agreed that the subjects and inhabitants of the kingdoms, provinces, and dominions, of the contracting parties, shall exercise no acts of hostility or violence against each other, either by sea or by land, or in re- spective of the said powers, against the subjects or people of the said powers, and of their dominions, respectively, that the people of either party shall not receive any patent, commission, or instruction, for acting, and acting as sea at privateers, or any letters of reprimand, as they are called, from any Prince or States, enemies to the other party; neither shall they arm ships in such manner as is above said, nor go out to sea therewith, for the purpose of exercising any act of hostility or violence against the subjects or people of the contracting party; nor shall they, in any manner, injure or disturb the said subjects or people; to which end, sufficient laws and regulations shall, if necessary, be provided; and, as often as is required by either party, strict and express prohibitions shall be renewed and published, in all the territories, provinces, and dominions, of each contracting party, wherever, that no one shall, in any wise, use such commissions, or letters of reprimand, or engage in any such acts of hostility as aforesaid, under the pain of severe punish- ments, to be inflicted on the transgressors, besides their being liable to full restitution and satisfaction to those to whom they have done any damage. Neither shall any letters of reprimand be hereafter granted by either of the said powers, to the prejudice or detriment of the subjects of the other; except, only, in such case wherein justice is denied or delayed; which denial or delay of justice shall not be regarded as verified, unless the petition of the person who desires the said letters of reprimand shall be communicated to the minister residing there in the part of the said powers, and the same shall be granted or procured, according to the principles of justice.

Art. 12th. Neither of the said contracting parties shall permit the ships or goods, belonging to the subjects of the other, to be taken within the limits of their respective jurisdictions, on their coasts, nor in the ports or rivers of their dom- inions, by ships of war, or others, having commission from any prince, republic, or city, whatsoever but, in case it should so happen, both parties shall employ their united force to obtain repairation of the damage thereby occasioned.

Art. 13th. If it should unfortunately happen that a war should break out between Great Britain and the United States, the said powers, respectively, shall not interfere with the said territories, with their revenues, and shall be protected from capture in their way home: Provided always, that this favor is not to extend to those who shall act contrary to the established laws. And it is further agreed, that neither delis due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares or moneys which they may have in the public funds of either party, nor other property, or contracts extending to the said territories, or to said vessels, or to other persons, or to persons acting on behalf of the said parties, shall be confiscated; it being both unjust and impolitic that debts and engagements contracted and made by individuals, having confidence in each other, and in their respective Governments, should ever be destroyed or impaired, by national authorities and acts of national governments.

Art. 14th. It is agreed that British subjects, who now hold lands in the territories of the United States, and American citizens, who now hold lands in His Majesty's dominions, shall continue to hold them, according to the tenure and usage of their estates and titles therein; and may grant and sell, and devise the same, as, and to whom, the use thereof may appertain, and that neither the said heirs or assigns, shall, so far as may respect the said lands, and the legal remedies incident thereto, be regarded as aliens.

COMMERCIAL PROJECT.

The Preamble.

Art. 1st. It is agreed that there shall be, between the dominions of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, and the territories of the United States, a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation, and a free admission of all ships belonging to either party, whether the same be ships of war or merchant vessels; and that the subjects and inhabitants of the said countries, respectively, shall have liberty, freely and securely, and without hindrance or molestation of any kind, to come, with their said ships and their cargoes, to the lands, countries, cities, ports, places, and rivers, within the dominions and territories aforesaid; to enter into the same, to return thereto, and to remain and reside therein, without any limitation of time; also to hire, purchase, and possess, houses and warehouses, for the purposes of trade; and to employ their subjects or merchandise, in such manner as shall afford the said parties the utmost facility of doing business, and shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce; and subject always, as to what respects this article, to the general laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

Art. 2d. It shall be free for the two contracting parties, respectively, to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, to reside in each of the said countries, respectively, and to employ such consuls, in the management of all matters relating to trade; and to make such rules and regulations as shall be agreeable, and not otherwise; and such consuls shall enjoy those liberties and rights which belong to them by reason of their functions: but either party may except, from the general liberty of residence of such consuls, such particular places as shall be thought necessary, and shall be so excepted.

Art. 3d. The vessels of the two contracting parties, respectively, coming to the dominions or territories aforesaid, shall enjoy the same liberty in respect of the entry and discharge of their lawful cargoes, and all other regulations which respect the general convenience and advantage of commerce, as now are, or shall, at any time, be, enjoyed by any other foreign nations in any of the said places, and which shall exist, or may hereafter be established in that respect, and by which 62 the vessels of the one party shall pay, in the parts of the other, any higher or other duties than shall be paid, in similar circumstances, by the vessels of the foreign nation the most favored in that respect, or by the vessels of the party into whose ports they shall come.

Art. 5th. No prohibition shall be laid in any of the territories or dominions aforesaid, by one of the contracting parties, on the importation of any article, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, in any of the territories or dominions of the other party, or of British vessels, into any of the territories or dominions of the United States, in any of the territories or dominions of the other party.

Art. 6th. With respect to the territories and dominions of His Britannic Majesty in the West Indies, the following arrangements have been agreed to by the contracting parties:

His Majesty consents that it shall and may be lawful, during the time hereinafter limited, for the citizens of the United States of America in journey to any of His Majesty's islands and ports in the West Indies, from the United States, in their own vessels, not being above the burden of seventy tons, any goods or merchandise being of the growth or produce of the said States, which it is or may be lawful to carry to the said islands and ports from the said States in British vessels; and that the said American vessels and their cargoes shall pay there no other or higher duties than shall be payable by British vessels, in similar circumstances: And that it shall be lawful to the said American citizens to purchase, load, and carry away, in their said vessels, to the United States, from the said islands and ports, all such articles, being of the growth and produce of the said islands, as may, by law, be carried from them to the said States in British vessels; and subject only to the same duties and charges on exportation, to which British vessels are or shall be subject in similar circumstances.

Provided, always, that they carry and land the same in the United States only: it being expressly agreed and declared that, during the continuance of this article, the United States will prohibit the carrying any West India productions or manufactures in American vessels, either from His Majesty's dominions, in any of his vessels, or from his other dominions, in any other vessels, excepting such as shall be reasonable sea stores excepted, and excepting also rum made in the United States from West India molasses.

It is agreed that this article, and every matter and thing therein contained, shall continue to be in force during the continuance of the war in which His Majesty is now engaged, and so long as the war shall continue two years from and after the day of the signature hereof, and be proportioned to the preceding articles of peace by which the same may be terminated.

And it is further agreed, that, at the expiration of the said term, the two contracting parties will treat further concerning the arrangement of their commerce in this respect, according to the situation in which His Majesty may then consider himself as with respect to the West Indies, and with a view to the mutual advantage and extension of commerce.

Art. 7th. This treaty, and all the matters therein contained, except the sixth article, shall continue to be in force for twelve years from the day of the exchange of the ratifications thereof and, during the continuance of this treaty, there shall be no other articles, any contravention of which shall prevent the full and entire execution of this treaty, nor any article thereof, shall, on that account, be suspended, until representation shall have been made to the Government by the minister of the party complaining; and, even if redress shall not then be obtained, four months' notice shall be given previous to such suspension.

To the before mentioned letter, I returned the following answer, viz:

PALL MALL ROYAL HOTEL, 1st September, 1794.

My Lord:

I was yesterday honored with your lordship's letter of the 20th August, with the projects and map which accompanied it. I consider the articles in these projects as being (like those in our conversations) merely for mutual consideration.

In these projects several parting points present themselves: some of them, I presume, may be easily accommodated, but there are others which create in my mind serious apprehensions. One of these articles (being without the limits of my authority) I think I ought now to particularize: it is the one which proposes a cession of territory in the northwestern corner of the United States, at a price, which, in my opinion, many circumstances and considerations, which shall be submitted to your lordship, will restrain the United States from such a cession.

This article will entirely frustrate my hopes, if I had not reason to persuade myself that the enlarged and enlightened policy of excluding secondary from a competition with primary objects, will always harmonize with your lordship's mind. The present occasion is great, and, though critical, yet auspicious to the establishment of confidence and friendship between the two countries. With the magnitude and importance of these objects, the projects in the papers generally do not strike me as being, comparatively. I have reason to think that, on viewing these two demands, your lordship had many difficulties growing out of the subject, and probably some others, to encounter, and that your attention was divided between a multitude of great and pressing affairs.

The negotiation now becomes delicate, and I should experience more than a proportionate embarrassment were it not for my confidence in your lordship's candor and liberality, and for these sentiments of esteem, affection and respect, with which I have the honor to be, &c.

The Rt. Hon. Lord Grenville, &c.

Mr. Jay presents his compliments to Lord Grenville, and requests the favor of his lordship to name a time for receiving Mr. Jay on the subject of the proposed treaties. In the mean time, Mr. Jay has the honor of submitting the remarks, herewith enclosed, to his lordship's consideration.

The proposed alterations in our northwestern boundary, and the consequential cession and cession and demarcation of territory, appeared to me to be a point which I ought, without delay, to state to his Lordship, in the light in which it appeared to me; I therefore prepared and sent him, enclosed in a note, the following remarks, viz:

ROYAL HOTEL, PALL MALL, 4th September, 1794.

1st. That it is now understood that the river Mississippi would, in no part thereof, be intersected by a west line from the lake of the Woods.

2d. That it was stipulated by the treaty of peace, that the navigation of the river Mississippi should be free to both parties.

Admitting the fact mentioned in the first of these reasons to be well founded, it shows only that the northern and western lines of the United States do not meet and close, and, therefore, that it is necessary to fix a line on those closing. But no argument thence results that either Great Britain or the United States ought to cede or to acquire any territory further than what such closing line may possibly render unavailable.
GREAT BRITAIN.

That the Mississippi would, in no point thereof, be intersected by a west line from the Lake of the Woods, is a fact involved in too much uncertainty to be assumed as a foundation for national stipulation; for however it may be considered under the different circumstances, yet it cannot be determined.

The map sent to Mr. Jay by Lord Grenville, viz: Faden's, published in 1793, informs us that the river Mississippi has been ascended only as far up as about the forty-fifth degree of north latitude—that is, about a degree above the highest point of the Great Lakes, towards which course towards the north are yet to be discovered.

On the same map, Faden lays down a stream connected with the Marshy lake, near the forty-fifth degree of latitude, and thus designates it, "Mississippi by conjecture."

He also lays down on the same map a stream connected with the White Bear lake, near the latitude forty-six, and the same map (Faden's) designates it, "The Bear river."

He also lays down, on the same map, a stream connected with the Red lake, in latitude forty-seven, and thus designates it, "Red lake river, or Labrador's Mississippi."

Inasmuch, therefore, as three different streams, found in the immense wilderness above latitude forty-five, are connected with the United States, the Mississippi, as far as being certain how far that river runs to the north, we are really yet to learn where it does run, and which of the rivers in that wildness it is. How then can it be assumed, as a fact resting on good evidence, that the Mississippi would at no point thereof be intersected by a west line from the Lake of the Woods?

Individuals differing about boundaries depending on the course and extent of brooks and streams, settle questions of that kind by actual surveys. States usually, and with good reason, do the same. Why be content with delusive conjectures and probabilities, when absolute certainty can easily be had? Let a survey be accurately made by joint commissioners, involving a joint claim, of the United States are ready to adopt that measure, and to enter into the necessary stipulations and arrangements.

If it should appear, on such a survey, that the west line would intersect the Mississippi, no room for further question or dispute will remain but if the contrary should prove to be the case, then, as the northern and western lines of the United States would not close, the manner of closing them will naturally and necessarily come under consideration. Several modes of closing them may be devised, neither of which may be altogether agreeable to both parties. Unless they shall be able to agree, let Joint commissioners, at joint expense, and upon oath, fix a closing line, the United States to remain, with the said line, to the north and mouth of peace.

The United States are ready to enter into such eventual stipulations as may be necessary for that purpose.

The second reason assigned for this cession, is, "that it was stipulated by the treaty of peace that the navigation of the Mississippi should be free to both parties, and that it would be necessary, when it is ascertained, if any line should be taken in the United States, to extend the navigable part toward the north." This inference seems to be evident. A right freely to navigate a bay, a straight, a sound, or a river, is perfect without, and does not necessarily presuppose the dominion and property of lands adjacent to it.

But, although, from a right to navigate the river Mississippi, a right to adjacent lands cannot be inferred, yet, when that right is connected with the circumstance that both parties were to be bounded by a line terminating at the river, it is thought that the same principle is as far so as to be certain how far that river runs to the north, we are really yet to learn where it does run, and which of the rivers in that wildness it is. How then can it be assumed, as a fact resting on good evidence, that the Mississippi would at no point thereof be intersected by a west line from the Lake of the Woods.

The new United States possesses from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia to the head of Connecticut river, then down that river to the forty-fifth degree of latitude, then on that line of latitude to the river Iroquois, then (quitting that line of latitude) to the Lake Ontario, then, from lake to lake, through their connecting waters, until it arrives at the Lake of the Woods, and passing through it, to the northwesternmost point thereof, proceeds on a due west course to the Mississippi, &c.

It is, was always well known, and the map show it, that the Lake of the Woods is situated at a great distance in the extreme north of the United States, and from that place, as it is situated, it is not possible for its waters to be joined by the navigable part of the Mississippi, and consequently that a due west line from the Lake of the Woods must of necessity strike the river above those falls, and as far above at the latitude of this lake is above the latitude of the falls.

Again: it was not then known, nor is it yet known, how far the river Mississippi navigable beyond those falls; nor can it be ascertained, by the help of the articles that have been found on between them; but it is certain, that the particles, therefor, being entirely ignorant of the extent, and of the course, and of the character of the river high above the falls, could not possibly have judged, or divined, or guessed, whether the place or part of the river at which the west line would strike the water, or in what exact or infinite degree, and to what purpose it might be necessary to bring it to the first navigable water of the river. Yet nothing like this is to be found in the treaty.

It is not difficult to discern from the treaty, and so was the fact, that other ideas and views governed the direction of the two lines.

The question, then was, or where would it be most convenient to both parties, and, all things considered, where would be most wise and prudent, that the boundaries between them should be fixed? Two lines were proposed and considered; one from the point before mentioned, on Connecticut river, and running straight on the line of the 45th degree of latitude, west to the Mississippi; the other was the one adopted and established by the treaty. The official papers of the British ministers which respect that negotiation, will probably show that Great Britain had the choice of these two lines, and that she preferred the latter.

This choice and preference gives no support to the idea that she contemplated navigable waters in that part of the country which is now part of the United States. The British have always contended that all waters that do not have navigable value, and all mutual consent, terminated at the northwesternmost point of the Lake of the Woods; it was agreed that the Mississippi should bound the United States on the west; nothing then remained but to agree on the course which the closing line, from that lake to the river, should run; and a due west course was agreed upon, without any expectation or design of interfering with the navigable waters of that river, or of obstructing or impeding the navigation of the river, being free to both parties, was afterthought, and gave occasion to a new and subsequent article, viz: the 8th.

Even in the drawing that article, when the navigation of the river became an object of contemplation, no disposition was introduced into the right mentioned in that article, and the lines designated in the second, third, and fourth articles, as they are entitled to use or any other, commenced where the boundary between Canada and the navigable water of the Mississippi, which doubtless had been the case, had such a communication been then in view, especially considering the absolute uncertainty and extreme improbability of that river, and they were not entitled to the use of the Woods.

From the before mentioned circumstances and considerations, it seems fairly to result, that the two reasons assigned for the cession in question, as a matter of equity and right, do not afford it a solid foundation.

If this conclusion be just, it precludes the necessity of showing at large, that some of the inferences ascribed to the said two reasons, are mere conjectures, and that the whole map; each of which includes more than thirty thousand square miles; and that, without taking into the computation the extensive country lying between (what in the subjoined diagrams are for the purpose of computation regarded as)} the west sides of these tracts and the Mississippi, and to the southward of the west line form the Lake of the Woods; and which country would on either of these plans become also annexed to Canada."

In order that you may have an accurate idea of the lines proposed by Lord Grenville, I here insert copies of the diagrams mentioned in the foregoing remarks.

[Nos. 1 and 2.]

On the 6th September, Lord Grenville wrote me the following note, viz:

"Downing Street, September 5, 1794.

"Lord Grenville presents his compliments to Mr. Jay. He has received Mr. Jay's note, with the enclosed remarks, and will be glad to see him at his office tomorrow, at twelve o'clock. Lord Grenville has, in the mean time, the honor to enclose to Mr. Jay some observations which have occurred to him on the perusal of the paper which he received from Mr. Jay."

The observations enclosed with this note were as follows, viz:

Observations respecting the Northwestern boundary of the United States of America.

It cannot for a moment be admitted, that the proposed arrangement on the subject of the northwestern boundary, is properly to be considered in the manner in which it is spoken of by Mr. Jay, namely, as a cession, or delereliction of territory on the part of the United States.

This boundary to the north-west, as fixed by the treaty, is a line "to be drawn from the Lake of the Woods, in a due west course, to the Mississippi." There are in this agreement two distinct parts:

1st. That the boundary line should be drawn in a due westerly course from the Lake of the Woods; and,

2d. That it likewise be drawn in a due westerly course to the Mississippi.

If such a line cannot in fact be drawn, between those points, there can be no ground for considering one part of this stipulation as more permanently fixed than the other, or as affording a more equitable ground for any future arrangement; and it would be quite as reasonable for this country to consider as a cession of territory, on our part, the adoption of any other boundary than that of a due westerly line striking the Mississippi, as for the United States to urge that such a cession exists on their part, if such a line is not drawn from the Lake of the Woods.

This arrangement must be considered as that which is said to result from the free navigation of the Mississippi on which head it seems sufficient for the present to remark, that such a right evidently and necessarily implies the possibility of access to that river, without passing through a foreign territory.

Little objection occurs to the making an exact survey, exclusive of the stipulations in the treaty should be found to be compatible with the real geography of the country, it is certain that no further dispute could exist on that point.

But, if we have from the best information on the subject sufficient reason to believe that no such line can be drawn, then it is certain that the treaty, if it can exist, will be exclusively the interest of the two countries with relation to each other are under discussion, with a view to lasting friendship, to leave unsettled so material a ground of difference as that of an unascertained boundary. The mode of settling that point is necessarily connected with the general result of the present negotiation. If no more can be accomplished on any other point, than the doing strict justice between the parties, according to existing treaties and the laws of nations, the appointment of commissioners, as proposed by Mr. Jay, does not appear ill adapted to obtain the same object as to this point; provided that those commissioners are distinctly enabled to take into their consideration the 8th article, and give to that stipulation such effect as they shall think it ought in justice to have, in the formation of a new boundary line.

The negotiation should lead to new stipulations of mutual advantage, no subject appears more proper for the application of that principle, than one in which there exist two doubtful and contradictory claims, founded on an agreement which cannot by any possibility be executed; especially if it be true, as it is considered here, that this is a point where any advantage whatever it should be, which Great Britain might acquire, would, under all circumstances, be found at least equally beneficial to the United States.

Downing Street, 5th September, 1794.

Expecting that, when we met, the first of the above projects would, as first in the order of things, be first considered, my attention was more immediately confined to it; but the time consumed in preparing the remarks before mentioned left me very little leisure to employ in forming satisfactory opinions on the different parts of this project; several, however, occurred to me, of which I made short notes; they are as follows: You will find the numbers marked ed at the end of the present paragraph.

Note 1. In what capacity are they so to remain? as British subjects or American citizens? If the first, a time to make their election should be assigned.

2. If his Majesty's subjects are to pass into the American territories for the purposes of Indian trade, ought not American citizens to be permitted to pass into His Majesty's territories for the like purpose? No principle ought to be omitted, that the United States indemnify creditors for losses and damages caused by the impediments mentioned.

3. The word had is not sufficiently definite; the object being not only sentence, decree, or judgment, but payment and satisfaction.

4. In the absence of reciprocity, which benefits both parties, should they not be exacted, and not be extended to the whole of this article?

5. Why the commission? Why not leave the river St. Croix to meet and decide in London? Is it not probable that actual visits and surveys, and the testimony and examination of witnesses on the spot, will be necessary?

6. Why confine the navigation of the Mississippi to where the same bounds the territory of the United States?

7. Why should perpetual commercial privileges be granted to Great Britain on the Mississippi, &c., when she declines granting perpetual commercial privileges to the United States anywhere?

8. And this preamble, connected with the treaty as to the negroes carried away, implies that the United States have been aggressors; it also unnecessarily impeaches their judicial proceedings.

9. In the strict sense of the word, ought not more to be asked, than that the United States indemnify creditors for losses and damages caused by the impediments mentioned.

10. The word had is not sufficiently definite; the object being not only sentence, decree, or judgment, but payment and satisfaction.

11. The article ought to be flexible accords according to exchange; this should be fixed.

12. Why not place these captures on the footing with the others, and charge the United States only in cases where justice and complete compensation cannot be had from judicial proceedings?

13. Why provide only for neutral commerce with European nations? The whole of this article is so indefinite as to be useless.

14. What are or shall be deemed contraband in the sense of this article?

15. As the United States have permitted the French to sell their produce in the United States, should not the restriction made to Dutch goods, at the expiration of the present war?

16. There should be an illustration against the imprisonment of each other's people.

17. This united force should be confined to the moment of aggression.

18. Why the word and commerce?

On the 6th September, agreeable to Lord Grenville's appointment, I waited upon him; we spent several hours in discussing the several topics which arose from these notes, and some others, which in the course of the conversation occurred. He promised to take what I had offered into consideration, and manifested throughout the conversation every disposition to accommodate, that could be wished; we may not fairly be able to agree. If we should not, it would, in my opinion, occasion mutual regret, for he believes that the greater part of the cabinet, and particularly Lord Grenvillage, are really disposed and desirous not only to settle all differences amicably, but also to establish permanent peace, good will, and friendship, between the two countries. On the 5th of September I received from Lord Grenville the following letter, enclosing the papers mentioned in it, viz:

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, Sept. 7, 1794.

Sir: In order to narrow as much as possible the objects of our discussions, I have stated in the enclosed paper what appears to me on the different points to which your notes apply, except the second, third, and fourth articles of those notes, which I have reserved for further examination and inquiry. I expect that, by Tuesday or Wednesday at latest, I shall be able to converse further with you on those points, as well as with respect to what you have added. The papers in dispute are those of no great importance, and shall not be included in the following summary, but they certainly do not relate to the least important parts of our negotiation. With respect to them, I can only say, that you shall continue to find me the same openness of discussion, and the same desire to state to you, without reserve, to what I think should be conformed to the object of speedy conciliation, and what the interest and honor of my country, and the duty which I owe to the King, oblige me to insist upon, as necessary for that object. It is with sentiments of very real esteem and respect, that I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

GRENVILLE.

P. S. I also send a note of two alterations to be made in the commercial project in consequence of our conversation of yesterday.

To the Hon. Mr. Jay, &c.

Observations, (enclosed with the above letter.)

No. 1. In consequence of the observation contained in the first remark, Lord Grenville proposes to add, in the first article of the project, after the words "property thereof," at the end of the first paragraph, these words: "and such as are exports of the United States, and not be included in any treaty of commerce, if at the same time, the United States, or to take any oath of allegiance to the Government thereof, but shall be at full liberty to do (if they think proper) within any period after the evacuation of the posts, which period is hereafter assigned to them for making their choice in this respect." Consenting of the length of the first article, now increased by this additional provision, it may be better to divide it into two—the second beginning with the words, "It shall at all times be free," &c. &c.

Articles 2, 3, and 4, reserved for further examination.

5. The commerce in the commodities of the river St. Croix is proposed to be made in London, because it is supposed that the great mass of evidence on the subject is here. A power may be given to them, either to direct a local survey, or to adjoin to America, but it seems very unlikely that this would become necessary.

6. No idea was entertained of confining the mutual navigation of the Mississippi to that part of the river where it bounds the territory of the United States, that the purpose was intended only to have reference to the free admission of British merchants and ships, into the bays, ports, and creeks, of the United States, on the Mississippi; it would have been proposed at all, to what is so distinctly stipulated in the treaty of peace, respecting the British possessions and the purposes of expressly extending that stipulation to every part of the waters now proposed to form a part of the boundary.

7. The right of admission into ports, &c. for the purposes of trade, and the general liberty of commerce, spoken of in this article, are not considered as commercial privileges, such as are usually made the subject of temporary reciprocal treaties of commerce, but to be peculiar to the relations of Great Britain, by no means to decline to give the same rights permanently to America, as with respect to those parts of her dominions which are open to foreign commerce. These rights are, indeed, now generally acknowledged to be incident to a state of amity and good correspondence; and if it is proposed to particularize them, as with respect to the Mississippi, this is done only with the view of removing the possibility of such doubts as were formerly raised upon the subject.

8. On the fullest reconsideration of this preamble, Lord Grenville sees no ground to think it liable to the objection made by Mr. Jay, particularly when compared with the preamble proposed for the fourth article. The provisions of both articles are general and comprehending individuals. The truth of those allegations is referred to the decision of the commissioners. Lord Grenville's opinion respecting the prior agreement of the United States, as well as his reasons for that opinion, are well known to Mr. Jay; but he has no wish to introduce into the proposed treaties any discussion of that point. He is therefore ready to consider any form of words which Mr. Jay may suggest, so as to remove the objections he has to those articles as they relate to individuals, and conciliation between the Governments; and this applies equally to the remarks Nos. 9 and 10.

11. The substitution of the word specie, as suggested by Mr. Jay, seems fully to meet the object here mentioned.

12. What Mr. Jay here desires, was intended to be done, and was indeed conceived to be implied in the general words at the end of the article. But Lord Grenville sees no objection to the insertion of express words for the purpose.

13. Lord Grenville explained to Mr. Jay, this morning, the reason of the insertion of the word Europeans, in the place here referred to. The subject is connected with the larger consideration to which their conversation led, and from the further discussion of which Lord Grenville is inclined to hope that mutual advantage may arise. Mr. Jay will observe, that the subject to which his remark, No. 15, applies, is one instance among many, which might be brought to show that this article would be insufficient.

14. To meet the objection which was this morning suggested in conversation on this article, Lord Grenville would propose the adoption of the following additional article, to come in immediately after the eighth. Lord Grenville has, in conformity to what was mentioned by Mr. Jay, used the words of Vattel:

15. He accordingly proposes to reconsider what is in future to be esteemed contraband, it is agreed that, under the said denomination shall be comprehended, in addition to the articles for the purposes of war, by land or sea, such as cannon, muskets, mortars, petards, bombs, grenades, carcasses, carriages for cannon, musket rests, bandoleers, gunpowder, match, saltpetre, ball, pikes, swords, headpieces, cuirasses, halberds, lances, javelins, horses, horse furniture, holsters, belts, and generally all other implements of war, such as timber for shipbuilding, far, or rosina, sheet copper, sails, hemp, and cordage, and generally whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels; unwrought iron and fir planks only excepted. And all the above articles are hereby declared to be just objects of confiscation, whenever they are attempted to be carried to an enemy.

16. This remark seems also perfectly just, and will be best met by omitting the concluding part of this article.

17. Lord Grenville thinks it highly desirable to maintain this article in its present form.

18. Lord Grenville sees no reason whatever to object to this article.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Commercial Project—Observations.

Art. 2. Omit these words: "the same being of the nation on whose behalf they shall be appointed, and not otherwise"; and insert, in lieu thereof, "the same being first approved by the Government of the country in which they shall be so appointed to reside and not otherwise,"

"by which the vessels of the one party shall pay, in the ports of the other, any higher or other duties than shall be paid in similar circumstances by the vessels of the foreign nation the most favored in that respect, or any higher or other duties than shall be paid in similar cases by the vessels of the party itself." Thus, sir, I have given you a very particular and correct account of the negotiation. Many observations and explanatory remarks might be added. I might also inform you, that I had strenuously urged the justice of compensation for the detention of the posts; and that I consider the privilege of trading to the West Indies as providing for claims of that kind. On this privilege, and the probability of its being revived after the expiration of the terms and for its duration, I could urge more, but it does not strike me as necessary to go into further details, nor indeed could I at present find time for the purpose.

It will not escape you that the articles, now under consideration, will doubtless undergo many alterations, before they assume their final form; in which they will either be accepted or rejected; and, therefore, that it would not be properly published them at present. I think that, in the course of a few weeks, the questions, now under discussion, will be decided. No time shall be lost in communicating to you the result.

Another subject remains to be mentioned. It appeared to me advisable that our people should have precise and plain intimation of the maritime law of nations, universally acknowledged, in cases of capture. For that purpose, I applied to Sir William Scott, and requested him, in concert with Dr. Nicholl, to prepare them. We conversed on the subject, and I explained to him my views and objects.

On the 10th of September I received them, enclosed with the following letter from Sir William, which I insert on account of the friendly disposition towards our country which it manifests, and which appears to me to be less uncommon here than we generally suppose, viz:

To His Excellency John Jay, Esq. &c.

SIR: I have the honor of sending the paper drawn up by Dr. Nicholl and myself; it is longer and more particular than, perhaps, you expected, it would not appear to be an error on the better side rather to be minute, than to be too reserved, in the information we had to give; and it will be in your excellency's power either to apply the whole or such parts as may appear more immediately pertinent to the objects of your inquiry.

I take the liberty of adding that, in two or three times, I think myself was particularly honored by any communications from you, either in writing or otherwise, on this subject, or after your return, on any subject in which you may suppose that my situation can give me the power of being at all useful to the joint interests of both countries; if they should ever turn upon points in which the duties of my official station appear to me to impose upon me an obligation of reserve, I shall have no hesitation in saying that I feel them as much. On any other points on which you may wish to have an opinion from me, you may depend on receiving one that is formed with, as much care as I can use, and delivered with all possible frankness and sincerity.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

WILLIAM SCOTT.

COMMONS, September 10, 1794.

Paper enclosed in the foregoing letter.

SIR: We have the honor of transmitting, agreeably to your excellency's request, a statement of the general principles of proceeding in prize causes, in British courts of admiralty, and of the measures proper to be taken when a ship and cargo are brought in as prize within their jurisdictions.

The general principles of proceeding cannot, in our judgment, be stated more correctly or succinctly, than we find them laid down in the following extract from a report made to His late Majesty, in the year 1753, by Sir George Lee, then Judge of the Prerogative Court, Dr. Paul, His Majesty's Advocate General, Sir Dudley Ryder, His Majesty's Attorney General, and Mr. Murray, (afterwards Lord Mansfield) His Majesty's Solicitor General:

When two Powers are at war, they have a right to make prizes of the ships, goods, and effects of each other, upon the principles of law and equity. The property of the enemy may be acquired by capture at sea; but the property of a friend cannot be taken, provided he observes his neutrality.

Hence, the law of nations has established, that the goods of an enemy, on board the ship of a friend, may be taken.

That the lawful goods of a friend, on board the ship of an enemy, ought to be restored.

That contraband goods going to the enemy, though the property of a friend, may be taken as prizes; because supplying the enemy with what enables him better to carry on the war, is a departure from neutrality.

That the casual property and prizes generally received, there is an established method of determination, whether the capture be, or be not, lawful prize.

Before the ship or goods can be disposed of by the captor, there must be a regular judicial proceeding, wherein, both parties may be heard, and condemnation thereupon as prize, in a court of admiralty, judging by the law of nations and treaties.

The proper and regular court for these condemnation is, the court of that State to whom the captor belongs.

The evidence to acquit or condemn, with, or without, costs and damages, must, in the first instance, come from the master and crew taken, viz: the papers on board, and the examination, on oath, of the master, and other principal officers: for which purpose, there are officers of admiralty in all the considerable sea ports of every maritime Power at war, to examine the captains, and other principal officers, of every ship, brought in as a prize, upon general and impartial interrogatories: if there do not appear from thence ground to condemn, as enemy's property or contraband, that comes to the enemy, there must be an acquittal, unless, from the aforesaid evidence, the property shall appear so doubtful, that it is reasonable to go into further proof thereof.

A claim of ship or goods must be supported by the oath of somebody, at least as to belief.

If the evidence of nations requires good faith; therefore, every must be provided with complete and genuine papers, and the master, at least, should be privy to the truth of the transaction.

To enforce these rules, if there be false or colorable papers; if any papers be thrown overboard; if the master and officers, examined in preparatory, grossly prevaricate; if proper ships' papers are not on board; or if the master and crew cannot say whether they have or not, contraband goods, or effects, and of nations allows, according to the different degrees of misbehavior or suspicion, arising from the fault of the ship taken, and other circumstances of the case, costs to be paid, or not to be received, by the claimants, in case of acquittal and restitution; or, on the other hand, if a seizure is made without probable cause, the captor, under a severe penalty, gives security for their good behavior; and this is referred to, and expressly stipulated, by many treaties.

Though, from the ships' papers, and the preparatory examinations, the property does not sufficiently appear to be neutral, the claimant is often indulged with time to send over affidavits to supply that defect; if he will not show the property, by sufficient affidavits, to be neutral, it is presumed to belong to the enemy. Where the property appears from evidence not on board the ship, the captor is justified in bringing her in, and excused paying costs, because he is not in fault; or, according to the circumstances of the case, may be justly entitled to receive his costs.
If the sentence of the court of admiralty is thought to be erroneous, there is, in every maritime country, a superior court of review, consisting of the most considerable persons, to whom the parties, who think themselves aggrieved, may appeal, and this superior court judges by the same rule which governs the court of admiralty, viz: the law of nations, as well as the treaties, if the point be one within the public interest, or of considerable magnitude, and if the appeal be made within a party before the law of nations, or within the time allowed by the court of admiralty.

If no appeal is offered, it is an acknowledgment of the justice of the sentence by the parties themselves, and conclusive.

In this manner of trial and adjudication is supported, alluded to, and enforced, by many treaties.

In this method, all captures at sea were tried, during the last war, by Great Britain, France, and Spain, and submitted to by the neutral Powers; in this method, by courts of admiralty acting according to the law of nations, and particular treaties, all captures at sea have immemorially been judged of in every country of Europe. Any other manner of trial and adjudication would be manifestly unjust, absurd, and impracticable.

The principles are which govern the proceedings of the prize courts.

The following are the measures which ought to be taken by the captor, and by the neutral claimant, upon a ship and cargo being brought in as prizes:

Immediately upon bringing his prize into port, sends up, or delivers upon oath, to the registry of the court of admiralty, all papers found on board the captured ship. In the course of a few days, the examination in preparatory, of the captain and some of the crew of the captured ship are taken upon a set of standing interrogatories, before the commissioners of the port to which the prize is brought, and which are also forwarded to the admiralty, as soon as a motion is extracted by the captor from the registry, and served upon the foreign Exchange, notifying the capture, and calling upon all persons interested to appear, and show cause why the ship and goods should not be condemned; at the expiration of twenty days, the motion is returned into the registry with a certificate of its service, and, if any claim has been given, the cause is then ready for hearing, upon the evidence arising out of the ship's papers, and preparatory examinations.

The measures taken on the part of the neutral master, or proprietor of the cargo, are as follows:

Upon being brought into port, the master usually makes a protest, which he forwards to London, as instructions (not always) to the correspondent of his owner, or to the consul of his nation, in order to claim the ship, and such parts of the cargo as he is particularly entrusted; or the master himself, as soon as he has undergone his examination, goes to London to take the necessary steps.

The master, correspondent, or consul, applies to a proctor, who prepares a claim, supported by an affidavit of the claimant, stating briefly to whom, as he believes, the ship and goods claimed, belong, and that no enemy has any right or interest in them. Security must be given, to the amount of sixty pounds, to answer costs, if the case should appear so grossly fraudulent on the part of the claimant as to subject him to be condemned therein.

This security is usually given and taken within thirty days, as he is strictly enjoined, both by his instruction and by the prize act, to proceed immediately to adjudication) a process issues against him on the application of the claimant's proctor, to bring in the ship's papers and preparatory examinations, and to answer to them in the usual way.

As soon as the claim is given, copies of the ship's papers and examinations are procured from the registry, and upon the return of the monition, the cause may be heard. It, however, seldom happens, (owing to the great pressure of business, especially at the commencement of a war) that causes can possibly be prepared for hearing immediately upon the expiration of the time for the return of the monition. In that case, each cause must necessarily take its regular turn; correspondent measures must be taken by the neutral master, if carried within the jurisdiction of a vice admiralty, by giving a claim, supported by his affidavit, and offering security for costs, if the claim should be pronounced grossly fraudulent.

If the claimant is dissatisfied, he may appeal to the admiralty, and in that case, his proctor enters an appeal in the registry of the court where the sentence was given, or before a notary public, (which regularly should be entered within fourteen days after the sentence) and he afterwards applies at the registry of the lords of appeal in prize causes (which is held at the same place as the registry of the high court of admiralty) for an instrument called an inhibition, and which should be taken out within three months, if the sentence be in the high court of admiralty, and within nine months, if in a vice admiralty court, but may be taken out at later periods if a reasonable cause can be assigned for the delay that has intervened. This instrument directs the judge, whose sentence is appealed from, to proceed no further in the cause until the inhibition is quashed, or is made void, or is presented in the court of appeal, by the person who has obtained the sentence, to appear before the superior tribunal to answer the appeal. On applying for this inhibition, security is given on the part of the appellant, to the amount of two hundred pounds, to answer costs, in case he appear to the court of appeals that the appeal is merely vexatious. The inhibition is to be served upon the judge whose sentence is appealed from, it is to be put in the custody of the registrar of the court of appeal, and delivered by a copy or certificate of the contents.

If the party cannot be found, and the proctor will not accept the service, the instrument is to be served "via o modali," that is, by affixing it to the door of the last place of residence, or abode, of the judge whose sentence is appealed from, and that part of the instrument above described, which is to be executed abroad, may be performed by any person to whom it is committed, and the formal part performed by the officer of the court; a certificate of the service is endorsed upon the back of the instrument, sworn before a surrogate of the superior court, or before a notary public, if the service is abroad.

If the cause be adjudged in a vice admiralty court, it is usual, upon entering an appeal there, to procure a copy of the proceedings, which the appellant sends over to his correspondent, in England, who carries it to a proctor, and the same steps are taken to procure and serve the inhibition, as where the cause has been adjudged in the high court of admiralty. But the proceedings cannot be procured in due time, an inhibition may be obtained, by sending over a copy of the instrument of appeal, or by writing to the correspondent an account only of the time and substance of the sentence.

Upon an appeal, fresh evidence may be introduced, if, upon hearing the cause, the lords of appeal shall be of opinion that such fresh evidence ought to be heard.

Further proof usually consists of affidavits made by the asserted proprietors of the goods, in which they are sometimes joined by their clerks, and others acquainted with the transaction, and with the real property of the goods claimed. In corroboration of these affidavits may be annexed original correspondence, duplicates of bills of lading, or securities produced by the affidavits of persons who can speak to their authenticity; and if copies or extracts, they should be collated and certified by public notaries. The affidavits are sworn before the magistrates or others, competent to administer oaths in the country where they are made, and authenticated by a certificate from the British consul at the port.

The degree of proof required to be depended upon the degree of suspicion and doubt that belongs to the case.

In cases of heavy suspicion and great importance, the court may order what is called " plea and proof?" that is, instead of admitting affidavits and documents introduced by the claimants only, each party is at liberty to allege, in regard to the property of the goods, its title or construction, as well as such other evidence as may be necessary for support of the allegations, to whom the adverse party may administer interrogatories. The depositions of the witnesses are taken in writing. If the witnesses are to be examined abroad, a commission issues for that purpose; but all commissions in English, and the several commissions in all cases where the court may find it necessary, for the purposes of justice, to decree an inquiry to be conducted in that manner.

With respect to captures and condemnations at Martinique, which are the subjects of another inquiry contained in your note, we can only answer, in general, that we are not informed of the particulars of such captures and condemnations; but as we know of no legal court of admiralty established at Martinique, we are clearly of opinion that the legality of any prizes taken there, must be tried in the high court of admiralty of England, upon claims given, in the manner above described, by such persons as may think themselves aggrieved by the said captures.

We have the honor to be, &c.

COMMONS, September 10, 1794.

I take the liberty of advising that these instructions, with a proper title prefixed, be printed in a pamphlet, and published for general information.

You will find, herewith enclosed, a copy of the instructions of the King and council, revoking the order to capture neutral vessels laden with corn, &c. bound to France. A gazette of 6th September, containing an order restraining impressments, &c. and a gazette of 9th September, containing a copy of the order of 6th August, relative to appeals and claims, of which copies have already been sent to you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 16.
LONDON, September 14, 1794.

Sir:
Mr. Morris will, together with this, deliver to you a long letter from me, dated yesterday.

The negotiation proceeds; and I now have some reason to hope, that the business of the northernwestern corner will be so managed as to cease to be an obstacle to agreement.

I have proposed that the further discussion of that matter be postponed, until accurate surveys of the river be made, by joint commissioners, at joint expense; and I do flatter myself that this proposition will be adopted. Of this I cannot yet be certain, but it is, however, my present opinion that it will.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

P. S. I wrote to you (No. 14) 23d August last, by Captain Scott, to Boston. My letter of yesterday is No. 15.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.
PHILADELPHIA, September 17, 1794.

Sir:
Your letter of July 9, 1794, referring to a long and particular letter of the 6th of the same month, having reached me yesterday, unaccompanied by the letter, we are thrown into a painful anxiety. My calculation has, however, been, that the Portuguese minister, who is said to have arrived at New York from London the day before yesterday, may have been charged with it. As you speak of having closed it on the eighth, and by sending no duplicate in that of the 9th, you seem to have intended them both for the same vessel.

The copy of the acts passed during the last session of Congress were probably sent to New York from my office to you, as Chief Justice, and may have been forwarded from there by you, in combination of being destined for you in your diplomatic character. But it will appear, from the enclosed list of papers, transmitted to you from time to time, that no opportunity occurred to me, after the complete publication of those laws, until the 30th of July. Nothing has ever been enclosed to you without some explanatory notice of it.

The same list will show, if the letters noted there have not got to hand, how many have been written by me, and repeated by duplicates. In them the events which gave occasion to my correspondence with Mr. Hammond, and the expiration of the embargo, are detailed. The justice which you do me in suspecting that my letters were still on the way, I beg you to continue; as every occurrence bearing the most distant affinity to your mission, has been immediately minuted down, and conveyed by the first vessel. But there is too much reason to fear that the reluctance of most captains of ships to receive letters which contain a particle of politics; their readiness to surrender them to cruisers; and the little care taken of packages, after they are landed, will disappoint both you and myself very frequently. In these times, it is no small labor to search out the names, and ports of vessels, about to sail for Europe.

With the names of the new British ministry before us, we predict nothing favorable to the United States, from this interweaving of parties. Without bringing a better disposition towards us, the projects may possibly render the operations of the cabinet more cordial to the nation; and if Lord Dorchester's and the Government in movements, be indications of the purposes of Government; or the reports be true, that our vessels are still seized upon the old principles, without mercy, in Bermuda and the West Indies, any popularity of the ministry is so much against us.

My letter of August 30th, enclosing copy of Mr. Charles Williamson's, of the 18th, together with another of the 19th, enclosing duplicates of the 18th and 20th of August, will develop the threat against the settlement at Sodus; and in conjunction with John Kelley's affidavit, and Mr. Williamson's letter of the 1st instant, furnish the latest situation of this business.

You will have collected from my past letters, that Thursday last, the 11th instant, was allotted for the taking of the votes in the insurgent counties of Pennsylvania, whether the terus settled between the commissioners of Government and the committees appointed by them should be accepted; and yesterday for the report to Mr. Ross, one of those commissioners; who undertook to attend at Uniontown, in Fayette county; We hope for a peaceable result; but the whole body of fifteen thousand militia are in motion, and incredible fervor has possessed all orders of people here; even many respectable Quakers have entered the volunteer ranks; three troops of horse, and a large body of infantry, are now in view; the Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia militia, are advancing, in order to strike, if the overtures shall have been rejected. The insurrection will be quelled, be assured, and if any of whom you may address yourself, shall draw inferences of disunion, and retract their good temper, they will be totally disappointed. You will instantly call to mind the course of governments and human nature; and be persuaded that the universal rising of a people, against a handful of insurgents, scarcely the seventieth part of the Union; ignorant, poor, and unprovided with military means, will shoo the roots of that Government deep.

I have the honor, to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 17.
LONDON, September 18th, 1794.

Sir:
You will receive, herewith enclosed, duplicates of my letters of the 13th and 14th of this month, which were committed to the care of Mr. Robert Morris, junr. who was to have sailed last Monday, in the Sanson, Captain Smith, for New York; I have since heard that he did not sail on that day, and, indeed, I am not certain that the Sanson has yet left Deptford; the last of these letters was a very short one, intended together with another of the 19th instant, enclosing duplicates of the 18th and 20th of August, will develop the threat against the settlement at Sodus; and in conjunction with John Kelley's affidavit, and Mr. Williamson's letter of the 1st instant, furnish the latest situation of this business.

I have the honor, to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.
endeavor to settle these questions, and others connected with them, while the parties remained uninformed of the actual extent, and other material circumstances of the case; and thereupon proceeding that all discussions on these subjects be postponed until a survey of the river shall have been made, and lastly, directing that it be made by joint commissioners, at joint expense, and specifying particularly the manner of its being done.

Lord Grenville received, and conversed with me about this article, in his usual temperate and candid manner; and I expect in a few days to have his answer.

Facilities for our ships in the East Indies, and several other interesting matters, are under consideration, and upon the whole, the probability of our finally agreeing increases.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.
PHILADELPHIA, September 20, 1794.

SIR:
The mail of yesterday from New York undeceived me in my expectation of your favor of the 6th of July, 1794, being in the hands of the Portuguese minister, as I mentioned in the letter which I had the honor of writing to you on the 17th instant, acknowledging the receipt of yours of the 9th of July, and which will go, together with this, by the steamer destined to Liverpool. I have now before me your letters of the 6th, 12th, and 16th of July, 1794.

Answer to that of July 6th.

Your letters, thereto referred, to have come to hand. When you recollect the circumstances of the captures under the directions in my letter of the 6th of July, you will not be surprised that none of them had been laid before Lord Grenville, or transmitted to Mr. Pinckney. The merchants had been, for a considerable time, invited by Government to collect the various oppressions of our trade, and forward them to the Department of State. This induced the opinion that the Executive would take up the several cases on public ground; and they were, therefore, consigned to the management, as far as they related to England, where they entered. At the beginning of the last session of Congress, the President informed them by message, that progress had been made in the assembling of the various complaints, and afterwards a summary statement was reported to both Houses. The Senate required an abstract of each case, which produced a further delay; and the different fluctuations of temper, and diversity of projects with respect to Great Britain, stagnated the measures of the Executive, and of the individuals interested, until the whole of the business was concentrated in your mission.

But the call for particular cases by Lord Grenville is, notwithstanding the frankness, candor, and promptness to discussion, hitherto shown by him, somewhat insipid. For if the principle of those instructions is not to be relinquished, and compensation shall be admitted to be due only where some striking injustice or hardship shall be attached to peculiar examples, it will be only here and there that we shall be retributed, and our discontent will continue in their full aspersion. And, indeed, we apprehend that a broad scale of satisfaction could not be contemplated by his lordship, when he expressed that there might be such state of things, as to render it necessary to proceed to a war, or that all the free rights of British commerce were to be annihilated. But, I beg you to believe that, even if my conjectures on this head should fortunately be true, yet there is not a man in the United States who more thoroughly persuaded, than myself, of your exertions to repel the consequences of an attempt to support the intolerable severity of the principle, without the sapping of which complete relief is scarcely to be expected.

The list of captures, with which you were furnished, was not intended to be more than the forerunner of the documents which have since reached you, and were to be sent to you in ample form, by Mr. Higginson. But although Marion Watson's situation was not known to me at the time of delivering his case to you, it has since turned out to be as appears in the enclosed short statement. Of the progress made by Mr. Higginson up to his death, you have been apprised in my letters of the 15th July and 11th August. His widow is possessed of several papers, probably records, which have been withheld from me, on account of their having come in a vessel infected with the yellow fever. As soon as they are certified, I shall despatch them to you; and further measures will be pursued for obtaining the other records from the admiralty courts in the West Indies. But with you not have an immense labor, the duration of which cannot be easily foreseen, if you are personally to discuss each case, instead of leaving the matter (as was supposed to be best) to some subsequents of characters?

Whatever may be necessary and proper to be said, on the part of the President, relative to the satisfactory reception given you by the King and Queen, is submitted to your judgment.

I have the pleasure of informing you that the President approves of your letter to Lord Grenville, on the 3d of July, 1794; and while he is desirous of the expedition in the conduct of negotiation, he thinks, with you, that it ought not to be pushed beyond the dictates of prudence; but that it is expedient to be guided by occasions and circumstances, and to give every conciliatory application a fair experiment. It is his wish, too, that the characteristic of an American minister should be marked, on the one hand, by a firmness against improper compliances, and on the other by sincerity, candor, truth, and prudence, and by a horror of lineage and chicanes. These ideas, however, will not oppose those temperate and firm representations which you meditate, should your present plan fail. For it is fair, and indisputable, in the event of a rupture, to divide the nation from the Government. The system of peace begun by the President will be adhered to, so far as his functions are concerned, until he is driven from it by the British Government.

Before this letter arrives, Mr. J. Q. Adams will have presented himself to you, and obviated the inconveniences noticed in Mr. S. Bourne's letter to you.

Answer to that of the 12th of July, 1794.

The President approves the agreement that, during the present negotiation, and until the conclusion of it, all things remain and be presented in such a form, that the Department is invited to issue correlative orders, and the Department of State to notify the Governors in the neighborhood of those scenes to which the agreement relates.

Answer to that of the 16th of July, 1794.

The despatches to Mr. Hammond, enclosed in your letter of this date, were yesterday sent off by express to that gentleman.

The conduct of the captain of the William Penn is a specimen of the numerous retardments which the negligence of persons in his line may bring upon our correspondence. His owners certainly gave the box most sincerely into his care. That you will find several papers, not very important to you, is certain; and I observed in a former letter that they were imperfect. Still it was necessary that they should be forwarded to you; and I am happy to discover that they have been acceptable to you. I have furnished, from time to time, every thing which I could collect.

65  VOL. 1.
Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 18.

London, October 2, 1794.

Sir: You will, I hope, receive my letters, viz. No. 15 and No. 16, by Mr. Robert Morris, Jr. who lately sailed in the Sansom, for New York. Duplicates of them, and No. 17, were committed to the care of Captain Loxley, of the Pigeon for Philadelphia; those dispatches are interesting.

This will be delivered to you by Captain Morgan of the Brig Molly, who will leave this place for Philadelphia this evening.

I can add nothing of importance to my late communications, except that we are occupied in endeavoring to incorporate the Philadelphia beverage establishment and consider a treaty of commerce and friendship, and have proposed several additional articles. My hopes of agreement are not abated, but still the issue is uncertain. I think a few weeks more will enable me to inform you of the final result of the negotiation.

On the 29th ult. I received a few lines from you, by the way to Cork, of 15th August, informing me “that Mr. James King, the owner of the schooner Nancy, the papers in whose case had been forwarded as far as they were received, had that moment laid before you a copy of the record. That, from the whole proceedings, it appeared that she was acquitted at Nassau, upon the payment of costs, and that the captors had appealed. That as this vessel was of the 12th rate, and now lie as a prize to the British crown, I must give directions for the employment of counsell in behalf of the United States, unless some adjustment, which I might make with the British ministry, on general grounds, should supersede the necessity of such a step.”

I am thus particular in reciting this letter, because it seems to countenance implications and admit doubts which embarrass me.

In the case of the schooner Nancy, you desire me to employ counsel in behalf of the United States.

From this I think I must conclude generally, that the prosecution of the appeal in this case is to be carried on by and at the expense of the United States and that I am to act accordingly.

The reason assigned for this measure is, that because this vessel and her cargo came within the catalogue of spoliations. It is intended that the like measure should be taken with regard to all or any other vessel and cargoes within that catalogue. Is this case regarded as discriminated from the others?

I wish to know precisely what is expected from me relative to these subjects; and be assured that I will faithfully endeavor to fulfill your intentions, whatever their latitude or limitations may be.

I have the honor to be, &c.

P. S. Be so obliging as to send the enclosed letter for Mrs. Jay by the post.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

Philadelphia, October 11, 1794.

Sir: On the 7th current I was honored by your three letters of the 30th and 31st of July, and 3d of August, 1794; to day by your favor of the 21st of August, 1794; by the conveyance of this letter, which is as yet unknown to me, I repeat duplicates of my former letters of the 18th, 17th, and 30th of September, with their several enclosures.

Having been absent from a catalogue of the law in Virginia for more than four years, I have written to a professional friend there for an accurate statement of the laws of that State, relative to the evidence of bond debts. His answer shall be forwarded. In the mean time, however, I have sufficient confidence in my knowledge of those laws up to July 1794, and in my attention to the others which have been published at the close of each session since. To give the following information. To debts due to British inhabitants of the colonies, a great facility of proof was afforded by the British statute of the 5th of Geo. 3d. c. 7. This statute prevailed until the Revolution; when, with all other acts of Parliament not specially adopted, it necessarily expired. It is worthy, too, of remark, that the date of its enactment is long subsequent to that on which British legislation ought to have ceased. I mean the 4th of James the Ist, which was the general limitation of the operation of British statutes in Virginia, even before the war; although, indeed, you recollect a principle, which our inability to resist sanctioned, that statutes, after that epoch, expressly naming the colonies, were permitted to operate. The advantages which the ex parte proof, warranted by the statute, gave to the British resident, were immense. But it is generally understood, though I believe it has never been adjudged, that this privileged form of evidence was not so much of the essence of the contract as to be revived with it.

In the year 1748 the act of Assembly, No. 1, was passed upon the same subject, and continued in force until the year 1786, in the May of which year a new act, No. 4, was substituted. I happened to be clerk of the House of Delegates in Virginia when this last act was moved. The reason assigned was to abolish credit in merchandise, the facility of which had transferred multitudes of fortunes to transatlantic creditors. I recollect, too, that the nation which could give the longest credit, and speak our language, was considered as having too great an ascendancy over its commerce, and this law was designed to produce equality in the struggle by extinguishing credit. However, the consequence is, that the rule bears upon all people, British, French, Americans, and even Virginians in particular. Not a shilling of the old British debts can be affected. Who, then, can complain? I firmly believe that no posterior regulation will adduce the evidence of both debts remaining in Virginia.

Be assured, sir, that I will co-operate with you here, in the very laudable example of moderation which you have set on the other side of the water. I wish that I had any reason to expect a return of temper from the British minister with us. But he shall not lead me astray.

October 13th. Your favors of August 26th and 9th are now received.

If the instructions which Sir William Scott shall prepare, relate in any part to the giving of security, do not Higginson's, of which you carried a copy, show that the Government means to sustain the expenses of prosecution? I take the liberty of hinting this, that the demand for security is raised in the acts of Congress in the struggle against the insurgent country, or to return to the meeting of Congress on the 3d day of next month. I rather believe that he will return, because the submission to the laws is now nearly, if not absolutely universal; and the corps which may be required to overawe any latent spark of insurrection, and its object, are too small to demand his immediate presence.
Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, October 20, 1794.

Sir:—My letter of the 11th instant, concluding with the date of the 19th, has been sent to Mr. Praggs, whose vessel goes for Amsterdam ultimately, but immediately for an English port. Having left the completion of the references in that letter to another hand, I now find, that the report of the commissioners has been omitted; and hasten to supply the defect by the same conveyance.

Nothing has yet transpired from the President since the 10th instant. I suspect that he has proceeded to Fort Cumberland. Still remain under the persuasion that military opposition from the insurgents is not to be expected; although it may be expedient to adopt arrangements for continuing a certain force to cover something definitive should come from you. This was not my opinion; but we were obliged to acquiesce, as no proper successor appeared to our view. I have no doubt that you will see the necessity of entering into some stipulation, which may prevent the sufferers under British decrees from being barred by the time, which, under these circumstances, may elapse before the appeals and claims can be filed.

I have sent instructions to Bermuda for procuring the records of condemnation there. But, from every account, British cruisers, who are the Prince of Praverters, in somnambulism in his influence over all classes of men in that island, that he may contrive to retard the dispatch of vessels. Indeed, the captures by cruisers issuing from thence, are more numerous than ever, and are multiplying every day. I am hourly asked how these things accord with pacific intentions.

The yellow fever, whatever may have been said to the contrary, has produced no alarm; no removal from this city; and if it was reported at all, the instances of its prevalence were few, and the traces of it are now absolutely obliterated. In Baltimore it is supposed to have been severe, but even there it has perfectly vanished.

General Wayne's success is announced in the paper of Bache, of October 2d.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, October 29, 1794.

Sir:—Duplicates of the two last letters which I had the honor of writing to you on the 19th and 20th current will accompany this letter. They are intended for the Wilmington, for Bristol, from this port.

On Tuesday next, the Adriana will carry to London Mr. Samuel Bayard. In consequence of your recommendation that an agent should be sent, that gentleman goes over, with the approbation of the merchants of this city, interested in British captures, for the objects designated in your favor of the 23d August. When I convened them for the purpose of consultation, they seemed to me to hesitate that meddling would be at all in a business which they considered as taken wholly into the hands of Government. But, after many explanations and assurances that the impressions which passed between us, they resolved to appoint a committee, who should act in concert with me. That committee accordingly wrote to me to transmit the enclosed letters.

I accepted their proposal, as they expressed; because I knew it to be consistent to the views of the President, who has this day signified his approbation. The merchants will immediately push on the appeals and claims as last as the documents can be forwarded to London by their correspondents in the Islands. Too much time cannot be allowed for this purpose, they all desire being considered. We were, however, embarrassed by the inquiry whether it was necessary that these appeals and claims should be entered in the Islands. I did not think that the Company might change the course of admiralty courts, so as to permit them to be instituted in England. But it did not sufficiently appear that this was your meaning. I therefore proposed, that the persons who procured the records in the West Indies should file appeals and claims there, if contrary to my expectation it should be required in ordinary practice. This, they replied, was impracticable; alleging that neither their own credit, nor that of the United States, could obtain the enormous security which is demanded. So much of the fact as relates to the United States is verified by one of Mr. Higginson’s letters, and what relates to themselves comes from a pure source. I therefore suggested this expedient: that Mr. Bayard should immediately on his arrival apply to you for information, whether the appeals and claims must begin in the Islands: that, if this should be found to be according to the usual course required, you should be requested, if it were possible, and proper under all circumstances, to attempt except from the general rule these instances, in which security would be so serious a difficulty, and so great an impediment to navigation: that this modification was unattainable, you would endeavor to stipulate for the giving of security in England: and, if at length nothing could be done but in the West Indies, letters of credit might be solicited from some mercantile houses in London to their correspondents in the islands, to induce them to join in the necessary bonds.

The President has confirmed this further branch of the arrangement, and Mr. Bayard can be used by you, in the execution of it, in any manner most agreeable to yourself. Although no special clause is inserted in your instructions with an eye to this shape of the affair, yet it cannot be necessary to send you formal and ostensible powers, to enable you to authorize Mr. Bayard to sign these bonds, or to seek out these letters of credit. But you are hereafter to use at your own discretion the most ample liberty to vest him with the authority necessary for effectuating the foregoing purposes. This is particularly, lest you should not conceive in the opinion which I hinted in my letter of the 20th of September last, that, from the expression which relates to security in Higginson’s instructions, and the latitude of your own powers, you might delegate such an authority, even without a special declaration to that effect, in this place.

For the reasons assigned in my letter of the 11th instant, the President concurs in the measure of not publishing yours, No. 10. The memorial and answer which it contained are running through all the papers of the United States.

The return of the President from the militia army confirms, what I have often written to you, that the insurrection would not venture to show any degree of military opposition. Many of the insurgents have been arrested in different quarters, where their force, if they had any, must have been; but the arrests were perfectly quiet, and free from resistance. The army has, however, marched to the centre of the disaffected counties, to impress and overawe. Some force will, no doubt, be left behind, to complete the work. I shall endeavor to send, by Mr. Bayard, the speech which the President will deliver to Congress some time in the next, week, as I presume that he will think the insurrection too important a subject to be passed over without notice. The newspapers will go by the same commission.

To prove to you the thoughtless severity which the British captains are disposed to exercise upon our citizens, under the name of piracy, I enclose to you my letter, of the 53rd instant, to Mr. Hammond, and his disavowal of what he calls the alternative proposed to be his orders.

I also enclose Mr. Hollins’ letter, and shall inform him that I mean to transmit it to you, that it may pass into the agent’s hands.

I shall write again by Mr. Bayard, and, in the mean time, have the honor to be, with sentiments of the highest respect and esteem,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 19.

LONDON, October 29th, 1794.

SIR: I have been favored with yours of the 15th, 18th, and 20th of August, and of the 5th, 12th, 17th, and 20th of September last.

Although I have materials for another letter as long and particular as the one which I had the honor of writing to you on the 13th of September, yet sufficient time for details cannot possibly be spared from the business of the negotiation. I must confine myself to generals, and postpone a minute statement of the negotiations which have taken place since the date of that letter to a future opportunity.

You have been informed that we had agreed to incorporate the two projects, viz: of a settlement and of a commercial treaty. I undertook this business, and prepared a draught, including most of the articles in those two, and adding several others, but all of them for mutual consideration. From these, Lord Grenville, extracting several, omitting some, and adding others, formed a new draught. Difficulties have appeared, and been discussed; some have been removed, some lessened by proposed modifications, and a few still remain. It was proposed that goods for the Indian trade should pass from the Indians within the United States, duty free: to this I could not consent. It has been proposed that alien tonnage and impost should cease: to this there also appeared to me to be very strong objections. I think the former may be yielded, in some degree, to us; as to the latter, I cannot yet form a judgment.

We spent several hours, on Friday and yesterday, in these discussions, and they will be resumed to-morrow morning. The object that indicates a desire to protract, and I think it cannot be carried before the negotiation terminates either in a treaty, or in a certainty that an amicable settlement is impracticable.

All propositions relative to a new line in our northwestern corner are suspended. We have agreed that the river shall be surveyed, and its source ascertained. I think Canada and its Indian trade will be opened to us, but not the navigation of the St. Lawrence from the sea.

Although a more early day than the 1st of June, 1796, cannot be had for the evacuation of the posts, (for reasons which shall hereafter be intimated) yet we agreed yesterday to add, “the United States, in the mean time, extending their settlements to any parts within their boundaries, except within the precincts of any of the posts.”

I wish to take particular notice of your letters, but, really, sir, I cannot do it now.

I feel very sensibly the confidence reposed in me by the permission to take such notice of my reception here as I might judge proper. The following is a copy of the letter which I have written to Lord Grenville on that subject:

ROYAL HOTEL, PALL MALL, October 27, 1794.

My Lord:

The President, having been informed of the gracious reception with which their Majesties were pleased to honor me, has charged it my duty to assure them of the sense he entertains of that pleasing mark of attention to the United States. He flatters himself that a negotiation, commenced under such favorable auspices, and conducted with a correspondent disposition to conciliation, will terminate in a settlement mutually satisfactory and beneficial.

He requests His Majesty to be persuaded that he will continue to promote every measure that may conduco to this desirable event; and that the United States will, with pleasure and alacrity, cherish the concord and good will which will naturally result from it. I am convinced, my Lord, that this communication will derive advantages, from the manner in which you will convey it to their Majesties; and I am the more gratified in addressing it to your Lordship, as an additional opportunity is thereby afforded me of assuring of you the respect and esteem with which I have the honor to be your Lordship’s, &c.

The Right Honorable Lord GRENVILLE, &c.

I am preparing an official representation, touching unfriendly interferences with the Indians, and I have reason to believe that a satisfactory answer will be given to it.
Sir: I do myself the honor of writing to you, merely to inform you that I have now received an assurance from Mr. Marshall, (whom you know) of Virginia, that the statement, which I made to you in my letter of the 29th ult. on the evidence of British debts, is accurate. Mr. Bayard sails on the 6th instant, by whom I shall enclose a copy of Mr. Marshall's information, and of the President's speech.

There was not a sufficient number of either House of Congress to proceed to business to-day. To-morrow a quorum is certainly expected.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, November 3, 1794.

Sir: Notwithstanding Monday last was appointed for the meeting of Congress, a quorum of neither House then appeared. On Tuesday the Representatives assembled in sufficient numbers; but the Senators are yet four short of a majority. This stagnates the communication from the President, and deprives me of an opportunity of adding more at present than the enclosure of Mr. Marshall's letter, mentioned in mine of the 3d instant, and the great respect and esteem with which I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, November 7, 1794.

Sir: There is no prospect of Congress assembling until the day after to-morrow; and Mr. Bayard is compelled, by the sailing of the Adriana, to leave us to-morrow; I am therefore deprived of the pleasure of sending you the President's speech.

My answer to the letter from the committee of merchants, which I had the honor of enclosing to you on the 29th ultimo, is now forwarded, together with the newspapers.

 Permit me to remark to you that there are some cases of spoliation and vexation, which do not strictly come within the compass of admiralty jurisdiction, or have been denied relief, and are not, as far as I can discover, within the stipulations between yourself and Lord Grenville: for example, plundering of goods; violence to the person; loss of freight, &c. where an acqutial has taken place, or no trial has been had. I own that these instances, especially where they have never been before a court, do not admit an easy remedy, if the amenability of the British Government be considered, because they have probably proceeded from privateers; and, having never been brought before a court, that Government cannot readily obtain cognizance of them. However, if it be practicable to make a reservation, for the introduction of them before commissioners, or in any manner which can ultimately create a resort to that Government for satisfaction, it will be extremely acceptable to the persons interested. As to the refusal of redress by the courts, perhaps this reservation may be obtained.

Mr. Fitzsimons has just informed me that, when Martinique and Gaudaloupe were taken, a very large property of American merchants was found in the warehouses there, and carried off or destroyed. I asked him for the documents and proofs; he has promised to send them. If such losses are susceptible of a remedy, I am persuaded that your attention will be drawn to them.

The duplicates, now sent, are of the following dates: October 29, November 3d and 7th, 1794, together with their several enclosures.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

[Note.—The following despatches from Mr. Jay, and letters from the Secretary of State, with the exception of despatch No. 22, were not communicated to the Senate with the treaty.]
sion is made for the continuance of certain stipulations even in time of war. No such provision exists in the short clause respecting privateering commissions; it being intended, merely, that the citizens or subjects of either nation, being neutral, should not engage in privateering against the other. To restrict privateers, on the event of a war between us and Great Britain, would cut up a most effectual resource for naval defence. Although Lord Grenville's counter-proposition seems to continue the right of privateering in full force, I am directed by the President to inform you, for the sake of preventing any mistake, that it is his earnest desire that such an agreement may not be concluded.

Ought not future inheritances in land, as well as present, to be permitted to the people of either country, in the other?

May not Lord Grenville's stipulation, for British subjects, and the Indians within our limits, to carry on trade, as usual, in the northwestern country, produce great embarrassment, and all the heart-burnings of rivalship?

I am afraid that the terms irregular and illegal are not sufficient, when applied to the captures of our vessels, to let many of them into compensation.

Among the correspondence, which you carried with you, between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Hammond, you will find letters which prove that, for captures made by vessels grained in our ports, within certain periods, we ought not to be accountable. The propositions seem to go to the whole.

The instructions of the 8th of June, 1793, are, in substance, renewed upon us by one of Lord Grenville's propositions.

I am suspicious that the phrase, relative to the exception of prior treaties, to wit: "in all cases in which they do not apply," will, at some future day, be tortured to a sense, which, probably, is not intended by Lord Grenville now. Suppose that it should be insisted that the French treaty does not apply, because the Government is so essentially changed? I do not think that fair construction will justify such a sentiment; but it will not be amiss to exclude its possibility.

The commercial project will be immediately examined: for we cannot, at this early moment, discover whether it be probable that the concessions will be such as to induce you, under your powers, to sign a commercial treaty, or to digest only; nor can we so immediately appreciate the different parts of the project.

If the prohibition to sell French prizes should commence sooner than the termination of the war, we shall be placed in very great difficulties; and I am pleased to observe that you are impressed with the force of this idea.

I have laid the opinion of Dr. Nicholl and Sir William Scott before the merchants. We shall endeavor to give it its full effect.

These ideas are not felt by me to be in all respects accurate. I shall revise them; and shall particularly keep in view that both the language and matter of the propositions will undergo great alterations and new arrangements. But I will take the liberty of suggesting that it may be well to avoid, as much as possible, postponements of final settlements. You know from history that commissioners, who meet after a peace, are very apt to sow the seeds of war.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect and esteem, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 31.

LONDON, November 17th, 1794.

Sir:

A treaty agreed upon and copied, I expect will be signed to day or to-morrow, and sent by the packet.

In my letter, No. 12, dated the 29th October, I mentioned that I had written a letter to Lord Grenville on the subject of my reception here; of that letter I sent a copy, but the answer had not then been received. I now subjoin copies of both, and have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

The Honorable EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State, &c.

To the Right Honorable Lord Grenville, &c. &c.

ROYAL HOTEL, PALL MALL, 27th October, 1794.

My Lord,

The President having been informed of the gracious reception with which their majesties were pleased to honor me, has made it my duty to assure them of the sense he entertains of that pleasing mark of attention to the United States. He flatters himself that a negotiation commenced under such favorable auspices, and conducted with a correspondent disposition to conciliation, will terminate in a settlement, mutually satisfactory and beneficial. He requests His Majesty to be persuaded that he will continue to promote every measure that may conduzi to this desirable event; and that the United States will, with pleasure and alacrity, cherish the concord and good which will naturally result from it.

I am convinced, my lord, that this communication will derive advantages from the manner in which you will convey it to their Majesties; and I am the more gratified in addressing it to your lordship, as an additional opportunity is thereby afforded me of assuring you of the respect and esteem with which I have the honor to be,

My lord, your lordship's most obedient humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

To John Jay, Esquire, &c. &c. &c.

DOWNING STREET, October, 1794.

Sir:

I have taken the earliest opportunity to lay before the King your letter of the 27th instant, and I have it in command to express to you the satisfaction which His Majesty has derived from the sentiments which you have been charged to convey to me on the part of the President of the United States; and to assure you that there exists, on His Majesty's part, the same disposition towards the object of conciliation and friendship. I trust you are convinced of the satisfaction which those who are humbled with His Majesty's confidence will always feel in executing, to the best of their power, His Majesty's intentions in this respect.

It has, on that account, been matter of the greatest satisfaction to me that, in the course of a negotiation directed to the attainment of this desirable object, I have to treat with a minister whose dispositions and conduct are so well calculated to promote my trust, with no small degree of confidence, that the final issue of our joint endeavors will be such as, I am persuaded, we both wish, but in every case, I shall always retain those sentiments of the most sincere respect and esteem.

With which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GRENVILLE.
Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph.—No. 22.

London, 12th November, 1784.

SIR,

The long expected treaty accompanies this letter: a probability of soon concluding it has caused the packet to be detained for more than a week. The difficulties which retarded its accomplishment, frequently had the appearance of being insurmountable; they have at last yielded to modifications of the articles in which they existed, and to that mutual disposition to agreement which reconciled Lord Hood and his minister with my own sentiments. The treaty may now, I flatter myself, be considered as being completed.

Since the building is finished, it cannot be very important to describe the scaffolding, or go into all the details which respect the business. Explanatory remarks on certain articles might be useful, by casting light on governing principles, which, in some instances, are very difficult to be apprehended unless they are closely examined. In order to avoid inaccuracies, I am induced to write upon the spot, as I have not the leisure to determine, in my mind, the extent of the necessary observations, and hope allowances will be made for inaccuracies and omissions.

My opinion of the treaty is apparent from my having signed it. I have no reason to believe or conjecture that our present posture of affairs is attacked.

Perhaps it is not very much to be regretted that all our differences are merged in this treaty, without having been decided; disagreeable imputations are thereby avoided, and the door of conciliation is fairly and widely opened, by the essential justice done, and the concessions granted to each of the other parties. It cannot be restricted to a more early day: that point has been pressed.

The reasons which caused an inexcusable adherence to that term, I am persuaded, were these, viz: That the traders have spread through the Indian nations goods to a great amount; that the returns for those goods cannot be drawn into Canada at an earlier period than that which the surrender of all the posts to American marines will ensure the minds of the Indians cannot be foreseen. On a former occasion it was intimated to them (not very delicately) that they had been forsaken, and given up to the United States; that the protection promised on our part, however sincere, and however, in other respects, competent, cannot entirely prevent their being solicited by the war in the present instance. The reasons, the traders ought to have time to conclude their adventures, which were calculated on the existing state of things: they will afterwards calculate on the new state of things: but that, in the mean time, the care of Government should not be withdrawn from them.

The treaty itself will, I presume, appear to you in a favorable light: a number of reasons which, in my judgment, are solid, support it. It was proposed and urged that the commercial intercourse opened by this article ought to be exempted from all duties whatever on both sides: the duty which such a measure would involve on the part of the Indians was finally agreed to subject to native duties. In this compromise, which I consider, as being exactly right, that difficulty terminated; but for this compromise the whole article would have failed, and every expectation of an amicable settlement been frustrated. A continuance of trade with the Indians was a decided advantage, much time and power, and many conferences were employed in producing this article; that part of it which respects the ports and places on the eastern side of the Mississippi, if considered in connexion with the article in the treaty of peace, and with the article in this treaty which directs a survey of that river to be made, will, I think, appear unexceptionable.

In discussing the question about the river St. Croix, before the commissioners, I apprehend the old French claim was revived; we must adhere to the original map. The Vice President perfectly understands this business.

The 6th article was a sine qua non, and is intended as well as calculated to afford that justice and equity which judicial proceedings may, on trial, be found incapable of affording. That the commissioners may deny the very fact of the matters at stand, and as justice and equity shall appear to require it.

It is very much to be regretted that a more summary method than the one indicated in the seventh article could not have been devised and agreed upon for settling the capture cases; every other plan was perplexed with difficulties, which frustrated it. Permit me to hint the expediency of aiding the claimants, by employing a gentleman, at the public expense, to oversee and manage the causes of such of them as cannot conveniently have agents of their own here; and whether, in some cases, pecuniary assistance might not be proper. I do not consider myself at liberty to make such an appointment, nor to enter into any such pecuniary engagements. It would, probably, be more convenient to refer the matter to the President of the United States, as his contract with Mr. Jefferson would be better than this. Here there are few fit for the business, and willing to undertake it, who (having many affairs of their own to attend to) would not be tempted to consider the business of the claimants in a secondary light; several objections to giving him a fixed salary, as it is not certain they will be the amount or the kind of compensation for his services. Our counsel here talks, and, I believe, in earnest, of returning to America, or I should expect much advantage from his zeal and endeavors to serve such of the claimants as might commit their business to his management.

Mr. Jefferson, in the 8th article, a stipulation which, in effect, refers the manner of paying the commissioners very much to our election. I prefer paying them jointly; the objection to it, is, that the English pay high. I have always doubted the policy of being petty-wise.

The Lord Chancellor has prepared an article respecting the mutual admission of evidence, &c. which we have not had time fully to consider and decide upon; it contains a clause to abate alienum between the two countries. His lordship's conduct and conversation indicate the most friendly disposition towards us; a copy of his article shall be sent, and I wish to receive precise instructions on that head.

In the credit of some of the States having my knowledge, suffered by appearances of their being favorable to the idea of sequestring British debts on certain occasions, the 10th article will be useful. Persons wishing to invest their property in their funds and banks, have frequently applied to me to be informed whether they might do it without risk of loss, without or sequestration; my answer has been uniform, viz: that, in my opinion, they would not be proper; but that, in my opinion, they would not be adopted; some pressed me for assurances, but I have declined giving any.

The 13th article, admitting our vessels of seventy tons and under, into the British Islands in the West Indies, affords the most unexpected and astonishing explanatory remarks. It became connected with a proposed stipulation for the abolition of all alien duties, of every kind, between the two countries. This proposition was pressed, but strong objections opposed my agreeing to it; a satisfactory state of the negotiation on this point would be prolix; at present, I cannot form a very concise one, for that would not require less time than selection and arrangement necessary in this article is short, but if we meet the disposition of this country to good humor and cordiality, I am much inclined to believe it will be renewed; the duration of the treaty is connected with the renewal of that article, and an opportunity will then offer for discussing and settling their reciprocal mistakes.

The article which opens the British ports in the East Indies to our vessels and cargoes, needs no comment. It is a manifestaion and proof of good will towards us.

The questions about the cases in which alone provisions become contraband, and the question whether, and how far a nation's property subject to public enemies is subject to public enemies is subject of much trouble, and many fruitless discussions. That Britain, at this period, and involved in war, should not admit principles which would impeach the propriety of her conduct in seizing provisions bound to France, and enemy's property on board of neutral vessels, does not appear to me to be a very strong point, and I am prepared to make use of the recent act of 1783 for the protection of neutral vessels in deciding whether they were made in such cases as to be warranted by the existing law of nations; as to the principles we contend for, you will find them saved in the conclusion of the 19th article, from which it will appear that we still adhere to them.
The articles about privateers were taken from the treaty of commerce between Great Britain and France, and the one for treating natives, commanding privateers, as pirates, in certain cases, was partly taken from ours with Holland.

The prohibition to sell prizes in our ports had its use; and we have no reason to regret that your instructions to me admitted of it.

Various articles, which have no place in this treaty, have, from time to time, been under consideration, but did not meet with mutual approbation and consent.

I must draw this letter to a conclusion; Lord Grenville is anxious to dismiss the packet as soon as possible.

There is reason to hope that occasions for complaint on either side will be carefully avoided. Let us be just and friendly, and all will be well.

I ought not to omit mentioning the acknowledgments due from me to Mr. Pinckney, with whom I have every reason to be satisfied, and from whose advice and opinions I have derived light and advantage in the course of the negotiation. His approbation of the treaty gives me pleasure, not merely because his opinion corresponds with my own, but also from the sentiments I entertain of his judgment and candor.

It is desirable that I should have the earliest advice of the ratification; and be enabled to finish whatever may be expected of me, in season to return in one of the first spring vessels. My health is not competent to a winter's voyage, or I should be the bearer of the treaty. This climate does not agree with me, and the less so on account of the application and confinement to which it was necessary for me to submit.

I had almost forgotten to mention that, on finishing and agreeing to the draught of the treaty, I suggested to Lord Grenville, as a measure that would be very acceptable to our country, the interposition of His Majesty with Algiers, and other States of Barbary, that may be hostile to us. This idea was favorably received, and it is my opinion that this court would, in good earnest, undertake that business, in case nothing should occur to impeach the sincerity of that mutual reconciliation which it is to be hoped will now take place.

It will give you pleasure to hear that great reserve and delicacy has been observed respecting our concerns with France. The stipulation in favor of existing treaties was agreed to without hesitation; not an expectation, nor even a wish has been expressed that our conduct towards France should be otherwise than fair and friendly. In a word, I do not know how the negotiation could have been conducted, on their part, with more delicacy, friendliness, and propriety, than it has been from first to last.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Joy to Mr. Randolph—No. 23.

London, 20th November, 1794.

SIR: I received last night a letter from Lord Grenville, of which the following is a copy:

DOWNING STREET, November 18th, 1794.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you the papers which you have already seen, relative to the claims of certain persons having rights of remainder, or other interests in estates, confiscated in America during the late war, but whose rights or interests, according to the justice, and the established laws under which those estates were held, could not be affected by such confiscation.

I have no doubt, both from the justice of the case itself, and from what has passed between us respecting it, that if, on inquiry in America, it should appear that any impediments to the prosecution of such claims in the ordinary course of justice have existed, or still exist, these cases will be considered as being completely within the principle of the article in the treaty signed between us this day respecting the British creditors. But as you do not possess sufficient information respecting the particulars of this business to be enabled to enter fully into it, I have transmitted to you the papers relative to it, and I shall be obliged to you if, when you have received further information upon it, you will acquaint me in what situation you conceive the parties interested in it to stand, with respect to the means of recovering their rights in the ordinary course of justice.

I am, sir, your very obedient humble servant,

GRENVILLE.

To JOHN JAY, Esq. &c. &c.

The 5th article of the treaty of peace concluded with the following paragraph, viz:

And it is agreed that all persons who have any interest in confiscated land, either by debts, marriage settlements, or otherwise, shall meet with no lawful impediment in the prosecution of their just rights.

Lord Grenville lately mentioned to me that there were persons who had interests in confiscated lands, and that it was reasonable such information should be taken care of by the present treaty. He named the case of Lord Fairfax's estate, and that of Colonel Roger Morris, in the State of New York. I answered that my information respecting those cases was too imperfect to permit me to enter into any particular stipulations respecting them individually, or respecting the others that were generally alluded to in the above article; that I was not apprised of any lawful impediments to the prosecution of such rights as that article contemplated, but I concurred with him in opinion that, if there had been, or still were, such impediments, those cases were within the same principle, and had the same claims to justice and equity as the cases of British creditors, and ought to be provided for accordingly.

The papers I received from him last night are too voluminous to be copied in season to accompany this letter; it is absolutely impossible. You will receive them by the next ship.

The application mentioned in his letter, and which he received from a particular class of British creditors, &c. is a memorial of divers American loyalists, &c. These persons (whose estates were confiscated) think they have a right to recover the debts that were due to them, and that the article of the treaty of peace in favor of British creditors applies to them. This cannot, in my opinion, be admitted, and will, I believe, give us no trouble.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

To the Honorable EDM. RANDOLPH, Esq. Secretary of State, &c. &c.

Mr. Joy to Mr. Randolph—No. 24.

London, 21st November, 1794.

SIR: On the 19th instant a treaty was signed. The next day it was, together with my letters to you, Nos. 21, 22, and 23, despatched to the packet at Falmouth, which had been detained.
I now send you duplicates of them all by Mr. Blaney, a gentleman of Virginia, recommended to me by Governor Lee. The earliest advices from you will be expedient. There are articles in this treaty which will give strength to our applications to other Powers for extensions of commerce. Much use may be made of them.

I daily become more and more convinced of the general friendly disposition of this country towards us. Let us cherish it. Let us cultivate friendship with all nations. By treating them all with justice and kindness, and by preserving that self respect which forbids our yielding to the influence or policy of any of them, we shall, with the Divine blessing, secure peace, union, and respectability.

I feel very sensibly the confidence that has been reposed in me, as well as the responsibility that resulted from it. If this confidence should prove beneficial, I shall not regret my anxiety and efforts to render it so. The Canada article strikes me as one of the best in it. If discreetly managed, important benefits will, in my opinion, be derived from it. Very much ought not to be written on these subjects.

That the termination of these perplexing differences should be effected during your administration of the foreign department, cannot fail to give you pleasure. It will afford some compensation for the trouble you have had, and relieve you from the disagreeable correspondences to which such differences so frequently give occasion.

Accept my thanks for the many interesting communications and marks of attention I have received from you in the course of the negotiation, and be assured that I am, with every corresponding sentiment,

Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

The Honorable Edm. Randolph, Esq. Secretary of State, &c. &c.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 25.

LONDON, December 6, 1794.

Sir:

Copies of the papers mentioned in my letter, (No. 23) are hereunto subjoined.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

OFFICE OF AMERICAN CLAIMS, August 13th, 1790.

Dear Sir:

I send you extracts of some papers and reports relative to the claim of Colonel Morris and his children. The other cases of a similar nature are those of Lord Fairfax and Mr. Martin, and you will see the attorney general's opinion applies to all of them.

Yours, very sincerely,

JOHN WILMOT.

N. B. Colonel Morris, Mr. Martin, and Lord Fairfax, have received their certificates for the value of their life interests.

Mr. Attorney General's opinion on the case of Mr. and Mrs. Morris.

What interpretation the State of New York may give to their act of attainer I don't know; but nothing is more clear, that, if a similar act of attainer against Mr. and Mrs. Morris had passed here, it would not have affected the remainder limited to the children who are not attainted; and they seem to me, upon this state of the case, to be most clearly entitled to the benefit of the last clause of the 5th article of the treaty of peace with America. Under these circumstances I cannot advise the commissioners to consider this remainder in fee as absolutely lost, until an attempt has been made to obtain that justice in America to which they are entitled, and the refusal of which will, in my opinion, be a direct violation of the treaty. If they cannot obtain justice ultimately, they certainly ought to have a compensation, and therefore I think the commissioners, after having made a compensation to Mr. and Mrs. Morris for their life interest, should state specially the case of the children, as that may hereafter be of use to them if they fail in seeking redress in America.

R. P. ARDEN.

21st March, 1787.

N. B. As there are two or three other cases similarly circumstanced, the commissioners considered them altogether in a separate class, and made a general observation upon them in their general reports, particularly that of the 15th May, 1789. Vide extracts.

Extract from the report of the Commissioners of American claims, dated 7th April, 1786.

We have not considered any interest in confiscated lands, whether by debt, marriage settlement, or otherwise, as lost to the parties, (in cases where such parties are not named in, or are not the immediate object of, the confiscation law) though we apprehend it may be difficult for them, without the aid of Government, to have their rights ascertained and secured.

We have thought it our duty to represent this to your lordships, as we apprehend it to be one of the objects of our inquiry to furnish Government with such information as may promote His Majesty's endeavors to procure from the United States of America restitution of, or recompense for, the estates and effects of the sufferers under the provisional article, as stated in the preamble of the act which first instituted the inquiry.

Extract from the report of the Commissioners of American Claims, dated 5th April, 1788.

There is likewise another description of persons, concerning whom we have been under considerable difficulties, as stated in our fifth report of the 7th April, 1786, namely, of loyal British subjects, who appear to have relief under the treaty of peace, but state the utter impossibility of procuring it. We have stated these losses, therefore, in a separate class, (the eleventh) in order to facilitate the endeavors of Government to procure from the United States of America a restitution of, or recompense for, the estates and effects of the sufferers under the treaty of peace, or if that Government and the Legislature may be enabled to make them compensation at home, if it should be thought proper.

Extract from the report of the Commissioners of American Claims, dated 15th May, 1789.

With respect to the eleventh class, viz. of those who appear to have relief by the treaty of peace, it is to be observed that it consists of the value of reversionary interest in estates expectant on the determination of lives now in being, the value of the life interests being included in some of the other classes. It is proper to observe, likewise, that the fee of the property in these instances has been seized, confiscated, and sold, by the respective States in whose territory the property lies; and notwithstanding the provisions of the treaty of peace, we are afraid there is little probability of the recovery of such reversionary interests by the persons entitled in remainder. We submit, therefore, to the consideration of Government and Parliament, whether it will be more eligible to make those persons who have suffered for these life interests, a compensation only for the loss of those life interests, or to make a compensation for the fee simple of the property, to be paid to trustees, subject to the same uses to which the estates were settled; by which means, for a comparatively small additional consideration, those entitled in remainder will have no future claim on the justice and liberality of the Government. To the death of the tenant in fee the present act gives the additional interest of the different States for the value of this reversionary property, whenever an arrangement shall take place between the two countries of their respective interests and pretensions.

Extract from the decision of the Commissioners of American Claims, on the claim of Colonel Roger Morris, and Mary, his wife.

The Board is of opinion that the value of the fee simple of the said estate was £29,000, and that the value of the interest of the said Colonel R. Morris, and Mary, his wife, for their joint lives, and the life of the survivor, (as calculated by Mr. William Morgan, actuaty to the equitable society of annuitants) is £12,605.

The Board, under all the circumstances of the case, is of opinion that the loss of the said Colonel R. Morris, and Mary, his wife, must be confined to the said sum of £12,605, which sum they accordingly allow for the same; but they do not consider the interests of the children of the marriage as being lost, the same being protected by the fifth article of the treaty of peace.

Extract from the decision of the Commissioners of American Claims, on the claim of Samuel and George Martin.

The commissioners disallow the claim, (so far as the reversionary interest of the son, George Martin, is concerned) considering the same to be protected by the fifth article of the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and America.

Although the commissioners are of opinion the reversionary interest of the claimant, George Martin, must be considered as being protected by the fifth article of the treaty of peace, it appears, nevertheless, that the whole property has in fact been seized and forfeited as the fee simple estate of the said Samuel Martin. And although a representation has been made to the Legislature of Virginia, setting forth the interest the said George Martin was entitled to therein, no attention whatever has been paid thereto.

Decision on the claim of the Right Honorable Robert Lord Fairfax, on behalf of himself and of Frances Martin, widow, his sister, and of Denny Fairfax, D. D., Philip Martin, Esq. and Thomas Martin, Esq. his nephews, and their three sisters, his nieces. Claim, £29,000.

My Lords;

The case of the Right Honorable Lord Fairfax being in many respects peculiarly circumstanced, and being of considerable importance in respect to the magnitude of the claim, we have thought fit to make it the subject of a separate part of our report.

We find that His late Majesty, King James the Second, by letters patent, bearing date the 37th day of December, in the fourth year of his reign, which recite former letters patent of King Charles the Second, bearing date the 8th day of May, in the 21st year of his reign, did give, grant, and confirm, unto the Right Honorable Lord Culpeper, (great-grandfather of the claimant) all that entire tract, territory, or parcel of land in Virginia, in America, and bounded by and within the first heads or springs of the river of Tappahannock, alias Rappahannock, and Querough, alias Potomac river, the courses of the said rivers from their first heads, or springs, as they are commonly called, and known by the inhabitants and descendants of the said Fairfax, and the Bay of Chesapeake together with the said

That all the said granted premises were, under such grants, held and enjoyed by the said Thomas Lord Culpeper from thenceforth to the time of his death, when the same became the property of, and vested in the, the Right Honorable Catherine, late Lady Fairfax, his daughter, who, by her last will and testament, bearing date the 21st day of June, 1779, gave, grant, and confirmed, by the same execution whereof the said Fairfax, and the premises in Virginia, unto William Cage, of Milgate, in the Parish of Berset, in the county of Kent, Esquire, and Edward Filmer, of East Sutton, in the said county, Esquire, to hold the same unto the said William Cage, and Edward Filmer, in their heirs, and their heirs and assigns forever, upon the said several trusts therein and hereinafter described, that is to say:

Upon trust in the first place by mortgage, a sale of a sufficient part of the estate thereby devised to raise a sufficient sum for discharging all her debts, legacies, and funeral expenses; and after such mortgage, sale, and disposition, to the use of her eldest son, Thomas Lord Fairfax, and his assigns, for life.

Remainder to the said William Cage, and Edward Filmer, and their heirs, as trustees to preserve contingent remainders, Remainder to the first and other sons of the said Thomas Fairfax, in tail male.

Remainder to her second son, Henry Culpeper Fairfax, and his assigns, for his life.

Remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders.

Remainder to the first and other sons of the said Henry Culpeper Fairfax, in tail male.

Remainder to her third son, Robert Fairfax, and his assigns, for his life.

Remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders.

Remainder to the first and other sons of the said Robert Fairfax, in tail male.

Remainder to the daughters of the said testatrix as tenants in common, in tail.

Remainder to the right heirs of the said tenant in fee.

The said Catharine Lady Fairfax died in the said year 1719, soon after the making of her said will, whereupon the aforesaid lands and premises under the devise contained, became vested in the said Thomas Lord Fairfax, for the term of his natural life.
We find by a survey produced to us, made in the years 1736 and 1737, that the quantity of land contained within the boundary described in the aforesaid grant of King James the Second, was five millions two hundred and eighty-two thousand, a considerable part thereof, at the time of the breaking out of the troubles in America, had been granted by the late Thomas Lord Fairfax, and his predecessors, upon quit rents; other parts had been appropriated by the Proprietors; and others were under lay for that purpose.

We find, that the said Thomas Lord Fairfax, who resided in Virginia, at the commencement of and during the troubles in America, conducting himself as a loyal subject to His Majesty, but being of a very advanced age, (upwards of fourscore years) for that reason, as we presume, he was not divested of the said estates during his lifetime, though his possession of the same ceased, and became vested in, the claimant, Lord Robert Fairfax, for the term of his natural life, (the said Henry Culpepper Fairfax having, many years before, died unmarried, and without issue) but owing to divers laws and regulations which had been passed and which had been produced by the said Lord Fairfax from taking possession of, and enjoying, the same: for we find that, by an act of Assembly of the said State, passed at a session begun the 21st day of October, 1782, entitled "An act to amend and reduce the several acts of Assembly for ascertaining certain taxes and duties, and for establishing a permanent revenue, into one act," after reciting the premises, makes the said act a perpetual law, as well for the purpose of enabling the Governor to credit the citizens in the Northern Neck for so much of the land tax as their respective quit rents might amount to; and that, since the death of the late proprietor of the Northern Neck, there was reason to suppose that the said proprietorship had descended upon alien enemies. It was therefore enacted, that persons holding land in the Northern Neck, under the act of the State of Virginia which quit rents which were then due, until the right of descent should be more fully ascertained, and the General Assembly should make final provision thereon. And all quit rents which might thereafter become due within the limits of the said Northern Neck, were directed to be paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth, for the session or sessions of Assembly, from which quit rents the inhabitants of the said Northern Neck were thereby exonerated from the future claim of the proprietor.

By another act of the same session of Assembly, entitled "An act concerning surveys," after reciting that the death of the Right Hon. Thomas Lord Fairfax might occasion great inconvenience to those who might incline to purchase or settle on vacant lands in the Northern Neck, it was enacted that all entries made with the surveyor of the counties within the Northern Neck, and returned to the office formerly kept by Thomas Lord Fairfax, should be held, deemed, and taken, as good and valid in law, as those theretofore made under the direction of the said Thomas Lord Fairfax, until some mode should be taken up and adopted by the General Assembly, concerning the surveys of the same.

By another act, passed at a session begun the 5th day of May, 1783, entitled "An act to amend the act and reduce the several acts of Assembly for ascertaining certain taxes and duties, and for establishing a permanent revenue, into one act," makes the said act a perpetual law, for the purpose of permitting the surveyors of the counties within the Northern Neck, were permitted to retain the same in their hands until the further directions of the Assembly, and that it was unjust that the executors of the late proprietor of the Northern Neck should be any longer prevented from receiving what was due to the said proprietor, at the time of his death, it was enacted that so much of the said Assembly, for the purpose of removing the said lands the same due at the time of the death of the said proprietor, should be, and the same was thereby, repealed.

And by another act, passed at a session begun the 17th day of October, 1785, entitled "An act for safe keeping the land papers of the Northern Neck in the Register's office," after reciting that, "since the death of the late proprietor, Thomas Lord Fairfax, no mode had been adopted to enable those who had, before his death, made entries for waste and unappropriated lands, in his office, nor to enable those who, since his death, had made entries within the said district, according to an act of Assembly, entitled "An act for the purposes of aforesaid," and that the said Assembly, might enable any surveyor to make, or thereafter be made, under entries made in the life of the said proprietor, or under entries made with the surveyor of any county, under the act of Assembly aforesaid, and which had been returned to the said proprietor's office, the register's office, the register should make out grants therefor, as the said Assembly directed; and the said Assembly, therefore, that the Governor, and the seal of the Commonwealth, be by law directed in cases of other unappropriated lands; and the surveyors with whom such entries had been, were thereby directed and empowered to proceed to survey and record the same, and to make return of such surveys to the register's office, in the same manner, and within the same time, as was, or should be directed, in cases of war," was passed, and, after its conference with the House of Lords, was, by the said Assembly, passed, and declared, by the said Assembly, as a law, and directed to remain in force during the Commonwealth. And it was further enacted, that, "from and after the passing of the aforesaid act, the unappropriated lands within the said district shall be subject to the same regulation, and granted as the same shall be subject to any survey or entry, made, or thereafter be made, under entries made in the life of the said proprietor, or under entries made by or under the register's office, with whom any surveyor of said Commonwealth, shall be by law directed to pasture, or seize of other unappropriated lands belonging to the said Commonwealth." And it was further enacted that the "land holders within the said district of the Northern Neck, should be forever thereafter exonerated and discharged from composition and quit rents, any laws, usage, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding.

The said memorial was, pursuant to the order of the Assembly, on behalf of the claimant, (Robert Lord Fairfax) who, together with all the heirs in remainder, (except Thomas Martin) we find to be loyal subjects of His Majesty, who resided in Great Britain during the troubles, by his agents in Virginia, praying to be relieved from the effects of the acts before recited, and to be restored to the possession of the quit rents within the said Northern Neck, to which he was entitled under the will of his mother, as before mentioned, which application was unsuccessful; but no copy of the said memorial, nor of the minutes of the said Assembly, relative thereto, having been produced to us, we are unable to state the particulars of the said application, or the grounds upon which the same was rejected.

On a full consideration of the above acts, it does not appear to us that there is anything contained in them (excepting the act of 1785) which operates as a forfeiture of the estate of Lord Fairfax, or those in remainder, after his decease; for, although the first act, of October, 1783, directs the payment of all quit rents that should thereafter be made by the surveyors, and the proceeds of the same, to the proprietors; and the second act, of the same year, which is expressed in that act, as to the prior quit rents, which are thereby directed to remain sequestered in the hands of the landholders in the Northern Neck, viz: there to remain until the rights of descent to the said territory be made final; it is not apparent that it makes final settlement of the same.

Further, it is not apparent that the said Assembly, after it had placed the said district under the same regulations with all the other lands within the said State, and having, also, entirely abolished the quit rents due therein, we are of opinion that Lord Fairfax, and those in remainder after his decease, are, thereby, entirely divested of their estate, and interest therein, and have lost every prospect of recovery.

At the same time we cannot help remarking, that this act appears to us to militate strongly against the spirit and meaning of the sixth article of the treaty of peace, which provides that there shall be no further confiscations made, by prosecution commenced, against any person or persons, for, or concerning the property of the part or parts, by which they have taken possession, against any person or persons, for, or concerning the property of the part or parts, by which they have taken possession, on that account, suffer any further loss or damage, either in person, liberty, or property: for, although it is not, by the terms thereof, an act of confiscation, yet it has all the effect and operation of an express act of forfeitures; and although the grounds and motives of passing it are not expressed, it appears that the parties concerned had, on the part of the claimant, subjects and aliens, either the landholders would not have been exonerated from the payment of quit rents, or that some compensation would have been made in lieu of the same.

It does not appear to us, that the act of 1729, entitled "An act concerning escheats and forfeitures from British subjects, which is to be in force of the act of 1728, which operates as a general act of forfeitures, has any relation to the present case, the same having been passed a considerable time previous to the death of the late Thomas Lord Fairfax, and none of the directions therein contained for ascertaining who were objects of the same act, having been pursued with respect to the present claimant, or, granting that they had, it could only operate as a forfeiture of the individual interest of Lord Fairfax for the term of his life; the estate of those in remainder being, in that case, as we conceive, protected and preserved by the fifth article of the treaty of peace, by which it is agreed that all persons who have any interest in confiscated lands, either by debts, marriage settlements, or otherwise, shall meet with no lawful impediment in the prosecution of their just rights. We submit, therefore, whether this be not, under all its circumstances, of the cases which call for the interposition of Government, to assist the parties in obtaining the due recovery of their property, by which they are thus guaranteed and protected by the treaty.

We have had some difficulty in ascertaining the value of the estate in question, for the several books and papers relative to the land office, having been, as we are informed, and appears by the act of Assembly of 1785, taken possession of by the State; it has not been in the power of Lord Fairfax to lay before us such clear and decisive evidence of the value of the same as was calculated to produce the just result. We therefore refer to the parole evidence of several respectable witnesses, as to the general reputed of the then amount, previous to the war, and the positive testimony of his lordship of their produce in the year 1768, when he was in Virginia, and had access to the books wherein the accounts thereof were kept; and, on a general consideration of all its circumstances, we are of opinion that the original value at £11,868, Lord Fairfax's sale, in order that Parliament may have every information to guide its determination, with regard to the compensation it may think fit to make for the loss of this property, if that should be its ultimate resolution, we have calculated the value of Lord Fairfax's life in the above sum; which we find to be £13,758.

In the above sum, we have not, for the reasons stated in our first general report, taken into account the arrears of quit-rents, which are stated, by Lord Fairfax, to amount to £28,000, nor of the waste or unappropriated lands, no proof having been laid before us of their extent or value, nor any claim made for the loss thereof.

The with respect to the private and unappropriated estates of the late Lord Fairfax, we have not thought it material to go into a particular inquiry respecting the same.

Copy of a letter written by John Wilmot, Esq. to George Rose, Esq.

Mr. Wilmot presents his compliments to Mr. Rose, and acquaints him that Lord Fairfax's property in America claims at £60,000, in which Lord Fairfax had only a life estate. The commissioners made a special report on this case, being under very particular circumstances. The result, however, lost, that Mr. Pitt recommended to Parliament to purchase Lord Fairfax the value of the life estate, which, after deducting what his lordship had already received from Government, amounted to the sum of £11,868.

No sum was recommended by Mr. Pitt to be granted to those who have the reversionary interest after Lord Fairfax's death.

January 24, 1792.

To the Right Honorable William Lord Granville,
His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, &c. &c.

The memorial of divers American loyalists, in behalf of themselves and others, residing in Great Britain and elsewhere, in His Majesty's dominions, most respectfully shews:

That, at the late American war, many of them, by the violation of their estates, had large sums of money justly due to them, by some of the richest inhabitants of the American States, on bond, note, and other securities, which were included in your memorialists' claims, delivered to in the commissioners of an "Act for appointing commissioners to inquire into the losses and services of all such persons who have suffered in their rights, property, and profession", during the late unhappy dissensions in America, in consequence of their loyalty to His Majesty, and attachment to the British Government. But, on the discussion of these claims, your memorialists were informed, by the said commissioners, that they could not take cognizance of such debts, as provision was made for the recovery thereof by the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and the American States.

That your memorialists have since exerted every endeavor to recover the moneys so due to them from their debtors, but were restrained by laws, passed from time to time, in the American States, regardless of the treaty; and where your memorialists' debts had been confiscated by laws of any of the States, on suits instituted by them, for the recovery thereof, it has been adjudged by the federal courts, that "those debts were exalted as to your memorialists, and vested in the States that passed the confiscatory law" your "memorialists not being real British subjects, but American British subjects, and therefore not entitled to the benefit of the treaty of peace", which adjudication equally precludes your memorialists from relief where their moneys had been paid, for their use, by their debtors, into the public treasuries, pursuant to laws of any of the States; and also where, at debtors had discharged the moneys owing by them in a depreciated paper currency, at the rate of six pence or less in the pound, under the sanction of arbitrary and unjust tender laws, passed from time to time in the American States during the wary although in the provision, of their debts, in the British articles of trade, to either side shall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money of all bona fide debts hereafter contracted", which article of the treaty mentioning creditors on either side, generally, without the least allusion to creditors of any particular description, the words "shall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money of all bona fide debts hereafter contracted", which article refers to laws and adjudications that would defeat the object as to any creditor who had adhered to Great Britain, and made themselves a party in the controversy; nor is the distinction between real British subjects and American British subjects reconcilable with the intent of the treaty, as it would promote a spirit of resentment and persecution, which ought to be avoided by the British government, to promote the peace of the two countries. Besides, the law, which is the strongest proofs of national a-tachment to natural justice, because it enables debtors to evade the just demands of their creditors, in violation of the most solemn contracts and obligations, which have ever been held sacred among all civilized societies.

That your memorialists, being informed that the British merchants have been called on by His Majesty's ministers for some statement of their demands against the subjects of the American States, in the negotiation now pending between their plenipotentiary and the British court, your memorialists think it a duty they owe to themselves and to the Government, to lay this representation of their hard case before your lordships, trusting their rights will meet with a more favorable determination in that negotiation; and that, if they should not ultimately satisfy the just demands of their past affairs, they would have been referred by the commissioners of the act of Parliament, above mentioned, your memorialists' claim on the national justice for compensation and relief. In the hopes whereof, your memorialists in gratitude will pray, &c. &c.

LONDON, October 9, 1794.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

Sir: As I cannot get a confidential person going to Liverpool in the ship which will carry this letter, to take charge of some remarks which will be submitted to your consideration, I prefer to send them by two other ships going to-morrow or next day, in them a passenger will be found, who will hasten to you with fidelity.

You must have received, almost by this time, my letter, which requests you not to stipulate against our citizens in case of a war between us and Great Britain, taking privateering commissions against that country. I barely repeat it.

The remarks above alluded to relate to the treaty on foot. Although, in the combining of your and Lord Grenville's projects, things may be so changed as that observations directed to each may be unavailing and inapplicable, yet, I must, in the hurry of the moment, take the liberty of suggesting that I am extremely afraid that the reasoning about the negocios will not be satisfactory. Indeed, I own that I cannot myself yield to its force. But, if you omit mentioning them at all, will not some quarters of the Union suppose themselves neglected?

If the British are to retain the posts until 1796, and have free access to the Indians within our limits in the mean time, have we not reason to apprehend that they will contrive to perpetuate their ascendency over them?

The departure of the vessel precludes me at present. I will, therefore, only acknowledge your duplicates Nos. 15 and 16, and your letters of the 18th of September and 3d of October, being Nos. 17 and 18.

The arrival of Mr. Bayard, and a letter from me preceding his appointment, will explain to you that it is the intention of the Government that the costs and damages attending all vessels and cargoes, within the catalogues of spoil, shall be defrayed by the United States; and that Mr. King's case, mentioned in my letter of August 15, is not regarded as discriminated from the others; but that all are to receive equal patronage in this particular.

It will be, however, of course, understood, that if, in this and the other cases, you can obtain redress, without a process through the courts, it is the wish of Government that the shortest method be pursued.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No 56.

LONDON, December 10, 1794.

Sir: I have been favored with your letters of the 11th and 28th October last, with the papers mentioned in them. As the treaty concluded on the 15th of last month was sent by the packet, and a duplicate was committed to the care of Mr. Blaney, who sailed in a vessel for Virginia, commanded by Captain Vickery, I flatter myself it will arrive before you receive this letter.

It gives me pleasure to acknowledge the attention and punctuality manifested in your letters, and your prudence in publishing only, in the way you mention, advices respecting the negotiations.

Yesterday I received a letter from Mr. Bayard, informing me that he was on the road from Falmouth to this place, and giving me a hint of his appointment.

Being very solicitous to return home, I purpose to embark in one of the spring vessels for New York or Philadelphia. The treaty may possibly not arrive so soon as that the ratification will reach this place before my departure, especially as not only the packet, but also Mr. Blaney, were detained a considerable time by contrary winds. I beg leave, therefore, to submit to the President's consideration the expediency of instructing Mr. Pinckney to make the exchange, in case of my absence, and of authorizing him to execute such instructions to me as may be sent with the ratification.

I wish I was now at Philadelphia, not only because I should then be in my own country, but because I could give you interesting information, which cannot be so advantageously communicated in writing as in conversation. I will make one remark. This treaty may be used by the open the Mississippi and rivers running through Florida.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir,

Your most obedient and humble servant.

JOHN JAY.

The Honorable Edmund Randolph, Esq. Secretary of State, &c. &c.

P. S. You will receive, herewith enclosed, a copy of Lord Grenville's full powers. Duplicates of Nos. 23, 24, and 25, are already on board the ship which will bear this.

Mr. Randolph to Mr. Jay.

PHILADELPHIA, December 15, 1794.

Sir: I suggested to you, in my last letter, on the 3d instant, the reason why much scope of observation could not be indulged, by the opportunity which then occurred, on your letter of September 13, 1794. Having a full assurance now that the danger of the sea can alone prevent this dispatch from reaching you in safety, I shall take the liberty, under the correction of the President, to run through, in a summary way, some parts of your interesting communication.

At the threshold, however, this important difficulty awaits us. Upon the fitness of your own or Lord Grenville's propositions, separately viewed, we might, perhaps, decide with satisfaction to ourselves. But, until the two projects shall be moulded into one—until we shall, at least, see how much will be yielded, on either side, our revenue. This will hinder from the war, unless we were to be applied to you, if they be not cautiously applied to a state of things which is not precisely the same with that which gave rise to you. You will be pleased, therefore, to accept them as testimonies of our anxiety that your mission may terminate happily to our country, and honorable to yourself and the mission you are about to undertake. As a mere point of honor, it would certainly have been in material to settle what act, on either side, constituted the first violation of the treaty of peace. Nor can we, at this distance, judge as well as yourself to what degree the present state of our claims, pretensions, and complaints, may be affected by relinquishing, or failing to fix on the British Government the first infraction. But, really, sir, the force of Lord Grenville’s reasoning appears to fall very short of its object.

That a property is acquired in movablees as soon as they come within the power of the enemy, is acknowledged. But the question is, that right when acquired, or, perhaps, it may be assumed.

In this instance, there was great reason for such a renunciation. Negroes were not, like moveables in general, difficult to be distinguished. They carried an infallible mark. British debts were stipulated to be paid, and the States in which the mass of them lay, depended for their payment, principally, on the culture of their soil, and, for the most part, on this species of property. As the negroes are conscionable of negroes; and it may, therefore, be supposed that, in this view, they were so indifferent as to be the more easily given up.

If the stipulation as to negroes did not mean an alteration in the actual state of property, and imported only and necessarily not to cause any destruction, or carry away any negroes, or other American property, why was it made? The cessation of war implied the cessation of further depredations; the renewal of depredation would have been the renewal of war. The words of treaties, if they can be construed in an operative sense, ought not to be turned to signify merely what would have existed without them. It was a thing, of course, that orders were given by the British Government against plundering, on the evacuation; or, if they should not be given by Government, it became incumbent upon the commander, in behalf of the British army in America, to issue them under his own authority.

The face of Lord Grenville’s argument seems to consist in a refinement of interpretation which he gives to the words “other property of the American inhabitants,” as if they confused the word “negroes” to those negroes who should be thereafter captured from the Americans by the British armies, and excluded such as were then denominated negroes, by the British army.

The use of the word “other” is merely to mark, whether the persons who were not to be carried away came within the description of negroes; and it is as far as to conclude, from the words “other property of the American inhabitants,” that the opinion of the negotiators was, that negroes within the British power were made, thereby, American property, as the negroes of the Indians of those parts of the United States in their power, and the negroes who were carrying them, still called them theirs, would have reclaimed them, upon the principles of postliminy, if they had been retaken by the army of America, or its ally, and thus even the pleatoriements themselves might, without any reproach, have talked of the negroes in British possession as the negroes of the American inhabitants. These ideas are supported by other parts of the 7th. Article: Why, the “carrying away” only mentioned, if negroes which might be thereafter seized were chiefly contemplated? Is it not reasonable to believe that, with this impression, it would have been said that negroes shall not be captured and carried away? If a critical exposition must be referred to, it may be said, that the hirprous and vague part of the construction is, that the American artillery that may be in the fortifications shall be left therein. That is, artillery made in America, but artillery the property of America, or, in other words, of the United States. Now, this artillery was surely the property of the British, at the moment of capture, and yet no pretence, as far as I can learn, was made to carry away our cannot. You must be too sensible of the anxiety of many parts of the United States, upon this subject, to pass it over unnoticed. Permit me, therefore, to beg your attention to the foregoing ideas, since I have it greatly at heart that your negotiation may not be encumbered by any objection which may be anticipated.

It was at first hoped that, as you had proposed June, 1795, for the epoch of surrendering the posts, and have not commented upon the proposition of Lord Grenville, for June, 1796, there might have been a mistake in copying what he wrote. But the duplicate of your letter of September 13th confirms the truth of 1796. In a past letter, you have been apprised of the unpleasantness which will accompany such a result. Further reflection has not diminished, but, on the contrary, has increased the repugnance of the President to this extension of the time. There must have been a look with which we must have beheld the necessity of the thing, to have the matter put at present, to catch the wheel of political events, in its rapid revolutions, before June, 1796, the face of things may be so much changed as to substitute the spirit which governed Great Britain in her past injustice towards us, in the place of that moderation which we experience in the hour of her degradation.

Every artifice for riveting an ascendency over the Indians, and countering our competition for the far trade, will have had its fullest scope. In short, the interval will be employed in rendering the influence of the British fort, from one side of the river to the other, as little operative as possible on the minds of the Indians, by gradually managing and persuading them to believe that the British fort is a mere conveniency, and that the neutrality of the United States, instead of being a pretense, is a reality.

And truly, sir, it cannot be deemed severe to insist upon June, 1795. For what purpose, since in all its aspects, is a twelvemonth more wanted? The distance for transporting the appendages of the garri- sons, the supplementary burdens which the treaty of 1795 involves, the fort, and the post, and the other consi- derations, will be as burdensome to the British as they will be to the United States.

But, under British alliances will be protected. The President of the United States is, in the opinion that the arrangements for June, 1796, will be injurious to the United States. We are fully sensible that something was to be yielded for the accommodation of the British garrison, so as not to precipitate their surrender of the posts; but it is a different thing to have abundance of force to be able to add that, as long as the British retain Detroit, and other posts within our limits, he is convinced that we shall never have perfect tranquility with the Indians. The free ingress and egress stipulated for British subjects, and the Indians, will, if it is feared, strike deep into our Indian trade; nor can we be sure that the reciprocity claimed by you is as important as you represent it. In a word, the revenue may be impoverished, goods may be imported through Canadian duty free.
I have the pleasure to inform you that your reasoning and conduct respecting the St. Croix and the Mississippi appeals, and the precedents in which those subjects have been placed by you, according to your different letters, is approved by the President.

The correspondence between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Hammond, relative to the captures of British vessels by French cruisers, either out of our ports, or manned by our citizens, places the subject of compensation upon the grounds on which it is most acceptable to this government.

Ought any settlers or traders within the precincts of any British garrison within the United States, to be protected in their landed property there, unless it lies strictly within the just limits of a garrison, and their title originated before the War of 1812, and is the true subject of compensation in all cases? Neutal commerce, if it can be so settled, had better be freed, as much as possible, from contraband. But it is particularly important that provisions should be so.

I am apprehensive that, to bind the British King to compensation only where our property has been illegally captured and taken under color of law, and commissioners or juries, and where apparent full justice and compensation cannot be obtained, and actually had, by judicial proceedings, will not reach the mischief; and that there is no effectual mode for repairing it but by granting compensation upon the broad principle of the instructions.

I have before you, and am not, I desire, to reason upon, that they violated our rights and laws, that they violated our rights and laws, and that it is the same thing if it be said that it was not the intention of those instructions that they should form a law for condemnation. In either case, compensation will follow.

My former letters have communicated the desire of the President that, in case we should have a war with Great Britain, the letter, the letters, excluded from private communication.

You, sir, who have before you the whole of this affair, from its first breaking to the British ministry, know best how to balance reciprocal concessions, which shall be satisfactory to the people of the United States. But the difficulty of accomplishing such a work is very apparent at all times and the delicacy of undertaking to pay the damages sustained by British creditors by lawful impediments, in consideration of advantages under a different head, is, at this time, exceedingly great.

The question as to the first violation of the treaty assumes an important shape, when your proposition for the commercial project of Lord Grenville, and the consequences of the recovery of British loans, and the manner in which British were the aggressors as to the negroes, we have a right to retaile. But, throwing this out of sight, since it was given to the French personal authority, many points may have received, before that time, by mutual understanding, a form and substance, and the law and equity may change; and 2. that, from the latitude of your instructions, you were left at such full liberty as to render it improper for me to express an opinion, by passing too minute stricures on what has been done. I flatter myself that the style of our intercourse has satisfied you that nothing can farther from my mind than any measure which, in a similar situation, I should not be pursued in my own case and you may be assured that, I am not for the hope that the course of this transaction, and my letter of the 12th ultimo, may, perhaps, have kept us uncoiled, I would not trouble you with any remarks.

The greater part of the first article, in Lord Grenville's commercial project, seems to be little more than that contrary to our rights of liberty and trade, and access to our ports, which is usually granted to our small powers.

But, if its meaning extends further, will not the provision which respects this article to the general laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively, leave the whole of this matter to the discretion of the two countries, and thereby render the stipulation totally unavailing, at least when the Legislature of either chooses to make it so?

The second article is customary, and Lord Grenville's correction of it is, perhaps, more suitable to the temper of the United States, which would steer as clear as possible of giving the least handle to a foreign Government to sce an exception by the right of the United States, and that of the United States. In any stage of the negotiation. The customs of most nations differ on this head; and, for ourselves, it can hardly be said that we have any, except those which are defined in the consular convention with France.

The right to purchase the duties of the particular kind being relinquished, it is an important consideration that, as the distinctions which now exist between foreign and our vessels are really of moment to our trade, our merchants will see them relinquished with reluctance, unless there be some very obvious equivalent; and if the stipulation extends to the removal of the restriction in the duties on goods brought to the United States in British bottoms, their reluctance will be so much the stronger.

The fifth article wants reciprocity. The British system is established upon the most abundant experience and examination of all the relations of British commerce, and contains now numerous prohibitions. Our system, which will mature and improve, contains none. By fixing this state of things, we should renounce an important right, the defect of which, if left, and placed ourselves on an equal footing. At any rate, it gives a claim to some very considerable equivalent.

I should have probably conjectured that this equivalent was supposed to be found in the sixth article, which opens to the West Indies to the St. Croix to the St. Croix, and to the West Indies as providing for claims of that kind. We are, therefore, led to weigh one part of this article against the others to compare this article with the arrangements of our trade to British Europe, in the preceding articles.

The duration of the privilege to trade to the West Indies not being co-extensive with the other parts of the treaty, the short term of its existence, as proposed to be granted, renders it of inconsiderable value. 2d. I confess that I often find myself at a loss to know what the proper construction of this article is, which prohibits vessels of the United States from carrying in West India productions or manufactures from the British Islands, to any part of the world, except the United States, is to be interpreted so literally as to extend to the West India productions or manufactures, or the West India possessions of other than the dominions of Great Britain. But there is no language in the article which is to be so interpreted as to exclude such private trade as I think, under the article above cited, we would renounce a valuable branch of trade, now enjoyed, and probably much more than would be gained. You will, therefore, I am sure, see the propriety of removing the doubt and preventing the mischief.

But, even if the proviso was not properly carried out in this part also, I would imply, in its mildest signification, that, after we have brought into the United States the productions or manufactures of the British West Indies, and have, by our own labor, in-manufactures which British vessels themselves bring hither, because they find it profitable to do so. It dictates too much to the United States in what manner a certain portion of our foreign export trade is to be conducted. And why is Lord Grenville desirous that this should be done? Ought not the British Government to be contented with the advantage which they will possess by being able to carry the productions and manufactures of their West Indies directly to foreign ports, while we should be first obliged to land them in the United States? Besides, we shall expose ourselves, by such a stipulation with Great Britain, to be urged upon the same points by every nation which is entitled to enjoy the privileges of the most favored nation.

The duration of twelve years, given by the seventh article to the treaty, as it respects the trade with Europe, and of only two years, as it respects the trade with the West Indies, will probably be very unacceptable. It will be the more so, as the commercial project of Lord Grenville does not even secure the status quo with the European dominions of Great Britain; that is, it does not secure the particular privileges and exemptions which we now enjoy by proclamation, compared with other foreign nations.

We might, perhaps, be better able to decide what is proper to be done, if we knew how far the whole of one project might be made, in the purpose of the British ministry, the condition for the whole of the other; how far one part of one project may be the condition of another part of the other; or how far any particular part of either project may be the condition of the other. It is great satisfaction, however, to believe that most of these remarks have occurred to yourself, and that the interest of the United States is well reposed in your discernment, talents, and zeal.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 27.

London, January 7, 1793.

Sir,

I have been favored with yours of the 29th October, 3d of November, and 12th of November, with the papers mentioned in them.

Considering the number of capture cases which Mr. Bayard would have to manage, and apprehending that it might cost much time and trouble to prevail on private persons to become sureties for costs, it appeared to me advisable to propose to Lord Grenville a stipulation on that subject.

On the 17th of last month, I had a conference with his lordship. He expressed much satisfaction with Mr. Bayard’s appointment. He considered it as a conciliatory measure, and would, with pleasure, do whatever might depend upon him to facilitate the business. We both saw that difficulties would occur in forming such a stipulation. He promised to consider it, and, after consulting the advocate general, to converse with me again upon the subject.

In the mean time, Colonel Trumbull set about making an accurate list of the papers in my possession, and which Mr. Bayard was to receive from me. That no time might be lost, several of the cases were delivered to him within a few days after his arrival.

On the 29th December, I received the following letter from Mr. Bird, viz:

London, 25th December, 1794.

Dear Sir:

The offer I made two days ago to you and Mr. Finckney was under the impression of the moment, and to give what little assistance might be in my power to remove any difficulty in the arrangements to be made for the adjustment of the appeals from our courts of Vice Admiralty.

On hearing that the security of the United States was to be offered as bail in these appeals, it struck me that, although no possible difficulty could arise as to the validity of the security, an objection might be made to the bail being given by a Government, not liable to be sued, instead of the usual mode of the bail of a person, resident in London, who could be sued. Under this impression, I immediately made the offer that, in such case, where it would be wanted, I and my partners would give the bail, taking the counter security of the United States.

Having since made inquiries in the commons, I find it likely that the objection would be made there on the ground of informality and deviation from the practice of the court, unless it was set aside by an order in council.

Under these circumstances, having consulted my partners, and obtained their full concurrence, I beg leave to repeat the offer, that in all such cases where the security of the United States was intended to be offered, which I suppose to be in those appeals where the parties in America have not the means of giving security by their regular correspondents, and even in these cases, if, to the intention of the United States to give their security in them, my partners and I are ready to give the requisite bail, taking as our counter security the bail of the United States, in such manner and form as you are empowered to give it, and as shall by our counsel be deemed sufficient to secure us, and provide for the reimbursement of such sums as our bail may make us liable to.

This offer is made from an anxious desire to serve both countries, by assisting in pving the way for your obtaining full justice to your citizens for the real injuries they have suffered, particularly under the hasty order of November 6, which, from the first moment of knowing it, I have never ceased to condemn, as equally unjust and impolitic. As nothing but proper compensation for the injuries your citizens have suffered, under that and similar measures, can restore that cordial friendship which it has ever been my wish to promote between the two countries, I trust that, by this offer of my feeble services to America, I cannot give a stronger proof of my zealous attachment to the real interests of my own country.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

To the Honorable John Jay, &c. &c.

To this letter I returned the following answer:

London, December 26, 1794.

Dear Sir:

I have been favored with your letter of yesterday, and am much obliged by the offer contained in it, which I think is intended for Mr. Bayard to accept; I will procure an instrument to provide for your being indemnified by the United States, which, when finished, I will submit to your consideration.

A copy of your letter shall be transmitted to the Secretary of State at Philadelphia, and I am persuaded that the friendly conduct of yourself and your partners, on this occasion, will make correspondent impressions on the Government and people of the United States.

I am, dear sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

To H. M. Bird, Esq.

In consequence of Mr. Bird’s offer, I wrote the following letter to Lord Grenville, viz:

To the Right Honorable Lord Grenville, &c. &c.

My Lord:

I have received a letter from Mr. H. M. Bird, of this city, containing an offer to become surety, together with his partners, for costs in the prosecution of claims and appeals in the capture cases, on engagements to be indemnified by the United States.
The difficulties which attend the stipulation on this subject, which I had the honor to propose to your lordship, induce me to think it advisable to accept this offer, and thereby relieve your lordship from further trouble on that head. I shall endeavor to make the necessary arrangements with Mr. Bird and his partners, and will inform your lordship of the result.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem, your lordship's, &c. &c. &c.

JOHN JAY.

To this letter I received the following answer, viz:

DOVER STREET, December 26, 1794.

DEAR SIR: I was about to write to you on the subject of the security, when I was prevented by your obliging letter. A slight indisposition, which has confined me to my room for these last three days, had hindered my seeing the King's advocate, as I had proposed. I had, however, taken some steps to bring the subject under his consideration.

The difficulties which seemed likely to arise, are completely done away by the mode which you have adopted; and I cannot omit this opportunity of again expressing to you the great gratification which we have all derived from so judicious and conciliatory a step as that taken by the President of the United States.

GROSVILLE.

To the Honorable John Jay, &c. &c. &c.

After having prepared the papers which, in my judgment, were proper for Mr. Bayard and myself to execute, in order to indemnify Mr. Bird, I sent them to him for his consideration. On the 3d instant, Mr. Bird called upon me: I explained to him exactly, in the presence of Mr. Pinckney, the precise state of the business; I observed to him that the Congress had not as yet passed any act for appropriating money to these purposes; but I had no doubt but that the arrangements contemplated, and the measures adopted by the President, relative to these cases, would meet with their approbation. He was desirous that the papers should specify the manner in which he should be indemnified. Upon which, he might be obliged to pay. I observed that it was not in my power to make any provision of that kind, without further instructions. We then completed the draughts of the papers. He said he would consult his partners, and inform me without delay of their joint determination. In the evening I received the following letter from him, viz:

JEFFRIES SQUARE, Saturday, three o'clock.

DEAR SIR: My partners agreeing with me that we run no risk in trusting to the honor and integrity of the Executive and Legislature of the United States, to perfect what Mr. Bayard has been authorized to engage for, you may complete the writings, and I will call on you Tuesday at 10 o'clock.

I am, &c. &c. &c.

H. M. BIRD.

Honorale John Jay, Esq. &c. &c. &c.

The following are copies of the papers above mentioned, viz:

Whereas the Secretary of State of the United States of America hath officially informed me that the President of the said United States hath empowered one of his agents to manage the claims and expenses in cases of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of American vessels, or other property, under color of authority or commissions from His Britannic Majesty: And whereas it will be necessary to the prosecution of the said claims and appeals that the usual security for costs in each cause be given: And whereas Henry Martins Bird, Benjamin Savage, and Robert Bird, of the city of London, merchants, trading under the firm of Bird, Savage, and Bird, have offered to become sureties, jointly or separately, as may be required, in the usual sums and form, for the payment of such costs as may be legally decreed against any such claimants or appellants, on the faith and engagement of the said United States to indemnify them for any losses or damages which they may sustain thereby: And whereas I am empowered and instructed to authorize you to execute bonds and make engagements (under my direction) to effectuate the said purposes: Now, therefore, I do hereby authorize you, in your capacity of agent, aforesaid, to pledge the faith of the said United States to the said Bird, Savage, and Bird, that the said United States shall and will well and truly indemnify the said Bird, Savage, and Bird, and each and every of them, and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, from and against all damages, costs, and charges, which they shall sustain or necessarily be put to, by reason of their becoming sureties as aforesaid, and will well and truly repay to them, their heirs, executors, or administrators, whatever sums of money they or either of them shall be obliged to pay on that account, together with interest for the same.

Given under my hand and seal, the 5th day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

JOHN JAY.

Sealed and delivered in presence of

JNO. TRUMBULL,

P. A. JAY.

To Samuel Bayard, Esq.

Know all men by these presents, That, whereas John Jay, envoy extraordinary from the United States of America to His Britannic Majesty, hath made and delivered to me an instrument in writing, under his hand and seal, in the words following, viz:

To Samuel Bayard, Esq.

Whereas the Secretary of State of the United States of America hath officially informed me that the President of the said United States has been pleased to appoint you agent to manage claims and appeals in cases of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of American vessels, or other property, under color of authority or commissions from His Britannic Majesty; and whereas it will be necessary to the prosecution of the said claims and appeals that the usual security for costs in each cause be given; and whereas Henry Martins Bird, Benjamin Savage, and Robert Bird, of the city of London, merchants, trading under the firm of Bird, Savage, and Bird, have offered to become sureties, jointly or separately, as may be required, in the usual sums and form, for the payment of such costs as may be legally decreed against any such claimants or appellants, on the faith and engagement of the said United States to indemnify them for any losses or damages which they may sustain thereby; and whereas I am empowered and instructed to authorize you to execute bonds and make engagements (under my direction) to effectuate the said purposes: Now, therefore, I do hereby authorize you, in your capacity of agent, aforesaid, to pledge the faith of the said United States to the said Bird, Savage, and Bird, that the said United States shall and will well and truly indemnify the said Bird, Savage, and Bird, and each and every of them, and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, from and against all damages, costs, and charges, which they shall sustain or necessarily be put to, by reason of their becoming sureties as aforesaid, and will well and truly repay to them, their heirs, executors, or administrators, whatever sums of money they or either of them shall be obliged to pay on that account, together with interest for the same.

Given under my hand and seal, the fifth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.
Hereafter, I, the said Samuel Bayard, agent, as aforesaid, have hereunto set my hand and seal, at London, on the day of January, in the year of our Lord thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

Sealed and delivered in the presence of—

Having more public money in my hands than I shall probably want, and Mr. Pinckney thinking that he could draw some money from Holland, we agreed each to place five hundred pounds in Mr. Bird's hands, as a fund to defray the current expenses of the prosecutions, until the measures to be taken on your side of the water for the purpose can be concerted.

When this is done, I purpose to give Mr. Bayard instructions relative to his drawing and applying moneys from this little fund; as to his agency, in general, I have given him the following, viz:

To Samuel Bayard, Esq., appointed by the President of the United States of America agent for claims and appeals, &c. &c. &c.

Having been made my duty to give you instructions relative to your agency, I think it expedient to give you the following under my hand, and will add to them as circumstances may require:

Agreeably to the advice which you have already received from me, you will procure a proper register, and enter in it the title of every cause, and note the different papers which belong to it, and minute, from time to time, every step taken in the cause.

You will, I think, find it useful to class all the cases according to their discriminating and governing principles and merits. Considering the number and variety of cases, this cannot be hastily accomplished; much examination, care, and judgment, will be indispensable in performing it with accuracy but, without such a classification, there will be no danger of overlooking or misapplying the funds, and all efforts are essentially alike.

If any one or more of the cases cannot, in the opinion of counsel, be prosecuted with a prospect of success, you will, nevertheless, file the claims and appeals, but not proceed further, until you shall have sent the opinions to the Secretary of State, and received his instructions, provided there be time; otherwise it will be best to give one or two of the strongest cases a strenuous trial, even though the last resort; and, in the mean time, take care that none of the others go against you by default.

You will find, that, in many of the cases, necessary documents and proofs are wanting; in such cases state the defects immediately to the Secretary of State; and (when opportunities offer) write also to the claimants or owners, pointing out, very particularly, what you want, and the manner in which the business should be done; and, if you have doubts, consult your counsellors. You know that commissions for examining witnesses abroad may be had, and may be expedient, in cases where extra proofs may be had, and be permitted. By all means avoid delay, and take care to be particular, perspicuous, and explicit, in your communications.

Money will, from time to time, be wanted, to defray the expenses incident to the suits. Mention this to the Secretary of State, in order that proper measures for the purpose may be taken, without loss of time. The fund I am preparing for those expenses will not be adequate.

In some of the cases the claimants or owners will probably constitute agents of their own to manage them; should papers respecting such cases be in your hands, you will deliver them to such agents, taking their receipts for the same; cultivate a good understanding with such agents; be useful to them, and endeavor to dispose them to be useful to you.

You will regularly inform the Secretary of State of your progress and prospects in the business: and I think it would be well to submit to his consideration the expediency of sending you a formal appointment, together with such instructions as may be deemed proper.

Whenever an application to the Government here would, in your opinion, be advisable, and on every other occasion, when you may desire advice and aid, you will apply to me, or, in my absence, to Mr. Pinckney.

You have undertaken an arduous task—great responsibility is attached to it. Although you have able counsellors in Sir William Scott and Dr. Nicholl, yet unremitting attention and diligence, on your part, will be absolutely necessary to your giving even a moderate degree of satisfaction to the many persons whose important interests are confided to your care and management. You will always find me ready to assist you in so conducting your agency as to render it beneficial and satisfactory to them, and honorable to yourself.

Given under my hand, at London, the fifth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

Permit me to suggest the expediency of arranging all matters that may relate to Mr. Bayard's agency, as speedily as possible, and of giving him explicit instructions relative to the conduct of it. I shall, if alive and well, return in the Spring, and it will be best to provide for exchanging the ratifications of the treaty, in case of my absence, by committing that formality either to Mr. Pinckney, if here, or to our consular, Mr. Johnson.

I have had some conversation with the Lord Chancellor about the Maryland cases, and am inclined to think it will have a favorable issue. In this I may be mistaken; but I shall continue to attend to it. During the negotiation I thought I could of and attend to little else.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

John Jay.

P.S. In my opinion, Mr. Pinckney should defer a certain business until the treaty is ratified; it will afford him strong ground for strong measures. I think this Government would rather promote than war the business alluded to; indeed, I am convinced of it, from a variety of considerations.

The Hon. Edm. Randolph, Secretary of State, &c.
Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 28.

London, January 31, 1785.

Sir:

You will herewith receive a duplicate of my letter of the 7th instant, to which this will be little more than a supplement; since the date of it no letters from you have come to hand, nor has any thing very interesting to the object of my mission occurred. My health is mended, and I wait with as much patience as I can command, for the day of my return to my country and family.

On the 27th instant Mr. Bayard wrote me the following letter, viz:

Dear Sir:

Your instructions of the 5th reached me on the 8th instant. The receipt of them I wished to acknowledge immediately, but was prevented by the circumstance of then changing my lodgings. Since my removal, I have delayed this duty till I could announce to you some progress in the business under my care.

As you have directed, I have made every possible exertion to procure a proper register, in which, conformably to your recent instruction, I have, with the assistance of a proctor, been engaged in entering the "title of every cause," in their order, as marked in Mr. Trumbull's list: the contents of every record and paper are examined, and the prominent features of every cause are copied into the register. In doing this, the first object of regard is to ascertain whether the usual time of entering an appeal has expired in any of the cases; that, if it has not, but shortly would expire, we might avoid the extra expense, delay, and trouble, of specially applying for leave to enter such appeal. Having accomplished this, our next step will be, agreeably to your instructions, to "classify the cases according to their discriminating and governing principles and merits." After which your other directions will regularly come into operation, and be faithfully executed.

There are, as you observe, sir, "in many of the cases, necessary documents and proofs wanting." In such, as soon as I can possibly with accuracy, I propose "to state the defects to the Secretary of State, and (when opportunities offer) to the claimants or owners." But to supply, for the present, the want of this particular information, I have described minutely to the Secretary of State the kind of evidence, and the mode of authenticating the same, that will be requisite to support the claims and appeals I am about to institute. If this should be communicated to the merchants of the United States, it will inform such as have not sent forward some papers, the deficiencies to be supplied; and it will instruct such as have not yet forwarded any of their proofs, how to render them complete.

There is no one of your instructions, I have more at heart, sir, than that which enjoins me, "by all means, to avoid delay." I am fully aware of the anxiety of the many persons whose interests I have in charge, to obtain a prompt determination of every dispute which they have been illegally deprived. I am aware, also, that our fellow-citizens, particularly those of the Eastern States, from being unaccustomed to great delay in legal controversies, will brook with impatience the dilatory proceedings of the English courts of admiralty. Rest assured, sir, I shall, therefore, diligently exert myself, and constantly urge our proctors to have the cases prepared for a hearing at the earliest moment, that no avoidable delay may exist, but, if any should, that it may not be attributable to us.

The sum of money which the United States will have to advance for the prosecution of this business, I am sorry to say, will be very considerable. I have mentioned to the Secretary of State the average expense that will be incurred in the premises, and the amounts to be provided for by the General Government. The proctors will expect an advance of about thirty pounds, in each cause where proceedings are instituted, which they must disburse to the advocates, register, &c. and for which they will particularly account.

If I am occasionally to take the opinion of counsel, as you intimate, by remarking that "I shall have able counsellors in Sir William Scott and Doctor Nicholl," it seems necessary to apprise you that a compensation for the advice I may take will always be expected.

There are, sir, as you know, sundry agents of American merchants in town, who have under their care some cases of appeal or claim. I have been requested by some of them to assume the direction of these causes, and to prosecute them at the expense of the United States; this, however, I have declined doing, until I could have your express instructions on the subject, which I request, as well for my own government as for the satisfaction of the gentlemen making the application.

In regard to the proctors whom we had best employ, I have made inquiry and taken advice. Messrs. Cricket and Townley, and Mr. Slade, have come forward with the strongest recommendations. Into the hands of the latter gentleman my judgment clearly points it out as our interest to put the larger part of the business; and for these reasons: He has in a Mr. Kcernan a very able assistant; he has not much business at present on hand; he is highly reported among the merchants of the States; he has never stated to the United States, and this is no instance, during the present war, been concerned for captors, but always for neutral claimants; his principles, and many of his friendships, are American. To me, personally, it is more agreeable to support business, than with others.

On the other hand, Messrs. Cricket and Townley have a large mass of the Danish and Swedish business still on hand; this may interfere in some degree with that of our fellow-citizens. Mr. Cricket's public engagements throw the burden of his business on his partner; we cannot, of course, expect a devotion of even the larger part of his time to our cause.

These things, however, sir, I write in perfect submission to your direction. Whatever instructions you may please to give in relation to the claims and appeals I am about to institute, it shall always be my pleasure, as it is my duty, implicitly and cheerfully to obey.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

Samuel Bayard.

To the Hon. John Jay, Esq.

To this letter I returned the following answer, viz:

Royal Hotel, Pall Mall, 27th January, 1785.

Dear Sir:

I was this afternoon favored with your letter of yesterday, informing me, among other things, "that there are sundry agents of American merchants in town, who have under their care some cases of appeal or claim, and that you have been requested by some of them to assume the direction of these causes, and to prosecute them at the expense of the United States;" that you had, however, declined doing it, until you should receive my express instructions on the subject.

In my opinion it will be proper for you to state this application to the Secretary of State, and be directed by such instructions as he may send you relative to it. The claimants are now prosecuting these causes by their own agents, and perhaps from preferences; and I much doubt the propriety of your assuming these causes at present, or that you could effect the utmost that can be done. I submit to the attention of my colleagues and advocate, to the American business; he has in no instance, during the present war, been concerned for captors, but always for neutral claimants; his principles, and many of his friendships, are American. To me, personally, it is more agreeable to support business, than with others.

I am the less advised to acquiesce in this opinion, on account of the necessity of employing, for this purpose, the services of Mr. William Scott, from motives of professional delicacy, declined recommending any in particular. Having no personal knowledge of the characters or professional merits of any of them, I found it necessary to be guided by the opinions of others. Mr. Pinckney, our minister, and Mr. Johnson, our consul, assured me, (as I mentioned to you) that Cricket and Townley, whom they had employed, had managed their business to their satisfaction. Their recommendation is with me decisive, as well from their ability, and means of forming a right judgment, as from the confidence due to their private and public characters. As men, they are judicious and upright; as public officers they gave me their opinions and advice, under a sense of official obligations, and under the influence of that attachment to our country and its interests which foreigners cannot readily be supposed to possess in an equal degree. Besides, it is a maxim with me, that they who are faithful to us, and who conduct our affairs to our satisfaction, should not be neglected by us. Neglect, under such circumstances, gives unmerited pain, and encourages malevolent imputations. For these reasons I think it my duty to instruct you to employ Messrs. Cricket and Townley in all cases in which the claimants shall not have already employed proctors, or in which they shall not otherwise provide, however, that you are perfectly free from all commitments to Mr. Slade. But if you are so circumstanced, relative to that gentleman, as that he has good reason to expect at least some share in the business, then, sir, I think it will be proper to give him such a number of the causes, not exceeding fifty, as in your opinion may be necessary to evince the fairness and sincerity of your intentions, in giving occasion to any reasonable expectations which your communications with him may have led him to entertain.

I postpone observations on pecuniary matters until the arrangement I am making on that subject, and which I mentioned to you, shall be completed. Be assured that every measure which may conduce to facilitate the business of your agency will command the earnest attention and best endeavors of,

TO SAMUEL BAYARD, Esq.

Thus, sir, from this letter, and from No. 27, you will acquire exact information of my proceedings relative to Mr. Bayard's agency. I am endeavoring, in concert with Mr. Pinckney and Sir William Scott, to form such an arrangement relative to pecuniary matters as to regulate payments to the proctors, to prevent improper charges, and so to conduct that part of the business, as that proper vouchers for all the expenditures may be kept and preserved. I am solicitous to prevail on Sir William Scott to examine the proctor's bills, and certify them to be right before they are paid. He has taken the subject into consideration, but as yet I have not got his answer. There are difficulties in forming this arrangement; I will do the best I can.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

Hon. Edm. Randolph, Esq., Secretary of State, &c. &c.

P. S. Such is the nature and magnitude of the business of these capture cases, as that, on certain occasions, diplomatic, and prudential, as well as legal proceedings may be advisable. Having maturely reflected on the subject, I take the liberty of submitting to your consideration the propriety of giving Mr. Pinckney a general superintendence over the business, and authorizing him to give Mr. Bayard such instructions as he may from time to time judge proper.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 29.

London, February 2d, 1795.

SIR: It occurs to me that I have omitted to inform you that, after signing the treaty, I took the three first opportunities which offered, of writing to our minister at Paris, 'that it contained an express declaration that nothing contained in it should be construed, or operate, against existing treaties between the United States and other Powers.

The following are copies of those letters, viz:

No. 1.

London, November 24th, 1794.

SIR: It gives me pleasure to inform you that a treaty between the United States and His Britannic Majesty was signed on the 19th instant.

This circumstance ought not to give any uneasiness to the Convention. The treaty expressly declares that nothing contained in it shall be construed or operate contrary to existing treaties between the United States and other Powers. I flatter myself that the United States, as well as all their ministers, will, upon every occasion, manifest the most scrupulous regard to good faith; and that those nations who wish our prosperity will be pleased with our preserving peace and a good understanding with others.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 2.

London, November 25th, 1794.

SIR: By a letter written and sent a few days ago, I had the pleasure of informing you that, on the 19th instant, the principal business of my mission was concluded by a treaty signed on that day.

It contains a declaration that it shall not be construed nor operate contrary to our existing treaties. As, therefore, our engagements with other nations remain unaffected by it, there is reason to hope that our preserving peace and a good understanding with this country, will not give uneasiness to any other. As the treaty is not yet ratified it would be improper to publish it. It appears to me to be, upon the whole, fair, and as equal as could be expected. In some respects both nations will probably be pleased, and in others displeased.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

No. 3.

London, November 28th, 1794.

SIR: Within this week past I have written to you two letters, to inform you that, on the 19th instant, a treaty between the United States and His Britannic Majesty was signed. The design of this letter is chiefly to introduce to you Mr. Pleasants, of Philadelphia, whose connections there are respectable. I have not the pleasure of being personally acquainted with this gentleman, but as a fellow-citizen I wish to do him friendly office; and I am persuaded that a similar disposition on your part will ensure to him such a degree of attention as circumstances may render proper.

As Mr. Pinckney has a cipher, with our other ministers in Europe, either he or I will shortly use it, in communicating to you the principal heads of the treaty confidentially. You need not hesitate, in the mean time, to say explicitly that it contains nothing repugnant to our engagements with any other nation.

With the best wishes for your health and prosperity, I have the honor to be, &c.

The Hon. James Monroe, Esq. Minister of the United States to the French republic.

517

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 30.

London, February 5, 1795.

Sir:

I received yesterday the following letter from Mr. Monroe, our minister at Paris, viz.

Paris, January 17, 1795.

Sir:

Early in December last, English papers were received here, containing such accounts of your arrangements with the British administration as excited much uneasiness in the councils of this Government, and I had it in contemplation to despatch a confidential person to you, as much information of what had been done, as would enable me to remove it. At that moment, however, I was favored with yours of the 25th November, intimating that the contents of the treaty could not be made known until it was ratified, but that I might say it contained nothing derogatory to the existing treaties with other Powers. Thus advised, I thought it improper to make the application, because I concluded the arrangement was real, and not to be departed from. I proceeded, therefore, to make the best use in my power of the information already given.

To-day, however, I was favored with yours of the 28th of the same month, by which I find you consider yourself at liberty to communicate the contents of the treaty; and as it is of great importance to our affairs here to remove all doubt upon this point, I have thought fit to resume my original plan of sending the necessary information, and have, in consequence, despatched the bearer, Mr. John Purviance, for that purpose.

I have been the more induced to this, from the further consideration, that, in case I should be favored with the communication of its particular and satisfactory information, it would be impossible for me to comprehend it, as Mr. Morris took his off with him. Mr. Purviance is from Maryland, a gentleman of integrity and merit, and to whom you may commit whatever you may think proper to confide, with perfect safety. It is necessary, however, to observe, that, as "nothing shall satisfy this Government but a copy of the instrument itself," and which, as our ally, it thinks itself entitled to, so it will be useless for me to make to it any new communication short of that: I mention this, that you may know precisely the State of my engagements here, and how I deem it my duty to act under them in relation to this object. I beg leave to refer you to Mr. Purviance for whatever other information you may wish to have either on this subject or the affairs more generally of this republic.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

To this letter I returned the following answer, viz:

London, February 5, 1795.

Sir:

I have received the letter which you did me the honor to write on the 17th of last month, by Mr. Purviance. It is much to be regretted that any misunderstanding, in English newspapers, of my "adjustments with the British administration," should have excited much uneasiness in the councils of the French Government; and the more so, as it does not imply that confidence in the honor and good faith of the United States which they certainly merit.

You must be sensible that the United States, as a free and independent nation, have an unquestionable right to make any pacific arrangements with other Powers which mutual convenience may dictate; provided, those arrangements do not contradict or oppress their prior engagements with other States.

Whether this adjustment was consistent with our treaty with France, struck me as being the only question which could demand or receive the consideration of that republic, and I thought it due to the friendship subsisting between the two countries that the French Government should have, without delay, the most perfect satisfaction on that head. I therefore, by three letters, of the 24th, 25th, and 28th of November, 1794, gave you what I hoped would be very acceptable and satisfactory information on that point. I am happy in this opportunity of giving you an exact and literal extract from the treaty; it is in these words, viz:—

"Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed, or operate, contrary to former and existing public treaties with other Sovereigns or States."

Considering that events favorable to our country could not fail to give you pleasure, I did intend to communicate to you concisely some of the most interesting particulars of this treaty, but in the most perfect confidence, as that instrument has not yet been ratified, nor received the ultimate forms necessary to give it validity. As further questions respecting parts of it may yet arise, and give occasion to further discussions and negotiations, so that, if finally concluded at all, it may then be different from what it now is, the impropriety of making it public, at present, is palpable and obvious; such a proceeding would be inconvenient, and unprecedented. It does not belong to ministers or public bodies to put things even when perfected, much less treaties not yet completed, and remaining open to alteration, or rejection. Such acts belong exclusively to the Governments who form them.

I cannot but flatter myself that the French Government is too enlightened and reasonable to expect that any consideration ought to induce me to overlap the bounds of my authority, or to be negligent of the respect which is due to the United States. That respect, and my obligations to observe it, will not permit me to give, without the permission of their Government, a copy of the instrument in question, to any person, or for any purpose, and by no means for the purpose of being submitted to the consideration and judgment of the councils of a foreign nation, however enlightened.

I will, sir, take the earliest opportunity of transmitting a copy of your letter to me, and of this in answer to it, to the Secretary of State, and will immediately and punctually execute such orders and instructions as I may receive on the subject.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JAMES MONROE.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, Minister of the United States of America to the republic of France.

As this letter and the answer to it speak for themselves, I forbear making any remarks.

I have the honor to be, with respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JAMES MONROE.

The Hon. EDMUND RANDOLPH, Esq. Secretary of State.
Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 31.

LONDON, 6th February, 1795.

Sir:

I was yesterday honored with yours of the 3d December last. Our vessels here being confined by the ice, I think it best to send you some despatches by the packet.

In considering the treaty it will doubtless be remembered, that there must be two to make a bargain. We could not agree about the negroes. Was that a good reason for breaking up the negotiation? I mentioned, in a former letter, that I considered our admission into the islands as affording compensation for the detention of the posts, and other claims of that nature. In that way we obtain satisfaction for the negroes, though not in express words.

We are not obliged, by treaty, to permit the French to sell prizes in our ports. By denying that privilege to all, we adhere to the line of impartiality, and without being assured of impartiality on our part, Britain would not have granted us what she has.

I wish the season had permitted me to accompany the treaty, for I think it is in my power to give you satisfactory answers to every question that can arise from it.

I have the honor to be, with respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN JAY.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 32.

LONDON, 23d February, 1795.

Sir:

This letter will comprise a duplicate of my letter to you, No. 30, of the 5th instant, and also a copy of an additional letter which I wrote to Mr. Monroe, on the 19th instant, and which will be carried to Paris by Col. Trumbull. (See No. 30.)

Copy of an additional letter, viz:

LONDON, 19th February, 1795.

Sir:

On the 5th of this month I had the honor of writing to you a letter, in answer to yours of the 17th ult. by Mr. Purviance, who is still here waiting for an opportunity to return, and who will be the bearer of that letter.

You will receive this by Col. Trumbull, who, for some time past, has been waiting for an opportunity to go through Paris, according to Mr. Stuygard, on private business of his own. He did me the favor to accompany me to this country, as my secretary. He has been privy to the negotiation of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, which I have signed; and having copied it, is perfectly acquainted with its contents. He is a gentleman of honor, understanding, and accuracy, and able to give you satisfactory information relative to it. I have thought it more advisable to authorize and request him to give you this information personally, than to send you written extracts from the treaty, which might not be so satisfactory. But he is to give you this information in perfect confidence that you will not impart it to any person whatever; for as the treaty is not yet ratified, and may not be finally concluded in its present form and tenor, the inconveniences which a premature publication of its contents might produce, can only be obviated by secrecy in the mean time. I think myself justifiable in giving you the information in question, because you are an American minister, and because it may not only be agreeable, but, perhaps, useful.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

The Hon. James Monroe, Esq.

Minister of the United States of America to the republic of France.

I flatter myself that these letters which I have written to Mr. Monroe will meet with the President's and your approbation.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

P. S. I have been honored with yours of the 4th November, and 11th and 16th of December, and with duplicates of yours of 15th, 20th, and 23d December last, and, in reply, shall write by one of the Philadelphia vessels, soon to sail.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph—No. 33.

LONDON, 5th March, 1795.

Sir:

On the 7th of last month I received the letter you were so obliging as to write me on the 16th December last, requesting to be informed what would probably be required for my expenditures, over the eighteen thousand dollars, in order that you might lodge a proper sum for me in Amsterdam.

It gives me pleasure to inform you that the eighteen thousand dollars will, in my opinion, be more than sufficient for the expenses incident to my mission. When you receive my letter respecting Mr. Bayard's agency, and the expenses that will attend it, and for which provision was yet to be made, you will be informed of my intention to apply part of these eighteen thousand dollars to those expenses; and consequently, that further supplies to me would not be requisite. It is, nevertheless, proper that I should write to you particularly about my expenditures, and I should have done it sooner, had I been less engaged about other matters more immediately interesting.

On considering of the manner of dwelling most advisable for me to adopt during my stay here, four plans or modes engaged my attention. To take a house and purchase furniture, &c.; to take a house and hire furniture, &c.; to take lodgings to reside in a hotel.

To take a house and furnish it, to hire and provide for the number of servants that would be necessary, to purchase the plate, china, glass, linen, liquors, kitchen utensils, and the many other articles which, according to the most strict rules of economy and propriety, would be indispensable, would, with the expense of a decent table, carriage, &c. required by the whole sum allotted. On my return to America, all these things would remain to be sold at auction, and at a very great loss.

To take a house and hire the furniture, and the numerous other necessary articles, was liable to objections equally strong. The ordinary rate of hire, I was told, amounted to an exceeding high interest on the prime cost. I should be responsible for loss, waste, and damage, and be exposed to disputes, and extravagant demands about them.

An equal number of servants would be requisite, and the losses from their peculation and mismanagement would be the same. To go into lodgings, I soon found was out of the question, there being none of a proper class, where a table would be provided. From these concise hints, you will perceive, that of these plans, that of residing in a hotel was the most expedient.

The expenses of living in a hotel are well known to be extravagantly high, but they are simple; many servants would not be necessary; and, on calculation, it became evident that the excess in the price of every thing which I should there pay, would not amount to near as much as the losses and extra expenses incident to either of the two first mentioned plans. But had this been otherwise, there was an objection which appeared to me of still greater importance. As I expected to remain in this country only until my business should be finished, any thing that looked like a settled establishment would have counteracted the idea of a residence only for a few months, and would naturally have created and justified an opinion, that I did not expect to have my negotiations terminated with that expedition which I professed and pressed.

To reside in a hotel not being usual for a foreign minister, I took care to let it be known that I expected to return in the course of a few months, and therefore could have no inducement to take a house.

The hotel I preferred is the one I am still in, viz: Royal Hotel, in Pall Mall, near St. James, the first, but the most expensive in London. My reasons for preferring the first must be obvious to you, and need not be particularlyized. I have but three servants, the one I brought with me, a footman, and a cookman; yet my expenses run high, and the bills are often so exact as to exact some of my patience. I know that I pay more than is reasonable, and am frequently charged rather according to the station I am in than the value of what I have; but I am nevertheless certain that, in this situation, less of the public money in my hands will be expended, than in any other in which I could, with propriety, have placed myself.

Having perfect confidence in the accuracy, as well as integrity of Col. Trumbull, I have made it an invariable rule, from the beginning, to commit to him the settlement and payment of all accounts, and the keeping of the books in which they are entered. I have, therefore, given him successive orders on my bankers for generally about one hundred pounds at a time, for which he made himself debtor, and regularly accounted. I regret that his private concerns call him to Stagtag, but that being the case, I could not refuse my consent. His salary is paid up to the last day of the month; my son will retire for him as secretary during his absence, so that his appointment and salary will continue until my departure for America. Until his return, I shall cause all moneys paid out to pass through the hands of my son. Pecuniary transactions for others are always delicate, and the utmost care and fidelity will not always be sufficient to guard one against the suspicions and imputations which certain characters (common to all countries) may find it convenient to germinate and encourage.

When Mr. J. Q. Adams was here, on his way to Holland, I advanced him fifty guineas. The following extract of a letter from him, of the 21st November last, explains the manner in which that sum is to be accounted for to the public:—

"The fifty guineas for which you was so obliging as to give me an order upon Messrs. Casanove, our bankers here have agreed to charge to my accounts; it will therefore be no further troublesome to you."

The bills you gave me for 40,476.4 on Amsterdam, were negotiated by Messrs. Casanove, and produced in sterling.

The draft for $1,000 on the Branch Bank at New York, produced 3,391 13 5

Of this money somewhat more than one-half still remains, and there are no outstanding accounts to pay.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph.

New York, May 28, 1795.

Sir:—

It appearing by advices from America, that the treaty had not arrived at Philadelphia the last of February, I concluded that the ratification could not reach me in season to return in any of the Spring vessels that yet remained, I embarked at Bristol, the 19th April, on board the Severn, Captain Goodrich, and landed here this afternoon, when I had the pleasure of receiving yours of the 26th of last month. Not having had a well day during the voyage, I am at present too feeble to undertake a journey to Philadelphia; perhaps I may in a week or ten days be so far recovered as to be able to perform it. I will be useful that we confer. At this moment I cannot enlarge, for want of leisure; besides, I find myself greatly fatigued. Remember me to the President. Accept my thanks for your obliging attention to Mrs. Jay.

Yours, &c.

JOHN JAY.

The Hon. Edmund Randolph, Secretary of State, &c.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph.

New York, June 1, 1795.

Sir:—

Last Thursday evening I wrote you a few hasty lines, to inform you that I had just arrived; that I had received your letter of the 36th ult.; that I was too feeble to repair immediately to Philadelphia; and that I hoped to be able to undertake the journey in eight or ten days. Be so good as to inform me whether I may expect you here if not, I will go for a few days out of town, where I should probably recruit faster than at home. I shall attempt the journey to Philadelphia within a fortnight, unless I should grow weaker, which I do not apprehend. The communications proposed for the Senate indicate the disposition I expected. I had no apprehensions on that head, being persuaded that those communications would be entirely directed by regard to public good. Be pleased to present my respectful compliments to the President.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, I remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN JAY.

The Hon. Edmund Randolph, Secretary of State.

Mr. Jay to Mr. Randolph.

New York, June 1, 1795.

Sir:—

Since writing to you this morning by Mr. Bingham, I have been honored with yours of the 30th ult. Your reasons for not thinking it advisable to leave Philadelphia at present, are, I think, conclusive. In the course of the next week, I hope to be with you; and then to give you more full and satisfactory answers to your letter, than the following concisely, viz: To the first question. In my opinion the views of Great Britain, when I arrived there, had been and then were, so far bêtele to us as they had been rendered so, by popular indications of a disposition in this country to aid France in the war against her.

2. I am convinced that the evacuation of the posts at a more early period was (for the reasons mentioned in my letter on that subject) untenable. It was my duty, and I have strenuously, and, I believe, successfully, endeavored to exhaust their ultimatums.

3. Notwithstanding all that could be said, to postpone the prohibition to sell prizes, until after the present war, it was insisted that, as, on the one hand, they asked nothing from us but what they had a right to expect from a neutral nation, so, on the other, that no deviations from the line of impartiality (not stipulated for by our pre-existing treaties) could possibly be admitted.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

4. Most clearly the treaty does prohibit the re-exportation from the United States, in American vessels, of the West India commodities enumerated in the treaty, though brought from French islands, if being impossible to distinguish, but we may carry them from French or other Islands (not British) to Europe. That article being offered as a proviso only, with the stipulation with it, cannot admit of it, and cannot possibly be interpreted to prohibit the re-exportation of the enumerated articles. If the article should be regarded as ineligible, might not the passing of those laws be postponed, and the trade continue to go on as at present? taking care properly to represent to the British Government, that if we insist on the article, it will lead to the absolute prohibition of all foreign trade, necessitating the re-exportation, and mutilating the commerce of the United States. The British Government, however, ought to be furnished with the means of pursuing that commerce; and this article, if it be not available in a peaceable manner, ought to be thrown in our teeth, and请求 their consent to its remaining dormant. In my opinion, however, it is manifestly our interest to accept and to execute it; especially considering its very limited duration, and the probability of its being introductory to more favorable arrangements, as the public mind in Britain shall gradually become more reconciled to this, and the other unfortunate consequences from their navigation and articles of commerce.

5. The Danish stipulations were not adjusted when our treaty was signed; and I have no ideas of their obtaining better terms.

6. The discussions in the admiralty will probably be tedious, and the more so from the want of documents in the great majority of the cases in a large number of them, appeals and claims have not yet been lodged, for want of the names of the parties.

7. Such orders may be expected as the treaty, according to its true intent and meaning, shall dictate. I believe, however, that the existing executive will continue the laws in force, and the cases of which this treaty, in any part, does not affect.

With sentiments of respect and esteem,
I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

The Honorable Edm. Randolph, Esq. Secretary of State, &c. &c.

Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between His Britannic Majesty, and the United States of America, by their President, with the advice and consent of their Senate.

His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America being desirous, by a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, to terminate the disputes which have arisen between his Majesty, as, without reference to the merits of their respective complaints and pretensions, may be the best calculated to produce mutual satisfaction and good understanding, and also to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective countries, territories, and people, in such a manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory; they have, respectively, named their plenipotentiaries, His Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary, Edm. Randolph, Esq., and aforesaid, for the purpose of a full and perfect conclusion of a treaty of commerce and navigation between his Majesty and the United States, and to conclude the said United States, and their envoy extraordinary to His Majesty who have agreed on and concluded the following articles:

Art. 1. There shall be a firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and a true and sincere friendship, between His Britannic Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the United States of America; and between their respective countries, territories, and the several towns, cities, and other places and parts of each of them, of every denomination, without any exception of persons or places.

Art. 2. His Majesty will withdraw all his troops and garrisons from all posts and places within the boundary lines assigned by the treaty of peace to the United States. This evacuation shall take place on or before the first day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, and all the proper measures shall be taken in the interval by concert between the Government of the United States and His Majesty's government in America, for settling the previous arrangements which may be necessary respecting the delivery of the said posts; the United States, in the mean time, at their discretion, extending their settlements to any part within the said boundary lines, except within the precincts or jurisdiction of any of the said posts. All settlers and traders, within the precincts or jurisdiction of the said posts, shall continue to enjoy, unimpeded, all their property, of every kind, and shall be free to carry on, all necessary transactions with British subjects, and it shall also be free to them to sell their lands, houses, or effects, or to retain the property thereof, at their own disposal; and if any property be taken from them, or if any of them be detained in any manner by the Americans, the British plenipotentiary shall have the most unremitting endeavors to get it restored to them, and to bring the persons concerned to justice. It is also agreed that the treaty does not extend to the admission of vessels of the United States into the seaports, harbors, bays, or creeks, of His Majesty's said territories; nor into such parts of the rivers in His Majesty's said territories as are between the mouth thereof and the highest port of entry from the sea, except in small vessels trading bona fide between Montreal and Quebec, under such regulations as shall be established to prevent the possibility of any frauds in this respect.

Nor to the admission of British vessels from the sea into the rivers of the United States, beyond the highest ports of entry from the sea, except in small vessels trading bona fide between Montreal and Quebec, under such regulations as shall be established to prevent the possibility of any frauds in this respect.

Art. 3. It is agreed that it shall at all times be free to His Majesty's subjects, and to the citizens of the United States, and also to the Indians dwelling on either side of the said boundary line, freely to pass and repass, by land, or inland navigation, into the respective territories and countries of the two parties, on the continent of America, (the country within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted,) and to navigate all the lakes, rivers, and waters thereof, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other. But, it is understood that this article does not extend to the admission of vessels of the United States into the seaports, harbors, bays, or creeks, of His Majesty's said territories; nor into such parts of the rivers in His Majesty's said territories as are between the mouth thereof and the highest port of entry from the sea, except in small vessels trading bona fide between Montreal and Quebec, under such regulations as shall be established to prevent the possibility of any frauds in this respect.

Nor to the admission of British vessels from the sea into the rivers of the United States, beyond the highest ports of entry from the sea, except in small vessels trading bona fide between Montreal and Quebec, under such regulations as shall be established to prevent the possibility of any frauds in this respect.

In like manner, all goods and merchandise whenever imported into the United States, shall be free to all the subjects of his Majesty, without any duty or impost thereon, and may freely, for the purposes of commerce, be carried into the same in the manner aforesaid, by the citizens of the United States, and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by the citizens of his Majesty, on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories. And in like manner, all goods and merchandise whenever imported into his territories, shall be free to all the citizens of the United States, and may freely, for the purposes of commerce, be carried into the same, in the manner aforesaid, by his Majesty's subjects, and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by the citizens of the United States, on the importation of the same from the United States into the said territories.

And all goods not prohibited to be exported from the said territories respectively, may, in like manner, be carried out of the same by the two parties, respectively, paying duty as aforesaid.

Art. 4. That the duties of entry shall ever be levied by either party on peltries brought by land, or inland navigation, into the territories of the other party, nor shall any of the Indians pass thereon, without the consent of the party with which the Indians shall be respectively of whatever nature, pay for the same any impost or duty whatever. But goods in bales, or other large packages, unusual among Indians, shall not be considered as goods belonging bona fide to Indians.

No higher or other tolls or rates of carriage than what are or shall be payable by natives, shall be demanded on either side; and no duties shall be payable on any goods which shall merely be carried over any of the portages or carrying places on either side, for the purpose of being immediately reimported and carried to some other place or places. But as, by this stipulation, it is only meant to secure to each party a free passage across the portages on both sides, it is agreed that this exemption from duty shall extend only to such goods as are carried in the usual and direct road across the portage, and are not attempted to be in any manner sold or exchanged during their passage across the portages, in order to prevent such frauds as might arise from the continuance of the same in this respect.

As this article is intended to render, in a great degree, the local advantages of each party common to both, and thereby to promote a disposition favorable to friendship and good neighborhood, it is agreed that the respective Governments will mutually promote this amicable intercourse, by causing speedy and impartial justice to be done, and necessary redresses to be obtained where they may have been delayed or prevented.

Art. 4. Whereas it is uncertain whether the river Mississippi extends so far to the northward as to be intersected by a line to be drawn due west from the Lake of the Woods, in the manner mentioned in the treaty of peace between His Majesty and the United States, it is agreed that measures shall be taken in concert between His Majesty and the United States, for making a joint inspection of the said river, from one degree of latitude below the falls of St. Anthony, to the principal source or sources of the said river, and also of the parts adjacent thereto; and that, if, on the result of such survey, it should appear that the said river would not be intersected by such a line as is above mentioned, the two parties will thereupon proceed, by amicable negotiation, to adjust the parts to be judged of, according to the said inspection, and to treat the said parties, according to justice and mutual convenience, and in conformity to the intent of the said treaty.

Art. 5. Whereas doublets have arisen what river was truly intended under the name of the river St. Croix, mentioned in the said treaty of peace, and forming a part of the boundary therein described, that question shall be referred to the final decision of commissioners to be appointed in the following manner, viz: One commissioner shall be named by His Majesty, and one by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and the said two commissioners shall agree on the choice of a third; or, if they cannot agree, they shall each propose one person, and of the two names so proposed, one shall be drawn by lot. And the presence of the two original commissioners, so appointed, shall be sworn impartially to examine and decide the said question, according to such evidence as shall respectively be laid before them on the part of the British Government and of the United States. The said commissioners shall meet at Halifax, and shall have power to adjourn to any other place or places as they shall think fit. They shall have a quorum of two; and such or other persons as they shall think fit to appoint, shall be sworn in as clerks and stenographers; and the said commissioners shall, by a declaration, under their hands and seals, decide what river is the river St. Croix, intended by the treaty. The said declaration shall contain a description of the said river, and shall particularly mention, in full and particular, the course, the limits, the turns, the indentures, the river, and other particular parts of the said river, of which they have had knowledge, made by means of their agents and their steps, or for which they have been informed, and the information are and shall be part of their journal. They shall also state the account of their journals, and of the proceedings, shall be delivered by them to the agent of His Majesty, and to the agent of the United States, who may be respectively appointed and authorized to manage the business on behalf of the respective Governments. And both parties agree to consider such decision as final and conclusive, so as that the same shall never thereafter be called into question, or made the subject of dispute or difference between them.

Art. 6. Whereas it is alleged by divers British merchants, and others, His Majesty's subjects, that debts to a considerable amount, which were bona fide contracted before the peace, still remain owing to them by citizens or subjects of the United States, and that in the absence of various causes, not only the full recovery of the said debts has been delayed, but also the value and security thereof have been impaired and lessened, so that, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the British creditors cannot obtain, and actually have not and cannot receive full and adequate compensation for such losses and damages which they have sustained, either before the peace, or for such losses and damages which they will sustain when the peace shall be performed; not, for whatever reason, but actually obtained, had, and received, by the said creditors, in the ordinary course of justice, the United States will make full and complete compensation for the same to the said creditors; but it is distinctly understood that this provision is made only to compensate such debts as have been occasioned by the lawful impediments of the war, and not to extend to losses occasioned by such insolvency of the debtors, or other causes, as would equally have operated to produce such loss, if the said impediments had not existed, nor to such losses or damages as have been occasioned by the manifest delay or negligence, or willful omission, of the claimant.

For the purpose of ascertaining the amount of such losses and damages, five commissioners shall be appointed, and authorized to meet and act in manner following, viz: Two of them shall be appointed by His Majesty, two of them by the President of the United States, and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and the fifth by the unanimous voice of the other four; and if they should not agree in such choice, then the commissioners shall choose a fifth. The said commissioners, and of the said five, shall sit together, and by lot, in the presence of the four original commissioners. When the five commissioners thus appointed shall first meet, they shall, before they proceed to act, respectively take the following oath, or affirmation, in the presence of the four original commissioners, that I will, so far as in me lies, act with good faith, and swear, or affirm, that I will honestly, diligently, impartially, and carefully examine, and, to the best of my judgment, and belief, report the amount of such debts, claims as aforesaid, and the commissions shall be put to each of the said commissioners; and that I will forbear to act as a commissioner in any case in which I may be personally interested.

The said commissioners shall constitute a board, and shall have power to do any act appertaining to the said commissioners, provided that one of the said commissioners named on each side, and the fifth commissioner, shall be present; and all decisions shall be made by the majority of the voices of the commissioners then present.

Eighteen months from the day on which the said commissioners shall form a board, and be ready to proceed to business, are assigned for receiving complaints and applications; but they are, nevertheless, authorized, in any particular cases in which it shall appear to them to be reasonable and just, to extend the said term of eighteen months for any term, not exceeding six months, after the expiration thereof. The said commissioners shall first meet at Philadelphia, but they shall have power to adjourn from place to place, as they shall see cause.

All parties, citizens and applicants of the States, are empowered and required, in pursuance of the true intent and meaning of this article, to take into their consideration all claims, whether of principal or interest, or balances of principal and interest, and to determine the same, respectively, according to the manner of the several cases, the degree being had to all the circumstances thereof, and as equity and justice shall appear to them to require. And the said commissioners are hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as shall come before them, on oath or affirmation, touching the premises; and also to receive in evidence, according as they may think most consistent with equity and justice, all written depositions, or books, or papers, or copies, or extracts, or other written or printed or other evidence, as shall be proper according to the legal forms now respectively existing in the two countries, or in such other manner as the said commissioners shall see cause to require or allow.

The said commissioners, or of the said commissioners, or of two of the said commissioners, as agreed on, shall, in all cases, be final and conclusive, both as to the justice of the claim, and to the amount of the same to be paid to the creditor or claimant, and the United States undertake to pay the sum so awarded to be paid in specie to such creditor or claimant, without deduction, and at such time or times, and at such place or places, as shall be awarded by the said commissioners; and on the payment whereof the United States will be paid by the said commissioners the sum so paid; provided, always, that no such payment shall be made by the said commissioners to take place sooner than twelve months from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

Art. 7. Whereas complaints have been made by divers merchants and other citizens of the United States, that during the course of the war in which His Majesty is now engaged, they have sustained considerable losses and damage, by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from His Majesty; and that, from various circumstances belonging to the said cases, adequate compensation for the losses and damages so sustained cannot now be actually obtained, had, and received, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; it is agreed that, in all such cases where adequate compensation cannot, for whatever reason, be now actually obtained, had, and received, by the said merchants and others, in the ordinary course of their business, the present proclamation for the said complaints. But it is distinctly understood that this provision is not to extend to such losses or damages as have been occasioned by the manifest delay or negligence, or willful omission, of the claimant.

That, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of any such losses and damages, five commissioners shall be appointed, who shall be entitled to act in the manner and in the manner laid down in the preceding article; and after having taken the same oath or affirmation, (mutatis mutandis) the same term of eighteen months is also assigned for the reception of claims, and they are in like manner authorized to extend the same in particular cases. They shall receive testimony, books, papers, and evidence, in like manner as the like decisions in the United States courts, and shall decide the case upon such evidence as to the merits of the several cases, and to justice, equity, and the laws of nations. The award of the said commissioners, or any such three of them, as aforesaid, shall, in all cases, be final and conclusive, both as to the justice of the claim and the amount of the damages, or of both, and such award shall be binding on the parties respectively, and be paid to the said claimants, or to such claimant in specie, without any deduction, at such place or places, and at such time or times, as shall be awarded by the said commissioners, and on condition of such releases or assignments to be given by the claimant, as the said commissioners may be directed.

And where it shall be shown that His Majesty's subjects, complain that, in the course of the war, they have sustained loss and damage, by reason of the capture of their vessels and merchandise, taken within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, and brought into the ports of the same, or taken by vessels originally armed in ports of the said States, it is agreed that, in all such cases, the said complaints shall be attended to in like manner, as to the tenor of the letter from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Hammond, dated at Philadelphia, September 5, 1778, a copy of which is annexed to this treaty, the complaints of the parties shall be, and hereby are, referred to the commissioners to be appointed by virtue of this article, who are hereby authorized and required to proceed, in the like manner, relative to these as to the other cases committed to them; and the United States undertake to pay to the said claimants or claimants, in specie, without deduction, the amount of such sums as shall be awarded to them respectively by the said commissioners, and at the times and places which, in such awards, shall be specified; and on condition of such releases or assignments to be given by the claimants, as in the said awards may be directed; and, it is agreed, that exclusive of any claim for salvage, the said commissioners shall have no power to make any award of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, shall be considered as being within the provisions, intent, and meaning, of this article.

Art. 8. It is further agreed that the commissioners, mentioned in this and the two preceding articles, shall be compensated in manner and amount agreed on; and shall be paid at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty. And all other expenses, attending the said commissioners, shall be defrayed jointly by the two parties, the same being previously ascertained and allowed by the majority of the commissioners. And in the case of death, sickness, or necessary absence, the place of such commissioner, shall be supplied by such other commissioner as was first appointed, and the new commissioners shall take the same oath or affirmation, and do the same duties.

Art. 9. It is agreed that British subjects, who now hold lands in the territories of the United States, and American citizens, who now hold lands in the dominions of His Majesty, shall continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein; and may grant, sell, or devise, the same, to whom they may think fit; provided, that the said lands may be held, in the same manner as lands in the United States; and all sales of the same, or assignments, shall, so far as may respect the said lands, and the legal remedies incident thereto, be regarded as alien.

Art. 10. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys which they may have in the public funds, or in the public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or other military operations, be impressed, levied upon, or contracted and made by individuals, having confidence in each other and in their respective Governments, should ever be destroyed or impaired by national authority, on account of national differences and discontent.

Art. 11. It is agreed, between His Majesty and the United States of America, that there shall be a reciprocal and entirely perfect liberty of navigation and commerce between their respective people, in the manner, under the limits, and conditions, and in the fairs, and such as shall be ascertained, and declared, by the British and American commissioners, in the said preceding articles.

Art. 12. His Majesty consents that it shall and may be lawful, during the time hereinafter limited, for the citizens of the United States to carry to any of His Majesty's islands and ports in the West Indies, from the United States, in their own vessels, not being above the burthen of seventy tons, any goods or merchandise, being of the growth or manufacture of the United States, or of the said islands, or of the United States, and of the said islands, as the case may be; and to carry such goods or merchandise, or of the said States, which is or may be lawful to carry to the said islands or parts from the said States, in British vessels; and that the said American vessels shall be subject there to no other or higher tonnage duties or charges than shall be payable by British vessels in the ports of the United States; and that the cargoes of the said American vessels shall be subject there to no other or higher duties or charges than shall be payable by the said vessels, and at the same time, in all respects, as the said vessels in British vessels.

And His Majesty also asserts that it shall be lawful for the said American citizens to purchase, load, and carry away, in their said vessels, to the United States, from the said islands and ports, all such articles, being of the growth, manufacture, or produce, of the said islands, as may now by law be carried from them to the said States in British vessels, and subject only to the same duties and charges, on exportation, to which British vessels and their cargoes are, or shall be, subject, in similar circumstances.

Provided always, that the said American vessels do carry and land their cargoes in the United States only; being accurately and distinctly declared in the conclusion of this article. The United States will prohibit and restrain the carrying any molasses, sugar, coffee, cocoa, or cotton, in American vessels, either from His Majesty's islands, or from any part of the world, except the United States, reasonable sea stores excepted. Provided also, That it shall and may be lawful to carry from the United States, and from the said islands, and the export from the United States to the said islands, all articles whatever, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the said islands, or of the United States, respectively, which now may, by the laws of the said States, be so imported and exported. And that the cargoes of the British vessels shall be subject to no other or higher duties, or charges, than shall be payable on the same articles if so imported or exported in American vessels.

It is agreed that this article, and every matter and thing therein contained, shall continue to be in force during the continuance of the war in which His Majesty is now engaged; and also for two years from and after the day of the termination of the said war, or any part or any of the said wars, of perpetual duration.

And it is further agreed that, at the expiration of the said term, the two contracting parties will endeavor further to regulate their commerce in this respect, according to the situation in which His Majesty may then find himself; being hereby understood that it is a view on the part of the American congress, to the advantage and commerce of the said States, and the said States will be regular, and be rendered as favorable article ever.

Art. 13. His Majesty consents that the vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States of America shall be admitted, and hospitably received, in all the seaports and harbors of the British territories in the East Indies; and that the citizens of the said United States may freely carry on a trade between the said territories and the said United States in all articles of which the importation or exportation, respectively, to or from the said territories, shall not be entirely prohibited. Provided, only, That it shall not be lawful for them, at any time of war between the British Government and any other Power or State whatever, to export from the said territories, or from the said Government, permission of the British Government there, any military stores, or naval stores, or rice. The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted into the said ports, or to higher tonnage duty then shall be payable on the vessels of the United States. And they shall pay no other or higher duties or charges, on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels, than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in British vessels. But it is expressly agreed, that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any of the articles exported by them from the said British territories to any port or place, except to such as are carried on board their vessels to be sold in the said territories, and shall be considered as carrying on the said vessels, duties and charges, which shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in British vessels.

It is also understood that the permission granted by this article is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories; but vessels going with their original cargoes to or from the ports of the United States, whether British, or other, are not to be considered as carrying on the coasting trade. Neither is this article to be construed to allow the citizens of the said States to settle or reside within the said territories, or to go into the interior parts thereof, without the permission of the British Government established there. And the said Individuals or the British Government in this respect, the observance of the same shall and may be enforced against the citizens of American in the same manner as against any British subjects or others transgressing the same rule. And the citizens of the United States, whenever they arrive in any port or harbor in the said territories, or if they should be permitted, in manner aforesaid, to go to any other place within the same, shall always be subject to the laws, governmental, and jurisdictional, of whatever nature, established there in such harbors, port, or place, according as the same may be. The citizens of the United States may also touch for refreshment at the island of St. Helena, but subject in all respects to such regulations as the British Government may from time to time establish there.

ART. 14. There shall be, between all the dominions of His Majesty in Europe, and the territories of the United States, a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation. The people and inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty, freely and securely, and without hindrance and molestation, to come with their ships and cargoes to the lands, countries, cities, ports, places, and rivers, within the dominions and territories of the other, and to go out, and bring in, such merchandise and manufactures, as they shall think fit, without any limitation of time. Also to hire and possess houses and warehouses, for the purposes of their commerce, and for the accommodation of their merchants and traders, on each side, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always, as to what respects this article, to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

ART. 15. It is agreed that no duties shall be paid by the ships or merchandise of the one party, in the ports or harbors of the other, than such as are paid by the like vessels or merchandise on the parts of the other, or other or higher duty be imposed in one country, on the importation of any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the other, than are, or shall be, payable on the importation of the like articles, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the one party, and the said duties or prohibitions be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles to or from the territories of the two parties, respectively, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

But the British Government reserves to itself the right of imposing on American vessels, entering into the British dominions in Europe, a tonnage duty equal to that which shall be payable by British vessels in the ports of America; and also such duty as may be adequate to counteract the difference of duty now payable on the importation of European and Asiatic goods, when imported into the United States in British or in American vessels.

It is agreed to be free to treat for an exact equalization of the duties on the respective navigations of their respective subjects and people, in such manner as may be agreed to by the United Kingdom and the United States. Each port shall be made at the same time with those mentioned at the conclusion of the twelfth article of this treaty, and are to be considered as a part thereof. In the interval, it is agreed that the United States will not impose any duties, to prevent delay, in deciding the cases of cargoes so brought in for adjudication; and in the payment or recovery of any indemnification adjudged or agreed to be due by the owners or masters of such ships.

Either of the parties may except, from the residence of consuls, such particular places as such party shall judge proper to be so excepted.

ART. 17. It is agreed that, in all cases where vessels shall be captured or detained, on just suspicion of having on board enemy's property, or of carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war, the said vessels may be seized and held; and if they can be proved by sufficient evidence that any may be found on board such vessel, that part only which belongs to the enemy shall be made prize, and the vessels and cargoes be at liberty to proceed with the remainder without any impediment. And it is agreed that all proper measures shall be taken to prevent delay, in deciding the cases of cargoes so brought in for adjudication; and in the payment or recovery of any indemnification adjudged or agreed to be due by the owners or masters of such ships.

In order to regulate what is in future to be esteemed contraband of war, it is agreed that, under the said denomination shall be comprised all arms and implements serving for the purposes of war, by land or sea, such as cannon, muskets, mortars, petards, bombs, grenades, carcasses, caissons, carriages for cannon, musket rest, hammers, bayonets, and, in general, all visible means of war, as well as every sort of ammunition, furniture, holsters, belts, and, generally, all other implements of war as also, timber for shipping, iron bars, nails, copper in sheets, nails, hemp and cordage, and, generally, whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, appearing on the deck, or in the hold of vessels, and all the above articles are hereby declared to be just objects of confiscation, whenever they are attempted to be conveyed to an enemy.

But whereas the difficulty of agreeing on the precise cases in which alone provisions and other articles, not generally contraband, may be regarded as such, renders it inexpedient to provide against the inconveniences and mischiefs of dispute and error, it is agreed that, in such cases, the same shall be decided, according to the existing laws of nations, shall, for that reason, be seized, the same shall not be liable to confiscation, and the owners thereof shall be speedily and completely indemnified; and the captors, or, in their default, the Government of the United States, shall pay to the masters or owners of such vessels, the full value of all such articles, with a reasonable mercantile profit thereon, together with the freight, and also the demurrage incident to such detention.

Whereas it is agreeable to the wishes of the inhabitants of the United States, and to prevent their suffering injuries by the men of war, or privates, of either party, all commanders of ships of war, and privates, and all others the said subjects and citizens, shall forbear doing any damage to the other of the party, or committing any outrage against them; and if they act to the contrary they shall be punished and shall also be bound, in their persons and estates, to make satisfaction and reparation for all damages, and the interest thereof, of whatever nature the said damages may be.

For this cause, all commanders of privateers, before they receive their commissions, shall hereafter be obliged to give, before a competent judge, sufficient security, by all means and in all cases, in the hands of such judge, or her officers, as shall be directed by the laws and instructions for regulating their conduct; and further that, in all cases of aggressions, the said commissions shall be revoked and annulled.

It is also agreed that, whenever a judge of a court of admiralty, of either of the parties, shall pronounce sentence against any of the subjects, or property, belonging to the subjects or citizens of the other party, a formal and duly authenticated copy of all the proceedings in the cause, and of the said sentence, shall, if required, be delivered to the commander of the said vessel, without the smallest delay, he paying all legal fees and demands for the same.

Art. 20. It is further agreed that both the said contracting parties shall not only refuse to receive any pirates in their admiralties, or in their courts, or in any other court in which any of their subjects, or their agents, may be permitted to assist them in any manner, but will bring to condign punishment all such inhabitants as shall be guilty of such acts or offences.

And all their ships, with the goods or merchandise taken by them and brought into the ports of either of the said parties, shall be seized, as far as the laws, or the laws of the other party, or the law of the land, shall allow, and shall be restored to the owners, or their factors, and their agents, duly deputed and authorized, in writing, by them, (proper evidence being first given in the court of admiralty for proving the property) even in case such effects should have passed into other hands by sale, if it be proved that the buyers knew, or had good reason to believe or suspect, that they had been piratical.

Art. 21. It is likewise agreed that the subjects and citizens of the two nations shall not do any acts of hostility or violence against each other, nor accept commissions or instructions so to act from any foreign Prince or State, to enemies to the other party; nor shall the enemies of one of the parties be permitted to invite, or endeavor to enlist, in their military service, any of the subjects or citizens of the other party; and the laws against all such offences and aggressions shall be equally and simultaneously executed, as far as any existing laws or treaties with any foreign nation, except any foreign commission, or letters of marque, for arming any vessel to act as a privateer, against the other party, and be taken by the other party, it is hereby declared to be lawful for the said party to treat and punish the said subject or citizen, having such commission or letters of marque, as a pirate.

Art. 22. It is further agreed that neither of the said parties will order or authorize any acts of violence against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party shall first have presented to the other a statement thereof, verified by competent proof and evidence, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall either have been refused or unreasonably delayed.

Art. 23. The ships of war of each of the contracting parties shall, at all times, be hospitably received in the ports of the other, their officers and crews being subject to the laws and Government of the country. The officers and men shall be treated with that respect which is due to the commissions which they bear; and if any insult should be offered to them by any of the inhabitants, all offenders in this respect shall be punished as disturbers of the peace and safety of the two nations. And His Majesty consents that, in case an American vessel should, by stress of weather, be driven into the port of any of His Majesty's territories, into which said vessel could not, in ordinary cases, claim to be admitted, she shall, on manifesting that necessity to the satisfaction of the government of the place, be hospitably received, and be permitted to refit, and to send out their provisions and market their effects, and may be authorized to take the privileges and regulations as the government of the place, having respect to the circumstances of each case, shall prescribe. She shall not be allowed to break bulk, or unload her cargo, unless the same shall be bona fide necessary to her being refitted. Nor shall be permitted to sell any part of her cargo, unless so much only as may be necessary to defray her expenses, and then not without the express permission of the government of the place. Nor shall she be obliged to pay any duties whatever, except only on such articles as she may be permitted to sell for the purpose aforesaid.

Art. 24. It shall not be lawful for any foreign privies (not being subjects or citizens of either of the said parties) who have commissions from any other Prince or State in enmity with either nation, to arm their ships in the ports of either of the said parties; and if they do arm such ships, nor shall they be allowed to purchase more provisions than shall be necessary for their going to the nearest port of that Prince or State from whom they obtained their commissions.

Art. 25. It shall be lawful for the ships of war and privies belonging to the said parties, respectively, to carry, wheresoever they please, the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any fee to the other party, or to the subjects or citizens of the other party. And His Majesty consents that, in case any of the ports of the said party, be detained or seized; neither shall the searchers, or other officers of those places, visit such prizes, (except for the purpose of preventing the carrying of any part of the cargo thereof on shore, in any manner contrary to the said established laws of customs, navigation, or commerce) nor shall such officer take cognizance of any act of such seizing; but they shall be at liberty to hoist sail and depart as speedily as may be, and carry their said prizes to the place mentioned in their commissions or patents, which the commanders of the said ships of war or privies shall be obliged to do. No shelter or refuge shall be given in their ports to such as have made a prize upon the subjects or citizens of either of the said parties; but, if forced, by stress of weather, or the dangers of the sea, to enter therein, particular care shall be taken to hasten their departure, and to cause them to retire as soon as possible. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed, or operate, contrary to former and existing treaties with other Sovereigns or States. But the two parties agree that, while they continue in any manner to be united by the ties of friendship, it shall be consistent with the stipulations of this treaty, that one party shall be the first to renounce, in the case of hostilities with another, the use of cannon shot; nor shall the said party, as between their subjects or citizens, be permitted to use the said shot.

Neither of the said parties shall permit the ships or goods belonging to the subjects or citizens of the other to be taken within cannon shot of the coast, nor in any of the bays, ports, or rivers, of their territories, by ships of war, or other armed vessels, without reasonable cause, and shall only allow to be taken into possession of the said party, those territories whose territorial rights shall have been violated, shall use his utmost endeavors to obtain, from the offending party, full and ample satisfaction for the vessels or vessels so taken, whether the same be vessels of war, or merchant vessels.

Art. 26. If at any time a rupture should take place (which God forbid) between His Majesty and the United States, or between the merchants and others, of each of the two nations, residing in the dominions of the other, they shall have the privilege of remaining, and continuing their trade, so long as they behave peaceably, and commit no offence against the laws; and, in case their conduct should render them suspected, and the Governments should think proper to order them to remove, they may then or at any other time be ordered by the said Governments for that purpose, to remove, with their families, effects, and property: but this favor shall not be extended to those who shall act contrary to the established laws: and, for greater certainty, it is declared that such rupture shall not be deemed to exist while negotiations for accommodating differences shall be depending, nor until the respective Governments shall have given due notice of their determination, to the other, and not on account of personal misconduct, according to the nature and degrees of which, both parties retain their rights, either to request the recall, or immediately to send home the ambassador or minister of the other, and that without prejudice to their mutual friendship and good understanding.

Art. 27. It is further agreed that His Majesty and the United States, on mutual requisitions, by them respectively, or by their respective ministers, or officers, authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persions who, being charged with murder or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other; provided, that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition and receive the fugitive.

Art. 28. It is agreed that the first ten articles of this treaty shall be permanent, and that the subsequent articles, except the twelfth, shall be limited in their duration to twelve years, to be computed from the day on which the ratifications of this treaty shall be exchanged, but subject to this condition, that, whereas the said twelfth article will expire, by the limitation therein contained, at the end of two years from the signing of the preliminary or other articles of peace which shall terminate the present war in which His Majesty is engaged, it is agreed that proper measures shall, by concert, be taken, for bringing the subject of that article into amicable treaty and discussion, so early before the expiration of the said term, as that new arrangements on that head may, by that time, be perfected, and ready to take place. But, if it should, unfortunately, happen, that His Majesty and the United States should not be able to agree on such new arrangements, in that case all the articles of this treaty, except the first ten, shall then cease and expire together.

Lastly, this treaty, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory on His Majesty and on the said States, and shall be by them respectively executed and observed, with punctuality and the most sincere regard to good faith. And whereas it will be expedient, in order the better to facilitate intercourse, and obviate difficulties, that other articles be proposed and added to this treaty, which articles, from want or to renew with his said plenipotentiary, cannot be, or shall not be, included in the said parties will, from time to time, readily treat of and concerning such articles, and will sincerely endeavor so to form them, as that they may conduct to mutual convenience, and tend to promote mutual satisfaction and friendship; and that the said articles, after having been duly ratified, shall be added to, and make a part of, this treaty.

In faith whereof, we, the undersigned, ministers plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of Great Britain and the United States of America, have signed this present treaty, and have caused to be affixed thereto the seal of our arms.

4th Congress,
No. 107.
1st Session.

MOROCCO.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 21, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Herewith I transmit, for your information and consideration, the original letter from the Emperor of Morocco, recognizing the treaty of peace and friendship between the United States and his father, the late Emperor, accompanied with a translation thereof, and various documents relating to the negotiation by which the recognition was effected.

UNITED STATES, December 21, 1795.

Extract from Instructions from the Secretary of State to Colonel David Humphreys, dated March 38, 1795.

"With respect to Morocco, it is proposed to obtain from the Prince Muley Soliman, a recognition of the treaty between the United States and his father, the former Emperor. This you will endeavor to effect, if possible, for twenty thousand dollars; but if you shall find that it cannot be accomplished under twenty-five thousand dollars, you are authorized to go to that amount. This negotiation you may either accomplish yourself, or by such agency as you shall deem best calculated for the purpose, according as you shall find the state of affairs in Morocco upon your arrival in Europe."

GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Morocco,

Being desirous of establishing and cultivating peace and harmony between our nation and his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Morocco, I have appointed David Humphreys, one of our distinguished citizens, a commissioner plenipotentiary, giving him full power to negotiate and conclude a treaty of amity and commerce with you. And I pray you to give full credit to whatever shall be delivered to you on the part of the United States by him, and particularly when he shall assure you of our sincere desire to be in peace and friendship with you and your people. And I pray God to give you health and happiness.

Done at Philadelphia, this thirtieth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and in the nineteenth year of the independence of these States.

G. WASHINGTON.

By the President of the United States of America:

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

To all concerned, to whom these Presents shall come.

BE IT KNOWN, That I, David Humphreys, minister resident from the United States of America at the court of Lisbon, being duly empowered and instructed on the part of the President of the United States of America to negotiate and conclude a treaty of amity and commerce between the United States of America and His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Morocco, or to renew with his said Imperial Majesty Maley Soliman, the treaty established at the court of Morocco between the late Emperor Sidi Mahomet (of glorious memory) and the United States of America, do constitute and appoint James Simpson, consul of the United States at Gibraltar, agent in the business aforesaid, (in conformity to the authority committed to me) hereby giving to him the said James Simpson, all the power necessary to arrange and agree upon the same, and to certify and sign a convention thereupon, reserving the same, nevertheless, when concluded, to be transmitted by the President of the United States, for his final ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said United States.

Given under my hand and seal, at Gibraltar, this 21st day of May, 1795.

D. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. Simpson to the Secretary of State.

RHABAT, August 18, 1795.

Sir: I have at last the happiness to acquaint you, and request you will be pleased to inform His Excellency the President, that this morning, by appointment, I attended his Imperial Majesty Muley Soliman, at Meshooar, when he was pleased to say to me in public, nearly as follows: "The Americans, I find, are the Christian nation my father, who had a glory, most esteemed, and in the same light with them as my father was and I trust in my life, I shall be with them. I have given orders to Sid Ben Ottman to write my answer to their letter, which will be given to you, and to tell them I am upon the same footing with them as my father was.

I did not fail to assure his Majesty that the United States would, on their part, be equally anxious to maintain that peace and good friendship which had so happily subsisted between them and his father. His Majesty came out of the palace on horseback; and immediately after the recited conversation, proceeded for Mequinez and Fez. The Secretary of State, who remains a few days to give the Spanish ambassador and myself our despatches, has assured me that letter forlorn! Poulpees! shall be written immediately; and as he is also instructed with His Majesty's wishes there needs be no delay. My next will, of consequence, convey the original, or translation, as the conveyance may appear to be secure.

From what I have said, you will readily observe that all I shall (to appearance) obtain will be a letter from Muley Soliman, declaratory of his being on the same terms of peace with the United States as his father was.

I am sorry that the resistance made to my solicitations of a recognition of the old treaty, in form, has been spun out to the last hour of the Emperor's being here, and that I have thereby been prevented from exerting the powerful interest I had happily raised, for accomplishing, in an amicable and reasonable manner, the end of my mission; though I trust the promised letter will be expressive of what is in fact wished to be established, namely, that peace shall subsist between Morocco and the United States, as in the time of Sidi Mahomet, which, in my opinion, will fully answer the purpose of keeping peace during the present reign, and of resisting any unpleasant demands, should succeeding emperors make such.

Muley Soliman's sudden departure for Fez is differently accounted for. Some allege he is gone purposely with the army to quell some disturbances which have lately happened in the vicinity of that city and Mequinez; others, that it is the consequence of the defeat the troops he sent to the southward, under Muley Cadour, has sustained. In my opinion, his new occurrences have their part in it, and that he will not, for the present, contest with his brother, Muley Ishem, the possession he certainly enjoys of the country south of the Mobeysa. The garrison of Mazagar have quitted that fortress as untenable, and are expected here by sea.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES SIMPSON.

Mr. Simpson to the Secretary of State.

GIBRALTAR, September 14, 1795.

Sir: During my residence at Tangier and Rhabat, I had the honor of addressing you seven despatches, whose originals, or copies, I trust will have reached you, and afforded His Excellency the President and yourself that ample information on my proceedings there. I was desirous of communicating. Since my return to this place, 5th instant, I have concluded without advice of Colonel Humphreys' return to Lisbon. I have sought for information, or when he may be expected, from Mr. Short, at Madrid, and if I find he cannot satisfy me, I shall no longer delay forwarding, by the first good opportunity which may offer, for the United States, the original of His Imperial Majesty Muley Soliman's letter, both the President, which, as I mentioned to you, the Colonel wished should go through his hands. In the mean time, I have thought well to send, with this copy, a translation of that letter, done with the assistance of my interpreter, which I hope will be found correct, when compared with the original. I might have satisfied myself on this particular, but that I declined imparting the sense, to any other person for the present.

I had it in charge from Sidi Mahomet Ben Ottman, by His Majesty's directions, to recommend the appointment of a consul for Morocco, and that vessels of the United States might be furnished with sea passes, cut as those of European nations, to prevent accidents. On these subjects it may be necessary to say more hereafter.

In expenditure of the public money and articles for presents put into my charge, I hope it will be found I observed every consistent economy; and although the great length of time I was detained in the country, and unexpected obstacles I met, have not allowed me to succeed, in that particular, equal to my wishes, yet I have satisfaction in acquainting you that a balance of both remain, as you will see by the ample statements which will be transmitted with this letter. I accordingly return to Lisbon may enable me to determine whether it will be proper to transmit them direct, or through his hands.

Muley Soliman's retreat from Rhabat to Fez showed that he had no immediate intention to act against Benassar, and the others have taken upon themselves to command in the name of Sidi, who in fact is only a mere cipher for he is never consulted on any occasion, nor even allowed to come to the encampments of those chiefs who command in his name. Islama has also lately promoted some disturbances at and near Tetun; but yesterday a boat arrived with advice of part of Muley Soliman's army from Fez having reached that neighborhood on Friday, and that he was himself at the head of a surprising number of men. I have been assured by the people who have already come, and his adherents to their mountains. We may in consequence expect that order will again be speedily re-established in the north, and that the division of the empire I have had the honor of mentioning you, will continue for some time to come. Whilst Soliman continues possessed of the fleet, and the only ports suitable for its protection, it is to him commercial nations will pay regard.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Soliman Ben Mahomet, Bey Abdullah, to whom God be merciful, to the President of America, a Prince, and to all the States.

In the Name of the Almighty God. There is no Power but that proceeding from God, the Great God.

After this we have received the letter where you mention your ambassador at Lisbon, whom you had appointed to come to us; and also we have received your said ambassador's power to your Consult Simpson, who resides at Gibraltar, by which he gives him power to act in every particular as he himself was authorized to do at our Imperial court, (which God have in his keeping) had he come to meet with us. By the present you sent us, and your letter, we know you still esteem us, and that you have regard for everything that concerns us.

Your care to preserve our friendship is very agreeable to us and you will experience the like from us, or more, because you were faithful to our father, who is in glory.
You have received the present at his hands with satisfaction; and we have mentioned to him those articles of your present which were in particular acceptable and to our liking. Continue writing letters to us at our court, that our present friendship may be made the more secure, and still increased. And we are at peace, tranquility, and contentment with you. We beg to assure you that you are with your father, who is in glory. Peace.

Sealed at Rhabat, the second of the moon Zafar, in the year 1310.

Gibraltar, September 14, 1795.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the translation, done from the Arabic by Sidi Mahomet, Emfada, of a letter from his imperial Majesty Muley Soliman, to the President of the United States of America.

JAMES SIMPSON.

4th Congress. No. 108. [1st Session.]

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 4, 1796.

United States, January 4, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

A letter from the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, received on the 29th of the last month, covered an address, dated the 15th of October, 1794, from the Committee of Public Safety to the Representatives of the United States, and also informed me that he was instructed by the committee to present to the United States the colors of France. I thereupon proposed to receive them last Friday, the first day of the new year, a day of general joy and congratulation. On that day, the minister of the French republic delivered to me the colors, with an address, to which I returned an answer. By the latter, the House* will see that I have informed the minister, that the colors will be deposited with the archives of the United States. But it seemed to me proper, previously, to exhibit to the two Houses of Congress, these evidences of the continued friendship of the French republic, together with the sentiments expressed by me on the occasion, in behalf of the United States. They are herewith communicated.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Representatives of the French people composing the Committee of Public Safety of the National Convention, on the 29th of the last month, charged, by the law of the 15th of October, 1794, with the direction of foreign relations, to the Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Citizens, Representatives:
The connections which nature, reciprocal wants, and a happy concurrence of circumstances, have formed between two free nations, cannot but be indissoluble. You have strengthened those sacred ties by the declarations which the minister plenipotentiary of the United States has made, in your name, to the National Convention, and to the French people. They have been received with rapture by a nation who know how to appreciate every testimony which the United States have given to them of their affection. The colors of both nations, united in the centre of the National Convention, will be an everlasting evidence of the part which the United States have taken in the success of the French republic.

You were the first defenders of the rights of man in another hemisphere. Strengthened by your example, and endowed with an invincible energy, the French people have vanquished that tyranny which, during so many centuries of ignorance, superstition, and baseness, had enchain'd a generous nation.

Soon did the people of the United States perceive that every victory of ours strengthened their independence and happiness. They were deeply affected at our momentary misfortunes, occasioned by treasons purchased by English gold. They have celebrated with rapture the successes of our brave armies.

None of these sympathetic emotions have escaped the sensibility of the French nation. They have all served to cement the most intimate and solid union that has ever existed between two nations.

The citizen Adet, who will reside near your Government in quality of minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, is especially instructed to lighten these bands of fraternity and mutual benevolence. We hope that he may fulfill this principal object of his mission, by a conduct worthy of the confidence of both nations, and of the reputation which his patriotism and virtues have acquired him.

An analogy of political principles; the natural relations of commerce and industry; the efforts and immense sacrifices of both nations in the defence of liberty and equality; the blood which they have spilt; their avowed hatred for despots; the moderation of their political views; the disinterestedness of their counsels; and, especially, the success of the vows which they have made, in presence of the Supreme Being, to be free or die; all combine to render indestructible the connexions which they have formed.

Doubt it not, citizens; we shall finally destroy the combination of tyrants; you, by the picture of prosperity, which, in your vast country, has succeeded to a bloody struggle of eight years: we, by that enthusiasm which glows in the breast of every Frenchman. Astonished nations, too long the dupes of perilous kings, nobles, and priests, will eventually recover their rights, and the human race will owe to the American and French nations their regeneration and a lasting peace.

The members of the Committee of Public Safety.

J. S. B. DELMAS,

MERLIN, (of Douai.) &c. &c.

PARIS, 30th Vendémiaire, 3rd year of the French Republic, one and indivisible, (Oct. 21, 1794.)

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic to the President of the United States.

Mr. President:

I come to acquaint myself of a duty very dear to my heart: I come to deposite in your hands, and in the midst of a people justly renowned for their courage and their love of liberty, the symbol of the triumphs and of the enfranchisement of my nation.

When she broke her chains; when she proclaimed the imprescriptible rights of man; when, in a terrible war, she sealed with her blood the covenant she had made with liberty, her own happiness was not alone the object of her glorious efforts; her views extended also to all free people. She saw their interest blended with her own, and doubly rejoiced in her victories, which, in assuring her tbe enjoyment of her rights, became to them new guarantees of their independence.

* Addressed to the Senate, also.

These sentiments, which animated the French nation from the dawn of their revolution, have acquired new strength since the foundation of the republic. France, at that time, by the form of its government, assimilated to, or rather identified with, free people, saw in them only friends and brothers. Long accustomed to regard the American people as her most faithful allies, she has sought to draw closer the ties already formed in the fields of America, under the auspices of victory, over the ruins of tyranny.

The National Convention, the organ of the will of the French nation, have more than once expressed their sentiments to the American people; but, above all, these burst forth on that august day when the minister of the United States presented to the National Representation the colors of his country. Desiring never to lose recollections, as dear to Frenchmen as they must be to Americans, the Convention ordered that these colors should be placed in the hall of their sittings. They had experienced sensations too agreeable not to cause them to be partaken of by their allies, and decreed that to them the national colors should be presented.

Mr. President, I do not doubt their expectation will be fulfilled; and I am convinced that every citizen will receive, with a pleasing emotion, this flag, elsewhere the terror of the enemies of liberty, here the certain pledge of faithful friendship; especially when they collect that it guides to combat men who have shared their toils, and who were prepared for liberty, by aiding them to acquire their own.

P. A. ADET.

Answer of the President of the United States.

Born, sir, in a land of liberty; having early learned its value; having engaged in a perilous conflict to defend it; having, in a word, devoted the best years of my life to secure its permanent establishment in my own country; my anxious recollections, my sympathetic feelings, and my best wishes are irresistibly excited, whenever, in any country, I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom. But, above all, the events of the French revolution have produced the deepest solicitude, as well as the highest admiration. To call your nation brave, were to pronounce but common praise. Wonderful people! Ages to come will read with astonishment the history of your brave exploits! I rejoice that the period of your toils and of your immense sacrifices is approaching. I rejoice that the interesting revolutionary movements of so many years have issued in the formation of a constitution designed to give permanency to the great object for which you contended. I rejoice that liberty, which you have so long embraced with enthusiasm—liberty, of which you have been the invincible defenders—now finds an asylum in the bosom of a regularly organized Government—a Government, which, being formed to secure the happiness of the French people, corresponds with the ardent wishes of my heart, while it gratifies the pride of every citizen of the United States, by its resemblance to their own. On these glorious events, accept, sir, my sincere congratulations.

In delivering to you these sentiments, I express not my own feelings only, but those of my fellow-citizens, in relation to the commencement, the progress, and the issue, of the French Revolution; and they will cordially meet with me in purest wishes to the Supreme Being, that the citizens of our sister republic, our magnificent allies, may soon enjoy, in peace, that liberty which they have purchased at so great a price, and all the happiness which liberty can bestow.

I receive, sir, with lively sensibility, the symbol of the triumphs and of the enfranchisement of your nation, the colors of France, which you have now presented to the United States. The transaction will be announced to Congress; and the colors will be deposited with those archives of the United States which are at once the evidences and the memorials of their freedom and independence. May these be perpetual! and may the friendship of the two republics be commensurate with their existence.

United States, January 1st, 1796.

G. WASHINGTON.

4th Congress. No. 100. [1st Session.

ALGIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 15, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate:—Hereewith I transmit, for your consideration and advice, a treaty of peace and amity, concluded on the 5th day of last September, by Joseph Donaldson, junior, on the part of the United States, with the Dey of Algiers, for himself, his Divan, and subjects.

The instructions* and other necessary papers, relative to this negotiation, are also sent herewith, for the information of the Senate.

G. WASHINGTON.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Colonel David Hemphry, dated Philadelphia, July 19, 1794, on the Algerine business.

You will consider yourself as again charged with this important interest of our country, according to the former instructions. A power is lodged with Messrs. Willink, Van Staphorst, & Hubbard, to borrow eight hundred thousand dollars, and to hold the same to your draft. Whenever, therefore, the money can be used in our objects at Algiers, you will draw for it. It must be submitted to your discretion, upon the view of all circumstances, as well of personal danger as public benefit, whether you will go over yourself—a measure which unquestionably would enable you to seize more certainly, than when at a distance, one of those moments of good humor & caprice which the letters transmitted through you from Algiers designate as the lucky seasons for impressing the Dey, and consider as having, unfortunately for our country, escaped without being caught. If, however, you judge it unwise or impracticable, to undertake the mission yourself, it will then be proper to use the instrument selected by Mr. Morris, and to instruct him accordingly; maintaining always, perfect cordiality and concert with the French commissioner, but, at the same time, not hesitating to follow your own ideas when they shall seem preferable, and resorting to the Swedish consul at Algiers, his brother, or any other individual, or expedient, according to your judgment, on the best mode of accomplishing success.

The President has under consideration the mode in which the eight hundred thousand dollars may be expended in the purchase of a peace; that is, how much shall be applied to the ransom and how much to the peace.

* For the instructions to Admiral John Paul Jones, here referred to, and other papers on Algerine Affairs, see No. 66, ante p. 290.
Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Colonel Humphreys, dated August 25, 1794.

"I beg leave to refer to my letter of the 18th July, a duplicate of which is now enclosed, as indicative of the President's wish that you should continue in the destination for Algiers. It is too interesting to the feelings of us all, not to retain you in a mission for which your experience in the subject, and other qualities, combine to fit you, rather than any other person who could be sent.

"These are the instructions of the President.

"1. Ransom and peace are to go hand and hand, if practicable; but, if peace cannot be obtained, a ransom is to be effected without delay.

"2. After endeavoring to obtain a ransom, at the lowest possible rate, or at the rate allowed by Portugal, or other nations the least favored, you may, if necessary, go as far as three thousand dollars per man.

"3. You will refer to the former instructions for the real wishes of the Government as to the sum to be paid for peace; keeping in mind the preference of a larger annuity and a smaller ducour in hand, to the reverse. But we would not break for fifty thousand dollars per annum, and two hundred thousand dollars by way of ducour, to secure a peace for a convenient term of years. But, though this form of the thing is most eligible, yet it is not judged to be a sine qua non for, after all, what is usual and effectual must decide, and the payment in gross may be accommodated to the necessity of accomplishing the object.

"4. If, however, by any other modification of the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars, a peace and ransom can be obtained, you may modify accordingly; restricting yourself, on the head of a ransom, within the above mentioned limit of three thousand dollars per man."

Extracts from the instructions given March 28, 1795, to Colonel David Humphreys, so far as they respect the proposed negotiations with the Dey and Regency of Algiers.

"The instructions hereunto communicated to you in several letters from the office of the Department of State, respecting the negotiation with the Dey of Algiers, &c., for concluding a treaty of peace, and liberating our citizens from captivity, contain the sentiments of the President on those subjects, and will serve according to your general government. If we should not be able to make a treaty, comprehending all the articles contained in our treaty with Morocco, we must acquiesce in the liberation of our citizens, and a treaty of peace only."

Joseph Donaldson, Junior, is named by the President as consul to the two States of Tunis and Tripoli."

"In the first place, however, it is expected that Mr. Donaldson will (if deemed necessary) be employed in an agency with Pierre Eric Skjoldebrand (now named as consul of the United States for Algiers) in ascertaining and agreeing upon the provisional or preliminary terms of a treaty with Algiers; and in causing (under your directions and instructions), the money appropriated by law for that purpose to be paid at Algiers, in the manner which shall be agreed on.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Colonel David Humphreys, dated April 4th, 1795.

"In addition to the instructions of the 23d ultimo, you are hereby authorized to associate or not, Mr. Donaldson and Mr. Skjoldebrand in the negotiation at Algiers; to employ Mr. Donaldson alone therein, if you think proper."

"On my part, I will remove the idea of delicacy towards the French republic, by assigning to our minister at Paris the reason why an attempt to negotiate was made in the first instance, without their aid. But it is supposed proper, and is therefore recommended to you, to proceed as early as possible to France, for the purpose of obtaining the co-operation of that Government in this negotiation."

Extract of a letter from Colonel Humphreys to the Secretary of State, dated Lisbon, September 17th, 1794.

"I have just received letters from Algiers, from the Swedish consul Skjoldebrand, and his brother M. Pierre Eric Skjoldebrand and Captain O'Brien.

"The principal articles which I note in these letters are, the discontinuance of the plague, a repetition of the application that the Swedish consul should be reimbursed by the United States the money he paid for the redemption of George Smith, and the opinion (probably founded on good grounds) of M. Skjoldebrand, jur. of nearly the ultimatum which the Dey will insist upon if a peace should be negotiated with him.

"Mr. Skjoldebrand, junior, supposes a peace may be obtained by the United States, for about the following sums, (in dollars) viz: For the treachery, in money or timber of construction, fifty thousand: For the great officers and relations of the Dey, one hundred thousand: Consular present, thirty thousand: Redemption of slaves, from two hundred to two hundred and fifty thousand; in all between six and seven hundred thousand; together with an annual tribute of from twenty-five to thirty thousand; and a consular present every two years of about nine or ten thousand dollars."

Mr. Skjoldebrand to Colonel Humphreys.

Algeria, 13th August, 1795.

Sir:

I have just received the letter, dated the 23d of May, which you have done me the honor to write to me; and I hasten to inform you, by this sudden opportunity, although in but a few words, leaving to Mr. Donaldson to detail to you circumstantially the favorable situation of your affairs here, and to take the measures which he shall think proper; having, in concert with Messrs. Cathcart and O'Brien, had due regard to your recommendation of Mr. Skjoldebrand, by means of Mr. House of Basset, taken the most active measures for the speedy accomplishment of a negotiation which so many persons are interested in public offices in this place to defeat.

I have the honor to write you twice, already, by the way of Tangier, in answer to your much esteemed favor of the 18th of May; and I see with surprise, by your last, that they have, probably at Gibraltar, given a description too disadvantageous of the state of Algiers and this sudden change in the aspect of your affairs at Algiers, of which you speak, are but the political inventions which your enemies have wished you to believe.

It is true that, since the French consul was commissioned in your business, the pretensions of the Dey were exploded; but these have been moderated and will be moderated still more, if Mr. Donaldson knows how to profit by the present favorable moment. I can course which Captain O'Brien has more than presented to the President a description too advantageous of my small talents, and of the services, hitherto feeble, which I have had it in my power to render to your interests; and being
P. E. SKJOLDEBRAND.

Mr. Skjoldebrand to Colonel Humphreys.

ALGIERS, 10th September, 1796.

Sir,

This is the moment to read again the letter which I formerly had the honor to address to you. You will see, sir, by my letter of the 16th of August, of the last year, a conjecture of the conditions on which I was able to obtain peace, amounting to six or seven hundred thousand dollars. You will see, in my letter of the 29th of December, by George Smith, in what manner these supposed conditions were changed, from the moment that the consul of France was confided; and by a note which Mr. Donaldson will send you, you will see the specification of these exorbitant demands which were entrusted to the consul of France, who offered no objection to them making it appear then, as well as since, on many occasions, that he was much flattered by the confidence of the United States and of the Dey; but that he secretly desired that your peace might not take place, by the impossibility of your consenting to such unjust conditions.

I will say nothing more of the conduct of Mr. Mace, the consul of England, nor of Mr. De Larrea, consul of Spain, in relation to your interests. You must know it already; and Captain O'Brien, the bearer of this letter, a brave man, who merits your confidence, and that of his country, will communicate to you many interesting things, which want of time, and much business, do not permit me to relate.

I leave also to him and to Mr. Donaldson to inform you whether, on this occasion, I have manifested a desire to render services to the United States, as far as my duty towards my country and necessary prudence, (being surrounded with envious and mischievous observers) have permitted me and as to the terms of the peace, as well as all other measures taken by Mr. Donaldson, I beg you, sir, to be persuaded that it would not have been possible for any person, whomeover, to make better, or to conclude upon more moderate conditions.

The Jew Mechajjo Baceri, the Dey's brother, of whom I have so often spoken to you, has been the person who, in concert with Mr. Cathcart, have executed in public with the Dey, the plans and directions on which Mr. Donaldson, in concert with me and Captain O'Brien, privately agreed; and all have had their share of merit in removing all the difficulties incurred by your enemies here, who have used all their endeavours, even with lies, to create in the Dey an ill disposition towards the United States, and to enhance his demands.

But the sincere advice to you, which is, to press, as much as is possible for you, the arrival of a consul, with the sums of money which Mr. Donaldson shall fix for you; and remember again that a hundred of your fellow-citizens, more impatient now than ever, will labor on the marine of Algiers until those sums arrive. Remember, sir, you must have a capable man for consular here, and a man who merits the confidence to have full powers, and a public credit considerable, always open for the cases absolutely necessary for the good of his country. I know among the present slaves here only Captain O'Brien, who possesses the requisite qualities to fill such a place but it appears that he is more inclined to push his views in the marine of the United States.

It remains now for me to testify to you my regret in being disappointed in my hopes, which I had always entertained, of having the honor of seeing you here in person. The only and the great satisfaction which I had always promised myself, for the little trouble I have taken to soften the fate of your unhappy fellow citizens, slaves in this place, was to form a personal acquaintance with you, and to preserve the friendship with which you have been pleased to honor me, and which, hereafter, as heretofore, I shall endeavor to merit.

My brother presents you his respects; and, with sentiments of the most sincere respect and devotion, I have the honor to subscribe myself, sir, your most humble, &c.

P. E. SKJOLDEBRAND.

Colonel Humphreys, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the Court of Lisbon.

P. S. The Dey, whom you would have seen here in person with much pleasure, and who, from the description and idea which your friends have endeavored he should form of you, has a very high opinion of your merit, shows you a very honorable mark of it in sending you an Algerine sabre, mounted with gold, of which Captain O'Brien will be the bearer.

Extract of a letter from Colonel David Humphreys, dated at Lisbon, the 28th of November, 1795, to the Secretary of State.

"In conformity to the intimation, given in my last letter, I have now the honor to enclose to you the treaty of peace and amity between the United States of America and Algiers.

"You will, I have no doubt, be pleased with this advice to you, which is, to press, as much as is possible, for you, the arrival of a consul with the sums of money which Mr. Donaldson shall fix for you; and you will be well aware that a hundred of your fellow-citizens, more impatient now than ever, will labor on the marine of Algiers until those sums arrive. Remember, sir, you must have a capable man for consular here, and a man who merits the confidence to have full powers, and a public credit considerable, always open for the cases absolutely necessary for the good of his country. I know among the present slaves here only Captain O'Brien, who possesses the requisite qualities to fill such a place but it appears that he is more inclined to push his views in the marine of the United States.

"It remains now for me to testify to you my regret in being disappointed in my hopes, which I had always entertained, of having the honor of seeing you here in person. The only and the great satisfaction which I had always promised myself, for the little trouble I have taken to soften the fate of your unhappy fellow citizens, slaves in this place, was to form a personal acquaintance with you, and to preserve the friendship with which you have been pleased to honor me, and which, hereafter, as heretofore, I shall endeavor to merit.

My brother presents you his respects; and, with sentiments of the most sincere respect and devotion, I have the honor to subscribe myself, sir, your most humble, &c."

A Treaty of Peace and Amity with the Dey of Algiers.

ART. 1. From the date of the present treaty there shall subsist a firm and sincere peace and amity between the President and citizens of the United States of North America and Hasan Bashaw Dey of Algiers, his Divan and subjects; the vessels and subjects of both nations reciprocally treating each other with civility, honor, and respect.

For this purpose belonging to the citizens of the United States of North America shall be permitted to enter the different ports of the regency to trade with the said subjects, or any other persons residing within our jurisdiction, on paying the usual duties at our custom house that is paid by all nations at peace with this regency, observing that all goods disembarkcd and not sold here shall be permitted to be reembarked without paying any duty whatever, either for disembarking or embarking all naval and military stores, and all other commodities on which you would be able for building, tar, pitch, resin, turpentine, and any other goods denominated naval and military stores, shall be permitted to be sold in this regency without paying any duties whatever at the custom house of this regency.

ART. 3. The vessels of both nations shall pass each other without any impediment or molestation; and all goods, moneys, or passengers, of whatsoever nation, that may be on board of the vessels belonging to either party, shall be considered as inviolable, and shall be allowed to pass un molested.
ART. 4. All ships of war belonging to this regency, on meeting with merchant vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, shall be permitted to visit them with two persons only, besides the rowers; these two only permitted to embark on board the vessel, in the obtaining express leave from the commander of said vessel, who shall compare the passport, and immediately permit said vessel to proceed on her voyage un molested. All ships of war belonging to the United States of North America, on meeting with an Algerine cruiser, and shall have seen her passport and consent of the regency, and either have the consent of the North American resident in this regency, shall be permitted to proceed on her cruise unmolested. No passport to be issued to any ships but such as are absolutely the property of citizens of the United States with passports.

ART. 5. No commander of any cruiser belonging to this regency shall be allowed to take any person, of whatever nation, out of any vessel belonging to the United States of North America, in order to examine them, or under pretence of making them confess any thing desired, neither shall they inflict any corporal punishment, or in any way molest them.

ART. 6. If any vessel belonging to the United States of North America shall be stranded on the coast of this regency, they shall be permitted to buy or sell, or exchange the produce of their vessels, that shall be stranded, for such commodities as are necessary, at such prices as they shall be in a condition to pay any duties on sale thereof. All vessels wanting provisions or refreshments shall be permitted to buy them at market prices.

ART. 7. All ships of war belonging to the United States of North America, on anchoring in the ports of the regency, shall receive the usual presents of provisions and refreshments, as vessels of the United States. Should any of the slaves of this regency make their escape on board said vessel, they shall be immediately returned; no excuse shall be made that they have hid themselves amongst the people and cannot be found, or any other equivocation.

ART. 8. Any citizen of the United States of North America shall be allowed to redeem any slave against his will, and even should the owner of a slave be forced to sell him against his will, but all such agreements must be made by consent of parties. Should any American vessel arrive on board an enemy's ship by the cruisers of this regency, having a regular passport, specifying they are citizens of the United States, they shall be immediately set at liberty; on the contrary, they having no passport, they and their property shall be considered lawful prize, as this regency know their friends by their passports.

ART. 9. Should any of the citizens of the United States of North America die within the limits of this region, the Dey and his subjects shall not interfere with the property of the deceased; but it shall be under the immediate direction of the consul, unless otherwise disposed of by will. Should there be no consul, the effects shall be deposited in public custody, until the party shall appear who has a right to demand them, when they shall render an account of the property; neither shall they, the Dey, or Divan, give hindrance in the execution of any will that may appear.

ART. 10. No citizen of the United States of North America shall be obliged to purchase any goods against his will, but, on the contrary, shall be allowed to purchase whatever it pleases him. The consul of the United States of North America, or any other citizen, shall not be answerable for debts contracted by any one of their own nation, unless previously, they have given a written obligation so to do. Should the Dey wish to freight any American vessel that may be in the regency or Turkey, said vessel not being engaged, in consequence of the friendship subsisting between the two nations, he expects to have the preference given him, on his paying the same freight offered by any other nation.

ART. 11. Any disputes or suits at law, that may take place between the subjects of the regency and the citizens of the United States of North America, shall be decided by the Dey in person, and no other; any disputes that may arise between the citizens of the United States shall be decided by the consul, as they are, in such cases, not subject to the laws of this region.

ART. 12. Should any citizen of the United States of North America kill, wound, or strike a subject of this regency, he shall be punished in the same manner as a Turk, and not with more severity. Should any citizen of the United States of North America in the above predicated escape prison, the consul shall not become answerable for him.

ART. 13. The consul of the United States of North America shall have personal security given him, and his household; he shall have liberty to exercise his religion in his own house. All slaves of the same religion shall not be impeded in going to said consul's house, at hours of prayer. The consul shall have liberty and personal security given him to travel wherever he pleases, within the regency. He shall have free license to go on board any vessel lying in our roads, whenever he shall think fit. The consul shall have leave to appoint his own drogman and broker.

ART. 14. Should a war break out between the two nations, the consul of the United States of North America, and all citizens of said States, shall have leave to embark themselves and property unmolested, on board of what vessel they shall think proper.

ART. 15. Should the cruisers of Algiers capture any vessel having citizens of the United States of North America on board, they having papers to prove they are really so, they and their property shall be immediately discharged; and should the vessels of the United States of North America capture any vessels of nations at war with them, having subjects of this regency on board, they shall be treated in like manner.

ART. 16. Should any disturbance take place between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of this regency, or break any article of this treaty, the same shall be declared immediately, but every thing shall be searched into regularly; the party injured shall be made reparation.

On the 21st of the Luna of Safar, 1210, corresponding with the 5th September, 1795, Joseph Donaldson, jun., on the part of the United States of North America, agreed with Hassan Bashaw Dey of Algiers, to keep the articles contained in the treaty sacred and inviolable, which the Dey and Divan promise to observe, on consideration of the United States paying, annually, the value of twelve thousand Algerine sequins, in maritime stores. Should the United States forward a larger quantity, the overplus shall be paid for in money by the Day and regency. Any vessel that may be captured from the date of this treaty of peace and amity shall immediately be delivered upon her arrival in Algiers.

VIZIER HASSAN BASHAW.
JOSEPH DONALDSON, Jun.

To all to whom these presents shall come, or be made known.

Whereas the under written David Humphreys hath been appointed commissioner plenipotentiary, by letters patent, under the signature of the President, and seal of the United States of America, dated the 20th March, 1795, for negotiating and concluding a treaty of peace with the Day and Governors of Algiers: Whereas, by instructions given to him on the part of the Executive, dated the 29th of March, and 4th of April, 1795, he hath been further authorized to employ Joseph Donaldson, jun. on an agency in the said business: Whereas, by a writing under his hand and seal, dated the 21st of May, 1795, he did constitute and appoint Joseph Donaldson, jun. agent in the business aforesaid; and the said Joseph Donaldson, jun. did, on the 5th of September, 1795, agree with Hassan Bashaw Day of Algiers, to keep the articles of the preceding treaty sacred and inviolable:

Now know ye, that I, David Humphreys, commissioner plenipotentiary aforesaid, do approve and conclude the said treaty, and every article and clause therein contained, reserving the same, nevertheless, for the final ratification of the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said United States. In testimony whereof, I have signed the same with my hand and seal, at the city of Lisbon, this 28th of November, 1795.

4th CONGRESS.
No. 110.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.
REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 25, 1796.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the committee appointed to inquire and report whether any, and what, legislative provision is necessary for the relief of such American seamen as may have been impressed into the service of any foreign Power; and, also, to report a mode of furnishing American seamen with such evidence of their citizenship as may protect them from foreign impressment, in future, made the following report:

That, in considering the two important questions to which their attention has been directed by the House, they have not thought it necessary to prosecute any inquiry into particular instances of the evil complained of. They have supposed the sufferings and indignities undergone by their fellow-citizens on the high seas, as unhappily too notorious to need the support of further proof; and have, therefore, thought it their duty, without any delay, to submit some plan, first, for their immediate relief; and secondly, for their future protection.

First. For the relief of those unfortunate men, who may now be suffering under the accumulated miseries of imprisonment, insult, and separation from their families and country, the committee are of opinion that immediate legislative interference is necessary, and that it may be directed to a provision for the support of two or more agents, to be appointed by the Executive, and sent, the one to Great Britain, and the other to such places in the West Indies, where the greatest number of British ships of war may resort; and to continue there for such time as the President may deem necessary. The committee contemplate the utility of those agents in alternate points of view.

Resolved. As procuring a release of impressed seamen by their interference or, if their endeavors should unfortunately fail,

2d. As a means of procuring an accurate state to the Government of the number and designation of its citizens, and of neutral foreigners sailing under the protection of its flag, thus illegally seized, that more efficacious measures may be pursued for their relief.

Secondly. On the second point, the committee are of opinion that many of the impressments of American seamen having been colored by a real or pretended supposition that the persons impressed were British subjects, it becomes necessary to take away that pretense, by furnishing every American seaman with an authentic document to prove his right of citizenship.

They, therefore, submit the following resolves:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made for two or more agents, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; the one of which agents shall reside in such part of the kingdom of Great Britain, and the other at such places in the West Indies, as the President shall direct; whose duty it shall be to inquire into the situation of such American citizens as shall have been, or heretofore may be, impressed or detained on board of any foreign vessel; to endeavor, by all legal means, to obtain their release, and to render an account of all foreign impressments of American citizens to the Government of the United States.

Resolved, That proper officers ought to be provided, where every seaman, being a citizen of the United States, on producing evidence, duly authenticated, of his birth, naturalization, or residence, within the United States, and under their protection, on the 3d day of September, 1783, may have such evidence registered, and may receive a certificate of his citizenship.

4th Congress.] No. 111. [1st Session:]

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 26 AND 29, 1796.

SPAIN.

UNITED STATES, February 26, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I send, herewith, the treaty concluded on the 37th of October last, between the United States and Spain, by their respective plenipotentiaries.

The communications to the Senate, referred to in my message of the 16th of December, 1795, contain the instructions to the commissioners of the United States, Messrs. Carmichael and Short, and various details relative to the negotiations with Spain. Herewith I transmit copies of the documents authorizing Mr. Pinckney, the envoy extraordinary from the United States to the court of Spain, to conclude the negotiation, agreeable to the original instructions above mentioned; and to adjust the claims of the United States for the spoliations committed by the armed vessels of His Catholic Majesty on the commerce of our citizens.

The numerous papers exhibiting the progress of the negotiation, under the conduct of Mr. Pinckney, being in the French and Spanish languages, will be communicated to the Senate as soon as the translations which appear necessary shall be completed.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 29, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I send, herewith, the papers relating to the negotiation of the treaty with Spain, to which I referred in my message of the 9th instant.

G. WASHINGTON.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To Thomas Pinckney, greeting:

Reposing especial trust and confidence in your integrity, prudence, and ability, I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint, you, the said Thomas Pinckney, envoy extraordinary from the United States of America to the court of His Catholic Majesty; authorizing you, hereby, to do and perform all such matters and things as to the said place or office doth appertain, or as may be duly given you in charge hereafter, and the said office to hold and exercise during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Philadelphia, the twenty-fourth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and of the independence of the United States of America the nineteenth.

By the President of the United States of America:

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all and singular whom these presents shall concern, greeting:

Know ye, That, for the purpose of confirming, between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, perfect harmony and a good correspondence, and removing all grounds of dissatisfaction, and from a special trust and confidence in the integrity, prudence, and abilities, of Thomas Pinckney, I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed, the said Thomas Pinckney envoy extraordinary and sole commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States of America to His Catholic Majesty; hereby giving and granting to him full, and all manner of, power and authority, as also a general and special command at the court of his said Majesty, for, and in the name of, the United States, to meet, confer, treat, and negotiate, with the ministers, commissioners, deputies, or plenipotentiaries, of his said Majesty being furnished with sufficient authority of and concerning the navigation of the river Mississippi, and such other matters relative to the confines of the territories of the United States and His Catholic Majesty, and the intercourse to be had thereon, as the mutual interests and general harmony of neighboring and friendly nations require to be precisely adjusted and regulated; and of and concerning the general commerce between the United States and the kingdoms and dominions of His Catholic Majesty; and to conclude and sign a treaty or treaties, convention or conventions, thereon transmitting the same to the President of the United States of America for his final ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Philadelphia, this twenty-fourth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and of the independence of the United States of America the nineteenth.

By the President of the United States of America:

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all and singular whom these presents shall concern, greeting:

Know ye, That, for the purpose of confirming, between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, perfect harmony and a good correspondence, and of removing all grounds of dissatisfaction, and from a special trust and confidence in the integrity, prudence, and abilities, of Thomas Pinckney, whom I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed, envoy extraordinary of the United States to His Catholic Majesty, I do, hereby, give and grant to him, the said Thomas Pinckney, full, and all manner of, power and authority, as also a general and special command at the court of his said Majesty, for, and in the name of, the United States, to meet and confer with the ministers, commissioners, or deputies, of his said Majesty, being furnished with sufficient authority, whether singly and separately, or collectively and jointly, and with them to agree, treat, consult, and negotiate, of and concerning all matters and cases of difference subsisting between the United States and his said Majesty, relative to the instructions of his said Majesty, or of any of the tribunals or authorities of his said Majesty, to his ships of war and privateers, of whatever date, as well as of and concerning restitution or compensation in the cases of capture or seizure made of the property of the citizens of the United States by the said ships of war and privateers, and retribution for the injuries received therefrom by any citizen of the United States; and to conclude and sign said treaty or treaties or convention or conventions, touching the premises, transmitting the same to the President of the United States for his final ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Philadelphia, this twenty-fourth day of November, 1794, and of the independence of the United States of America the nineteenth.

G. WASHINGTON.

By the President of the United States of America:

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State to Thomas Pinckney.

PHILADELPHIA, November 3, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

Mr. Bayard, who sails on Thursday, as an agent for those who have suffered by British depredations, will be charged with the private and public despatches from me to you. I have sent you a mission, which the President has prepared for you, as envoy extraordinary to Madrid. I beg you, immediately upon the receipt of this, to make any arrangements which may seem expedient, before you quit London. The business refers to the 3d and 8th instant, and will be temporary: and, under present circumstances, probably not dilatory. You will necessarily conclude that your return will be a temporary mission upon your part only. I have the honor to be, sir, with sincere esteem and true respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated November 8, 1794.

"In my two last letters of the 3d and 8th instant, duplicates of which have been forwarded, I prepared you for a temporary transference of your letters from London to Madrid. The determination of the President is now confirmed by the approbation of the Senate, as you will perceive from the commission which accompanies this letter.

"Your powers inform you, in general terms, of the subjects with which you are charged. The development of the principles upon which they are to be contended for, will be found in the documents of which Mr. Short is possessed. But, for the sake of enabling you to avail yourself of every opportunity, before you reach Madrid, I send a statement of our pretensions, as they were laid before Congress, concerning a conciliatory line of discussion with Mr. Gardoqui, and the instructions and arguments transmitted to Messrs. Carmichael and Short. In these the President sees no reason for a change."

My DEAR SIR:

I arrived at this metropolis on the 28th of the last month, but, finding that the court were still at Aranjuez, I proceeded to that place; their residence there, however, was so short after my arrival that I could do no more than obtain an introduction to the Duke de la Alcudia. I returned to Madrid on the 3d of July, where the court remained only ten days. Of course, every thing was in a kind of hurry and confusion unfavorable to business, I however passed through all my ceremonies, and have had two conferences with the minister, the result of which is, that they are still anxious for further delay, which is to them equivalent to a cession of our rights, so long as we shall acquiesce therein, they being in possession of the object of controversy. The Duke de la Alcudia received me with politeness, but, at the same time, informed me that he could come to no conclusion on the principal points of my mission until he should have received an answer to the propositions which he directed the Spanish charge d'affaires to make to our Government, in America, in the months of July and August last. I told him, in reply, that Mr. Jaudenes did not conceive himself authorized to make any direct propositions to the President so late as the month of March last, notwithstanding he had received the instructions to which the duke alluded, and therefore, that it was in vain to wait for an answer to propositions which, without further instructions, could not be brought forward in a mode through which any answer could be given to them.

He seemed to consider the possibility of not having made the proposals he had directed, and said he expected an answer thereto daily, and would immediately apprise me thereof. I then told him that I had deposited proof of the matter being as I had stated, having in my possession a letter from M. Jaudenes to you, certifying the fact, with a copy of which, at his request, I promised to furnish him. I accordingly enclosed it to him in a note, the copy of which I herewith transmit. On leaving Madrid, I left the instructions which I had received hereunto appended, the result of which will be the resolution of our Government upon a question of great importance. It is true that I can deduce, by inference from the instructions heretofore given, and from reasoning upon our situation and circumstances, that the United States will not guarantee the possessions of Spain in America, and will not consent to purchase what is their right. But, upon a proposition so new, it would have been impossible that it could have stated to the Spanish Government that I was directly instructed on this head, in case any such proposal should be made here. I conceive, however, that it will be of such importance that our controversy with this Government should be determined during the present war (which, I think, will not be continued another campaign) and it is also essential to our internal harmony that the President should be informed of such an event. I therefore made accommodations of this nature, and made the necessary recommendations of this court, during the next session of Congress, that I mean to urge the decision as strongly as propriety and attention to my instructions on the subject will admit. Mr. Short has already informed you of the line which this court has determined to pursue to us, respecting navigation, during the present war, and of the reasons which prevent them from entering any written stipulations on this subject. This line of conduct, while observed, is as favorable to us as we could expect.
but, as no general orders can be published on the occasion, individual cases will occasionally occur, in which it will be necessary to apply to this administration for a compliance with their verbal agreement; and to these the duke promises to pay immediate attention. This took place in a joint conference, which Mr. Short and I had with him, when we thought it prudent to state to him what his engagements were on that subject; to which statement he readily acquiesced (namely, that four ships or vessels subject to the treaty with France should be obnoxious to the duty of a ton, or to any part of it); and he added, that he did not discover the connexion, he did not then explain himself to my comprehension, but, in a joint conference with Mr. Short and myself, he expressed a wish to establish a triple alliance between France, Spain, and ourselves. He received the answer from Mr. Short, which he had previously given him, with great propriety, on former occasions, of a manner somewhat similar, which is, in substance, that a generous and friendly conciliation should enter into a triple alliance the whole benefits of an alliance, and that the first object was to establish our rights on just principles, when objects of mutual convenience and accommodation might with propriety be resorted to. Mr. Monroe has informed you of the import of the French Government with respect to our negotiation here. I had no conversation with them on the subject, as I conceived the business placed on us as good a footing as I could desire, and, since I have been here, I conclude that the French commissioners have complied with their instructions; the duke having informed me that he had certain information that our minister at Paris opposed an accommodation between Spain and France, unless our rights were previously acknowledged by the former.

The repairs which so long a journey had rendered necessary for my currency have detained me here a few days beyond the departure of the court; to-morrow, however, I set out to join them, and will inform you of the result of my next conference by the earliest opportunity.

I have received all possible assistance and information from Mr. Short since I have been here. He has placed in my hands all the papers of which he was possessed, relative to the objects of my mission. I am personally obliged to him for the readiness and friendly good will with which he has rendered me this service, and the United States have reason to be much indebted to him for the assiduity and ability with which he has conducted his negotiations at this court. I do not conceive that it can be necessary for me to remain here until an answer can be obtained to this letter, as it must be decided, long before that time, whether this court means to proceed in their system of delay, or whether they will yield to us our rights. In either case, it will be necessary that you should have a correct account of the whole of the proceedings. After that answer is obtained, my present idea is, that my presence here will be unnecessary; at all events, however, I will observe the directions contained in the ciphered part of your letter of 28th November, 1794. I would, however, submit to you the propriety of an explicit instruction, to whoever may be here, to object to silence and guaranty, if it should not have been done previous to your receipt hereof, as, from the circumstances which have already occurred, I do not expect that it will be brought before our Government soon, in an official manner, and, if the instructions should arrive too late to be of service, they can do no harm.

I have the honor to be, dear sir, with great respect, your obedient and faithful servant,

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

The Secretary of State.

Mr. de Lue, your most humble and most obedient servant,

Mr. Pinckney to the Secretary of State.

My Dear Sir:

By my letter of the 21st July, it must have appeared to you that this court was proceeding in that system of delay, which it seems hitherto to have adopted, the minister having referred me, in my first conferences, to the answers expected to Mr. Jaudenes' proposals. As a means of obtaining that information, I thought it best to put to all expectations on that subject, and, therefore, at the first conference I had with the duke at this place, I told him candidly, that, however full my powers were, (which he must have seen) and however amably inclined the United States were disposed to comply with the wishes of his excellency, I did not think myself authorized to insert in any treaty, to be formed with this country, a guarantee of their possessions in America. With this declaration the duke appeared much mortified, as was natural, that the proposals, though informally made, had been considered and rejected by our Government. I then proceeded to state how ready the United States were to enter into every other friendly stipulation, and upon an understanding that occasional days would be appointed for the consideration of the treaty, the result was, that he promised to proceed with me in our negotiations concerning the limits, &c., without the guarantee. I urged the fixing a day to proceed to the business, which he said was impossible, as he wished some further information, but promised to appoint an early day. This, however, not immediately taking place, I requested, in three or four days, the further conference, which I urged the ·duke to put in at a day which he preferred to have very shortly enter into the business, and, from his conversation, I collected that he had really been looking into the subject. On Saturday last it was pretty generally known here that the terms of a treaty of peace were settled between this country and France. On Sunday, at a conference with the duke, on my urging our progress, he told me that our business should be very speedily settled to our satisfaction; that I might consider it perfectly in that point of light, as His Majesty was determined to sacrifice something of what he considered as his right, to testify his good will to us. You, sir, have seen so much of this business as to how to appreciate those circumstances; my present opinion is, that the new position of Spain with respect to England will induce them to come to a decision. with us. You may be assured, sir, that I shall omit neither assiduity nor such arguments as I am furnished with to accelerate the determination.

Having at length the information of a vessel ready to sail from Bilboa, I thought it advisable to give you this hasty sketch of the present position, which otherwise I should have deferred till after the conference I mean to request to-morrow, and in which I hope something more decisive will be fixed.

I am, with sentiments of the utmost respect and sincerest esteem, my dear sir, your faithful and obedient servant.

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

To the Secretary of State.

Mr. Pinckney to the Secretary of State.

SAN ILDEFONSO, 1st October, 1795.

DEAR SIR: I am not favored with any of your letters, since I left England; but, as the President may desire to know the progress of the negotiations with which I am charged, previous to the meeting of Congress, I herewith send you the material parts of what has passed in writing, from whence he will be able to form his own opinion of our prospects in this business. It will be unnecessary to state to you the purport of the various oral conferences I have had with the Prince de la Poix (late Duke of Alcudia) on this occasion, as they were preparatory to the measures adopted, which I now enclose, which may be considered as the result of those conferences as far as they extend. I will not take up your time with conjectures of what may probably be the issue of this negotiation; for where measures are adopted from the fluctuation of occurrences and not from system, conjectures must be wildly hazarded.

You may be assured that nothing within the scope of my abilities shall be wanting to induce a line of steady conduct towards us, and I conclude that, in the course of another month, it will be decided whether this business can be concluded or not; in either event it will be unnecessary for me to remain here, and I therefore propose setting out for England in that space, unless events, which I do not now foresee, should require a longer residence here. Should the treaty be signed, Mr. Short leaves this court, he intends, in pursuance of your authority, to appoint Mr. Charles Roget as chargé des affaires during his absence. This young gentleman, who accompanied me here as secretary, and with whose conduct I am perfectly satisfied, is son of the chief justice of South Carolina, whom I believe you know. Mr. Short says his appointment will not interfere with the note to represent to you that it is impossible for him to live in a decent style on that salary, and would, therefore, submit the propriety of an augmentation. That sum may be sufficient for a secretary living with a minister, and the principal part of his expenses borne by him, but it is beyond question, that a person cannot attend on this court without expending far beyond that sum.

I am, with sentiments of consideration and respect, dear sir, your faithful and obedient servant,

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

The Secretary of State.

[Enclosures in the foregoing despatch of Mr. Pinckney.]

Mr. Pinckney to the Duke of Alcudia.

SAN ILDEFONSO, July 29, 1795.

MONSIEUR le DUC: In running over the "ordenanza de corso" of His Majesty, dated the 1st of May, 1794, I perceive, with pleasure, the sentiments of justice which dictated the 11th article, which appears to me conformable with the engagements entered into by the court of Spain, by concuring in the terms of the armed neutrality of the last war. The spirit of this article, if I mistake not, amounts to this: that Spain, faithful to the principles she had adopted on neutral rights, was ready to act in conformity with these principles, but that prudence required a previous knowledge whether France, who had also adopted the articles of the armed neutrality, would act in the same manner. That, therefore, she permitted her vessels of war to bring into her ports neutral vessels laden with produce belonging to France, by way of precaution, and only until this point should be cleared up; but that, as soon as it was ascertained that France would act in conformity to these principles towards a neutral nation, she would adopt the sentiments in regard to her engagements, by conducting in the same manner with regard to that nation.

Now, if I am not mistaken in the sense of the said article, I think I may, with propriety, propone to your excellency that the King be pleased to give orders that his ships of war and privateers bring no longer into Spanish ports, vessels of the United States of America, laden with produce belonging to Frenchmen. Seeing that your excellency has been informed of the treaty existing between the United States and France, which establishes these principles between the two nations; seeing that the Government of France has given the most unequivocal assurances to ours that it will observe this treaty; and seeing that it acts in conformity to its promises, I conceive that it will not be necessary for me to detail here to your excellency all the inconveniences which result from the practice of putting merchant vessels out of their course, and carrying them to ports to which they were not destined, merely for the purpose of sending them away after they have been brought in. From the delays, waste, and inevitable expenses arising therefrom, from the bad treatment of which our citizens complain of receiving sometimes from the crews of the privateers, and, above all, from the spirit and animosity born between the individuals of two nations between whom it is the ardent desire of the United States to cultivate the most perfect harmony and friendship, not doubting but that your excellency entertains corresponding sentiments of good will towards my nation, I have no apprehension that a conduct towards us will be contested, which, without being of the least advantage to the interests of the King, is very prejudicial to the United States.

I pray your excellency to accept the expression of respect and high consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

Not knowing whether your excellency has at the Sitio a copy of our treaty with France, I take the liberty to enclose the article on the contraband of war.

Mr. Pinckney to the Duke of Alcudia.

SAN ILDEFONSO, 6th August, 1795.

MONSIEUR le DUC: As in the cases not comprehended in the "ordenanza de corso" of His Majesty, but which are to be determined (according to the agreement your excellency made with Mr. Short) by the principles of our treaty with France, including less in particular, the vehicles laden with produce belonging to the treaty, than if that agreement were changed, after I take the liberty of laying before your excellency the cases as they arrive, in order that your excellency may give the proper orders. With this view I have the honor to inform you that the vessell Maria, of Boston, laden with provisions belonging to France, was taken into the port of Santander, on the 11th of June, where she is now detained, and I request your excellency to give orders to enable her to pursue her voyage. The long detention which this vessel has already undergone, with a perishable cargo, will, I hope, plead with your excellency for my pressing solicitation to have a speedy decision on this affair. I also take the liberty to inform M. le Duc of the circumstances relative to the American ship Liberty, of New York, according to the advice I have received, which are, that this vessel being at Bordeaux, was freighted by an American house to carry a cargo to Bilboa, consisting partly of whale oil and of dried codfish. The fish was taken out by another American vessel in the river, and the oil landed, and was, of course, laden on board the Liberty, in the port, but it always continued to be American property. This vessel was met at sea, eight leagues from Bilboa, and carried as a prize into that port by a Spanish privateer, who pretends to have the articles which were laden at that time, in violation of the terms of the treaty of 1763, on which the vessel was detained, and supposed to be a contraband in war; by which it is ordained that French produce, and even those of foreigners landed in France, having paid the entrance duty, shall not be admitted into Spanish ports, though they should be laden on board of neutral bottoms. But I submit to the superior wisdom of your excellency whether in this case it would be proper to view a violation of the treaty, and whether the case is one which can be treated of by the French, and in which the property has not been changed. And I request your excellency to observe, also, that this determination, taken at the beginning of the war, was modified by the principles established in the 4th article of the "orderanza," by which it is proved that, in the actual circumstances, if the cargo of this vessel had been altogether of the manufacture and property of France, it would, therefore, be very extraordinary if the property of the friends of Spain were condemned in a case in which her enemy's property would go free.

In submitting those cases to the inspection of your excellency, I have the most perfect confidence in the equity of the decision, and I pray you to be assured of the sentiments of the high consideration and respect with which I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

The Duke of Alcudia to Mr. Pinckney.

SAN IDEFOZ, August 14th, 1795.

Sir:

I have communicated to the King the contents of your letters of the 29th of July and 6th current, in which you bring to view the offer made to Mr. William Short, that our ships of war and privateers should respect the free navigation of the United States in the same manner as those of France.

It is therefore, in view of your excellency, that I have liberated the vessels detained, and the restoration of the cargoes of some others repa] contraband according to the fifteenth article of our privateering ordinance.

On observing what you state, His Majesty has directed proper orders to be given to the Minister of Marine for having his instructions to the Minister from Bordeaux, to which you declare to be American property.

That the captain of the Providence be paid for the pitch, tar, and turpentine, taken from him at Santander, as contraband articles.

And in like manner that restitution be made for the cargo of the American brigantine Abigail, of New York, consisting of boards, and paints, confiscated by the marine judge of Santander.

I hope that, in these dispositions, you will acknowledge the sincere desire which animates His Majesty to cultivate the most perfect harmony with the United States, and to cement still more the friendship subsisting between the two countries.

On my part, I renew to you on this occasion, &c.

Mr. Pinckney to the Duke of Alcudia.

SAN IDEFOZ, August 10th, 1795.

Monsieur Le Duc:

As in the conference with which you honored me on Wednesday last, I perceived that, although you have read with attention the memoir of Mr. Short and Carmichael, upon the right of the United States to the sovereignty of the Mississippi, and to our southern limit, and admit the justice of the arguments therein contained, yet, that your excellency entertained some doubt relative to a part of the pretensions of the United States, I have thought it my duty to lay before your excellency some arguments in addition, and I have endeavored to avoid as much as possible a repetition of those which have been so well developed in the said memoir, upon which I always rely as the most perfect exposition of our rights.

I have the honor to be, &c.

T. PINCKNEY.

Memor, by Mr. Pinckney.

"Thirty-two years have elapsed since all the country on the left or eastern bank of the Mississippi, being under the legitimate domination of the then King of England, that sovereign thought proper to regulate with precision the limits between the provinces of Georgia and of the two Floridas, which was done by his solemn proclamation, published in the usual form, by which he established between those provinces the same limits which, nearly twenty years after, he declared to be the southerly limit of the United States, by the treaty which this same King of England concluded with them in the month of November, 1782.

By the treaty of peace, between the late King of Spain and that sovereign, signed the 20th January, 1783, he ceded to His Catholic Majesty the two Floridas, without making any description of their limits. However, it is not difficult to prove, not only what were those limits, but also what the two contracting parties understood by that description. It is very evident that Great Britain could not be understood to have ceded more to Spain than the two Floridas, according to the limits fixed by the proclamation of 1762, and according to what had recently been concluded, by a solemn treaty, to be the southerly limit of the United States. She had not been fortunate in the war which preceded that treaty; but it had not so far humiliated her as to dishonor herself by ceding to Spain a territory which, two months before, she declared to belong of right to the United States. But, it is likewise evident that the Spanish Government, at that time, under the same thing in recovering, as England did in ceding, the Floridas, in order to prove this, one need only observe the dates of the relative circumstances in this business. The said proclamation of the King of England had been published more than nine years before that epoch; it was impossible, therefore, for the court of Spain to be uninformed on the subject of it; and if it were not content with the limits therein adjusted, it should have had others inserted in the treaty of peace of 1783. Besides, the provisional articles of the treaty between the United States and England, in which this limit was acknowledged, were signed in the month of November, 1783, and immediately communicated to the court of France. Now, the close connexion which at this time united the House of Bourbon, who possessed the crown of Spain and France, was notoriously known. It is well known that these two nations were allied and confederates in the war against Great Britain. Is it, therefore, credible that the court of France omitted to communicate to their ally the treaty of the United States with Great Britain before the articles with Spain and the latter Power had existence? And this being the case, I repeat that, if she were discontented with the limits not described for Florida, she then had an opportunity for opening negotiations in order to change them. But if it were possible to imagine that Spain, thus linked with France, and having an able negotiator upon the spot, treating of peace with the same Power, could have been ignorant of what was going forward upon this subject, it is evident that it never occurred in which she still had an opportunity of making her objections to those limits, and that it was impossible that she could not have possessed all the necessary information, that is to say, all the time which had elapsed since her definitive treaty with Great Britain, which was not signed until the 3d of September, 1783—a period of two months after the treaty with America had been communicated to France, and even six months after it had been published in the United States. From these facts it follows that Spain, being informed of the limits fixed by the proclamation of 1763, and acknowledged by the treaty of the United States, was content with, or that, if she were not, that she made attempts with Great Britain, which, having failed in bringing about a change of them in the treaty by which she obtained Florida, it results, from every principle of justice, that she remained satisfied with those limits. But it has been said that Spain had pretensions for passing the limits above mentioned by the right of conquest—her troops having, during the war, seized a certain portion of territory beyond that limit; but the answer to this pretension is as simple and as conclusive as that just developed, which is, that the territory conquered must have belonged, before the war, either to the United States, it is very clear that Spain could have no right to make conquests on a nation with whom she was not at war, and I will not, for a single moment, admit an idea so disrespectful to Spain as to imagine that she could pretend to be the friend of the United States to have succored them in the war, to have even lent them money for maintaining it; at the same time she was depriving them of their property. If this territory belonged to Great Britain, His Catholic Majesty obliged himself, by the sixth article of the definitive treaty with Great Britain, to deliver up, without difficulty, all the country and territories conquered by the arms of His Majesty, which were not comprehended in the same under the name of cessions or of restitutions. Now, by the treaty, there was, under this description, besides the island of Minorca, only Florida, whose limits have been proved above. Therefore, in both cases, Spain has not the right of retaining those possessions under the name of conquest.

Mississippi.—The right of the United States to the free navigation of the Mississippi, also depends upon the best founded and most incontestable principles. In considering them I shall advance as much as possible, a repetition of the contents of the memoir of Messrs. Short and Carmichael, as I have endeavored to do in that I had the honor of submitting to your excellency on the question of the limits, and this is the reason why I shall say nothing upon the argument which appears to me alone to decide this discussion in favor of the United States, to wit: the natural right they have to this navigation, arising from their possession of it and the rights which are inherent in the created world, as regards navigation, and might be applied to the present case.

By this article, the right of the United States (then a constituent part of the British empire) to navigate this river was acknowledged, and it may be added that they were the part of that empire for which this article must have been principally stipulated, being the only one of those rights which the British empire could not be induced to cede to France, and by which it was indispensable to France to the treaty of 1763—France, our friend, our ally, who lavished her blood and treasure for the support of our rights—France, in a word, who, by the 11th article of her treaty of alliance, had agreed to guaranty to the United States their possessions and the additions or conquests which their confederacy may procure during the war, from any of the dominions now, or heretofore, possessed by Great Britain in North America, the whole, as their possessions, shall be fixed and ascertained to the said United States, at the moment of the cessation of their war with England.

Neither can Great Britain oppose the right of the United States to this navigation, in derogation of her treaty of 1763, and in direct contravention of that treaty with the United States, in November, 1782. If, therefore, neither the one nor the other of these ancient proprietors had the right of prohibiting the United States from the navigation of this river, I must repeat, here, that they could not, in ceding their territory to Spain, cede, also, a right which did not at all belong to them, and, consequently, that Spain does not possess that right. It may here be added, that all the arguments founded upon the knowledge Spain possessed of the existing state of the contracts, when she obtained her acquisitions, which have been above applied to the question of limits, are opposed, with still greater force, to their pretensions to the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi; forasmuch as she was one of the contracting parties to the treaty of peace of 1763, and, as, by the second article of the definitive treaty of peace, concluded in 1783, that very treaty was expressly one of those which served as a basis and foundation to that of 1783. lays, by making a representation to His Majesty, requesting that a greater number of judges be appointed for giving definitive judgment. If this representation has been made, I doubt not but your excellency will see it in its true light, and will act so as that that justice, which, I am confident, His Majesty desires to render, be no longer delayed.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

Mr. Pinckney to the Duke of Alcedia.

SPAIN.

MONSIEUR LE DUC:

I have the honor to send you, enclosed herein, the copy of two petitions, presented by the captain of an American vessel called "The Three Friends," [Los Tres Amigos] to the marine tribunal of Santander, in which the circumstances relative to his detention are detailed, and from which, it appears that the captors, notwithstanding his claims, have landed the cargo of the said vessel.

As I well assessed, from what has already taken place on like occasions, that His Majesty will be pleased to cause this vessel and cargo to be restored, I take the liberty of laying these facts before your excellency, not doubting but that you will have the goodness so to act as that this affair be terminated with the least possible expense to all the parties interested.

I shall only add an observation, that the circumstance of this vessel having been found in the possession of Frenchmen, cannot change the case, because she would not have been deemed good prize if she had been carried into France; and even if all the cargo belonged to Frenchmen, it would be restored here, according to the last dispositions of His Majesty.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

Mr. Pinckney to the Duke of Alcedia.

SAN ILDEFONSO, 5th September, 1795.

MONSIEUR LE PRINCE:

I have the honor to inform your excellency that the owners of the American vessels, the Rookby and Greenway, which were carried into the port of Cadiz, in the year 1793, by His Majesty's frigate Santa Catalina, have sent an agent to Spain, in order that these vessels, which had been kept in complete repair in the royal dock yards of His Majesty. Your excellency will readily recollect all the circumstances of this affair, by recuring to the letters with which you honored Mr. Short, on the 14th and 24th of October, 1794. The agent of 1794 has had those vessels surveyed at Cadiz, and the report of the artists states, that there is still sufficient time to repair them, if the work be done before the autumn rains can complete their damages. This agent is authorized to receive the indemnifications due for the freight of the cargoes of these vessels, and for the expense of their detention; but that which presses most in this case, and on which I beg your excellency to communicate to me the King's determination, is the giving of an order for the commencement of those repairs, as the agent is arrived here to the Sitio, where his expenses are more considerable than he can conveniently afford, and as he assures me that, if the repairs are not begun immediately, it will be useless to undertake them. As to what regards the freight, and other demands, I have no doubt but we shall be able to arrange them amicably, at the same time we regulate the principles of several other claims of the same nature.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

The Prince of Peace to Mr. Pinckney.

SAN ILDEFONSO, 13th September, 1795.

SIR:

On observing what you state in the letter of the day before yesterday, on the solicitation of the proprietors of the American vessels, the Rookby and Greenway, detained at Cadiz, since the end of 1794, I assure you, sir, that orders have long ago been given for proceeding, without loss of time, to the repairing and refitting of the said vessels, agreeably to what has been proposed; but without attending to the pretended reclamations, for the reasons mentioned in my letters to Mr. William Short upon this subject.

On this occasion I reiterate to you, &c.

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

SAN ILDEFONSO, 20th September, 1795.

MONSIEUR LE PRINCE:

Having received orders from the Government of the United States of America to make reclamations to the court of Spain, in consequence of the capture of several vessels belonging to their citizens, as well by the Spanish ships of war, as by their privateers, during the war which has just been terminated, it is my duty to state to your excellency the basis upon which these reclamations are founded. There is no principle more incontestable, or more generally acknowledged, than that which establishes that, when two nations have the misfortune to be at war, the other nations wishing to remain at peace, and not to meddle in the quarrel, ought not to meet with any molestation or bad treatment from them; but, on the contrary, that they should be free to go and come, to pursue their commerce and their labor, in the same manner as though the war did not exist: always suspending the plenitude of the exercise of this right in two cases only: the first of which is, not to carry, either to the one or to the other of the belligerent parties, warlike stores. The second, to carry nothing to places besieged, or blockaded up. With the exception of these two conditions, the war should be null, and as though it did not exist, so far as it respects neutral nations.

This doctrine, founded upon reason, and supported by the sentiments of the most enlightened writers, is further established by the express approbation of the commercial nations of Europe, of whom there is scarcely one who has not adopted these principles in their late treaties, in which they declare the commerce which neutral vessels should hold, in case either should be either. But the time in which this common sentiment of the majority of the maritime nations manifested itself more clearly on this subject, was, when maritime conventions were established, in 1780, in the first instance, between the Northern Powers, and adopted posteriorly by a decisive plurality of the nations of Europe, and particularly by Spain.

It is this respectable code, dictated by wisdom and moderation, which, by preserving the privileges of those at peace, does not infringe the rights of those at war. This code, whose equitable principles have drawn forth the assent and support of all the most respectable Powers of Europe, who also, by their position, as well political as geographical, seemed to have but little interest in it— I mean the emperor and the King of Prussia, who have solemnly adopted it— this code, in a word, uniting the sentiments of all the nations of the two hemispheres, except a single Power, has placed on a certain basis that which henceforward should be the law of nations on this subject. It is this code which I cite for the foundation of the proposition I have to make to your excellency, to wit: that the decisions on the captures of the American vessels which have been brought into ports belonging to His Catholic Majesty, and his ships of war or privateers, shall be given according to the principles of the above mentioned convention, made in 1780, by the king of Denmark, the king of Sweden, the king of Prussia, the emperor of Russia, and the king of Portugal, and the principles of which, Spain and the United States have since declared their intention of adhering, and that commissions shall be named on both sides for determining the reimbursements that may be due on this account. I do not think I can propose to your excellency a more convenient method for terminating all discussion on this subject, than by establishing a rule formally approved of by both nations, who have united, in its favor, so remarkable a plurality of the important European Powers—a rule, moreover, conformable to the principles which His Majesty has declared he would follow in the war which has just been terminated, since, in the 14th article of his "ordenanza de curso," he has determined to renew the stipulations of this article, which have been suspended, by her treaty with the United States, to observe these same principles, and she has acted conformably, so that the same rule which the King has already established, is precisely that which I at present claim. If the fact be as our citizens complain, that a considerable number of our vessels have been taken and carried into the ports of His Majesty (particularly in the West Indies,) when they were occupied in lawful traffic only, where, after a long detention, their cargoes have been carried off by force, without the proprietors, for the most part, knowing whether they were condemned by a court of justice or not; if it be proved that half of the crews of some of these vessels died of the disorders incident to their captivity, those who survived abandoned their vessels and cargoes, rather than face the dangers of a second sentence, by the very sentences of the tribunal in the islands, (where the sentences have been communicated to the owners,) it be proved that the acts for which these cargoes have been condemned were not offences against the law of nations; I am too well convinced of His Majesty's equity, and of his benevolence towards his subjects, to have any doubt that he will, on consideration of the same case, which would give an infinite deal of trouble to your excellency, and bring with it an endless discussion. I take the liberty of adding, here, a single reflection, which is founded on what appears to me to be the true interests of Spain on this subject, to wit: that it is expedient for a nation preserving the richest productions in the world, and who, during a war, must necessarily draw great resources from her distant possessions—for a nation whose inhabitants are not generally led by habit, or perhaps by sentiment, to a private war—that it is expedient, in a word, for the mistress of the mines of Mexico and Peru, to give the most ample latitude to the rights of neutral nations, during a war. It is this sentiment, founded on justice and sound policy, which, doubtless, dictated the adherence of Spain to the principles of the armed neutrality, proposed by Russia; and I have no suspicion that, in the present case, she would wish to swerve from it to do an injury to a nation, led equally from interest and disposition, to rank herself among her best friends. I have the honor to be, with the sentiments of the highest consideration and respect, Monsieur Le Duc, your most obedient and very humble servant,

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

The Prince of Peace to Mr. Pinckney.

SAN ILDEFONSO, 32d September, 1795.

Sir:

I yesterday received yours of the 20th, relative to the orders you have received from the President of the United States, for claiming indemnification for various prizes made by the ships of war and privateers of Spain, particularly in America, and soliciting the naming of persons on both sides, informed of the cases and complaints of the proprietors, for determining them according to the principles of the neutrality adopted in the year 1783, by the Nautical Articles of Peace and by the Declaration of War.

You accompanied the said paper with an additional one, which I did not touch upon on Sunday, when I handed you the project of the treaty, expecting that this point would be provided for therein.

And, in answer to both cases, I can inform you that, on the same terms as have been determined the American prizes in Europe, since the neutrality of the United States with France, in the present war, has been so declared, shall be judged the prizes which may have been made in America. But this matter being very different from the system of a treaty stipulating positive regulations for the future, there is no necessity of including it therein.

I renew, on this occasion, my sincere desires, &c.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE.

Notes on the project of a Convention proposed by His Excellency the Prince of Peace.

25th of September, 1795.

The preamble of this project appears very convenient, but would be without importance in expressing the appointment of the plenipotentiary of the United States according to the forms prescribed by their constitution.

Art. 1. 1 think that it would be better to insert six months, instead of one year, for the period in which the garri- sons shall retire, because six months may elapse after the signature of the treaty, before the ratifications are completed, and hence the year which Spain requires for this purpose will be obtained.

Art. 2. The same period of six months may be substituted instead of one year, as in the preceding article, which corresponds with this.

Art. 3. In the ninth line of this article it appears that the word "anchura" (breath) may be substituted for "extension." In the 11th and 12th lines, the words "solo et exclusivamente" (alone and exclusively) should be omitted, for Spain could scarcely confide in the good faith of the United States, nor in this convention, which she is about to con- clude with these powers, to be treated with more favor than it has been previously, made. Now, by the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, concluded in 1783, it is stipulated that the navigation of the river Mississippi shall continue free to the subjects of Great Britain and to the citizens of the United States. It appears that the following provision would have all the desired effect: "It is nevertheless agreed, that no navigation of vessels of the United States, nor of the vessels of the States, on this river, to other nations or persons, than to the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and to the citizens of the United States." Again, this article is incomplete, and does not fulfill the object of the two parties, which is to avoid all circum- stances which might be the cause of the interruption of the good harmony of the two nations because it does not point out the manner in which this navigation shall be exercised. It is true, that the stipulation of the free navigation carries with it, as of natural consequence, that the persons and effects of the contracting nations cannot be arrested, or subjected to pay any duty for the use of this navigation, and that they are to enjoy all the conveniences on the navigation of the river which the laws of nations permit; but it could produce no inconvenience to the contracting parties in the same article, by which means every discussion in this respect would be avoided in future. And I think it would, also, be the interest of His Majesty, in order to do away all suspicion of contraband trade, that a place be as- signed for the American vessels, arriving from sea, or from the river, to put into, or to touch at, instead of a more diffusive exercise of this right.

Suspection.—Again, as it appears that the court of Spain desires to establish this convention upon the basis of justice, although, at present, it does not judge proper to enter into commercial arrangements with the United States to this time, I think that, upon this footing also, M. le Prince will agree, that justice will not be complete without some addition to this article. For I take it for granted, that the right of the United States to the navigation of the Mississippi, and to the limits, has been proved, and that it is incontestable; and I conceive this is deducible from the arguments which have been brought forward on the subject, on the part of the United States, having never been answered: and I am very certain that, if there were no other consideration, they would have escaped the penetration and intelligence of those arguments which could be opposed with justice and energy to our pretensions. But his views are too upright to use unfounded arguments. He is, also, too enlightened to employ weak reasons, and I am sincerely and fully persuaded that he was not bribed to oppose the United States, their rights, and their country. It is plain, then, that we should not lose the advantage of doing a thing due to them for the suspension of that right, during a period of twelve years, which has done incalculable injury to the inhabitants of the fertile countries watered by the Mississippi. Under this point of view, then, I conceive I do not demand a thing incompatible with the most rigorous justice, when I make the proposition to cede to a neutral nation, and thus to the American vessels, that portion of the cargoes, with those arriving from the neighboring ports on the river. Besides, Spain having actually seen and considered the reasons and the equitable basis upon which the pretensions of the United States are founded, as soon after the termination of his Majesty’s war, she has never made any objections, and respect for justice would do her great honor. “We do agree, that the navigation of the Mississippi be common to both nations;” and I am too well assured of the Spanish good faith, to imagine that she wished this declaration to be illusory, without utility and without effect. Now, by the position and singular nature of the Mississippi, its navigation cannot be exercised, at least for a long time, without the assistance for which she has stipulated by this convention; and I doubt not but that His Majesty will agree to it, after having reflected that it is a natural consequence of what is already concluded. Nor do I think it would be well to omit this part of the article under an idea that we have agreed to a thing we agree to for every matter necessary for its execution; and consequently, that the Americans will have the right of using the necessary accommodations on this navigation; because I consider, as the principal object of this convention, the termination of every thing that may give room for future complaints and disputes, whereas, the indeterminate manner of the use of this navigation would be a fertile source, and a war should only put the United States to operate wars to avoid.

Before I examine the 5th article, it is necessary to remark here, that the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th; and after the 15th, 16th, and 17th articles of the project which Mr. Pinckney had the honor of proposing, he entirely omitted, without any substitute, then it appears that every stipulation on commercial relations is rejected, and that His Majesty is to be justly considered as wishing to connect more closely the bands of friendship with the United States, by means mutually convenient. Mr. Pinckney, however, cannot allow himself to think, such being the dispositions of His Majesty, observing his benevolence for the United States, that there is nothing relative in any respect, and that he has always been loud in America for not particularly those possessions of Spain in America, Mr. Pinckney does not hesitate to say, that the advantages which would result therefrom to Spain, are incalculable; and as to what regards merely the benefits of the commerce of the United States, it is evident that there is not possibly to be found: the first, that the inhabitants of the United States were not to have the privilege of clothing themselves in the space of twenty years, eight of which have been employed in a war, which having partook of the nature of a civil war, was destructive to population, not only from the rage with which such wars are pursued, but by the emigrations which have followed, and the instances happened, proving that the commerce of the United States is not contemptible: The first is, that the inhabitants of the United States have to purchase the necessary commodities at the price which the Spaniards would be willing to sell to the inhabitants of the United States, or of ten millions of pounds, manufacturing but little for themselves, and which except to the value of upwards of thirty millions, principally of articles of the first necessity, cannot offer a disadvantageous commerce.

Art. 9th. It would seem that a part of this article contains inconveniences which should cause it to be rejected by both parties. The first principle apparently necessary to establish, relative to the Indians, is, that neither party should be admitted to the property of the tribes and the territory within the limits of the other; and it is especially the interest of Spain to hinder such practices with the great number of Indians inhabiting her territory. But, if it be stipulated by this convention, “Que no se depajaran ni hechara de sus tierras a dichas naciones;” and a war should only put the United States to operate wars to avoid.

Art. 10th. This article appears also to require some ulterior explanations.

Art. 6th. To require explanation of the 10th and 11th lines.

Art. 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th. Agreed to.

Art. 12th. Here are omitted the 15th, 16th, 17th articles of the project of Mr. Pinckney.

Art. 13th. Here are omitted the 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, and 23d articles of Mr. Pinckney.

Art. 14th and 15th. Agreed to.

Art. 16th. Agreed to as far as the last paragraph, beginning with the words “y los casos,” to which I am opposed; because it would render almost useless every thing contained in this and the preceding article, and is repugnant to the system of the armed neutrality of the last war, which I conceive it is the interest of Spain, as well as the United States, to support; and because it would give room to perpetual abuse and vexations. I shall put a case, which will show the inconvenience of establishing a principle as a basis at war with the Algeciras; if this war should not terminate soon, it is probable that the United States will have a right of staying in the Mediterranean in that case, I suppose that Spain would not think it proper that the American ships of war should be driven out of the course of their voyage, and in which the necessary forms for having arrested and delivered up, any person or vessel, according to the constitution of the United States, shall be more defined, and in which M. le Prince might insert the testimony and forms required by the Spanish laws for obtaining the effect described.

* The said Indian nations shall neither be disturbed nor driven from their lands.
M. le Prince will doubtless find, on reflection, that the term "malhechores" (malefactors) is infinitely too vague, as it comprehends every sort of transgression opposed to good morals; and it is, also, too uncertain; because such an act, as would be reputed "malhecho" (a bad or criminal action) in one country, or in one age, might not be deemed so in another. As to what regards the effects or property that may be stolen or concealed, and carried into the hands of the parties, the following article does no more, and the slaves are comprehended under these descriptions. The reason why the crime of murder is the only one mentioned in the project of Mr. Pinckney is, because it is the only crime appearing to merit the vengeance of governments, which obliges them to take the trouble of pursuing the fugitives into foreign countries, because the exile, which is the consequence of their flight, appears to be a punishment sufficient for this crime. Moreover, as to the 29th article, they may be deprived of all the property which they may have been able, unjustly, to carry with them.

Art. 32.

Art. 33. Mr. Pinckney having stated, in a separate memoir, the reasons for inserting here an article as to the captures made by the Spanish privateers, during the war just terminated, has nothing further to add to this.

[Enclosures in Mr. Pinckney's despatch of 28th October, 1795—postea, page 546.]

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

MADRID, 5th October, 1795.

Monsieur le Prince:

Your excellency, by the letter with which you honored me on the 23d ult., having agreed that the captures of the vessels of the United States, which shall have been made in America, shall be judged according to the same principles by which the prizes made upon the Americans in Europe have been determined since the neutrality of the United States towards France has been known, there only remains, for the accomplishment of the commission with which I am charged by the President of the United States on the subject, to explain what those principles are, and to bring them forth; although it appears to me that this might be done very easily in the manner in which the 29th article was intended, as the principal object of this convention is the termination of the differences which have formerly subsisted. However, as your excellency appeared to have objections to it, I have put those details in the form of a separate convention, herein enclosed, and I flatter myself that the terms in which it is conceived will be acceded to by your excellency.

The Prince of Peace to Mr. Pinckney.

SAN LORENZO, 7th October, 1795.

Sir:

In answer to yours of the 5th instant, in reply to mine of the 23d, you say that you suppose the difficulties pointed out therein, against the insertion in the present treaty, of an article relative to the captures made on the citizens of the United States, during the present war, would require a separate convention in the terms mentioned. But there is, moreover, in my opinion, the same reasons as to the insertion of the article. I must say, that, as this business will require little explanation when agreed upon, there is no need of multiplying writing for inserting it, and that it will be proper to confine ourselves to the limits of our particular agreement, for whose execution the most clear and positive orders will be communicated.

SAN LORENZO, October 7, 1795.

The Prince of Peace, in consequence of the conference with Mr. Thomas Pinckney, on Friday last, on the treaty between Spain and the United States, which finally closed the said treaty, hopes that, if Mr. Thomas Pinckney finds it confromable to his instructions, and to what has been agreed upon, he will sign it when convenient.

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

MADRID, October 2, 1795.

M. le Prince:

I have the honor of receiving the project of the treaty with the last corrections which your excellency has given it, and I have considered it with all the attention which an instrument apparently of so much importance to the two countries has required. I request, therefore, that you will have the kind disposition for establishing, upon just and solid bases, a close and sincere friendship between our two nations. It is, therefore, with much regret that I find myself, after the most mature reflection, unable to sign this convention without its undergoing some alteration, and the principal reason is, that it is not final and conclusive, but refers to ulterior negotiations one of the principal objects of my mission, which is to establish the manner in which the citizens of the United States are to navigate the river Mississippi. I should here remind your excellency that it was in consequence of the representation of the charge des affaires of His Majesty, that the President of the United States thought proper to establish the measures by which he has considered as the best; and the principal reason offered by Mr. Jaudenes in his letter of the 16th of August, 1794, for the adoption of this measure was, that "His Majesty would not enter into any treaty, unless the powers to the ministers of the United States were ample, or accompanied with secret instructions, having for object to conclude a partial, and not a general treaty." After which, he adds, "that Spain is ready to treat upon the points of limits, Indians, commerce, and whatever may conduct to the best friendship between the two countries." Having, therefore, arrived here with the impressions naturally made by these expressions, it is with pain I have received the intelligence which your excellency has given me that His Majesty would not, under present circumstances, enter into commercial arrangements. But, as commercial conventions should be arrangements of mutual convenience, I have the honor of assuring your excellency that the United States would not desire to have any, if the nation with whom they contract does not find a mutual advantage in them; and for that reason I have not been more important with your excellency for establishing articles on this subject. I have only appeared to authorize. But this is not the case with respect to what regards the navigation of the river Mississippi, which has been the subject of discussion between the two countries since the peace of 1783, and which, after all that has passed, I think that the United States have a right to expect to be put upon an advantageous footing in this treaty. I shall not here repeat what I have already had the honor of recommending to your excellency in writing and in conversation on this subject, adding only to my note on the fourth article of the project of your excellency, references to some authors on the laws of nations, proving that we pretend to nothing unauthorized by those laws, even admitting we had no other equitable demands on account of the exclusion with which navigation we have suffered for twelve years.—V. Grotius de J. B. and P., I, 2, c. 2, sec. 12. Puffendorf, I, 2, 3, sec. 21. Vegetius, I, 2, 192.

I shall here take the liberty of submitting a paragraph which might be added to the last article of the project of your excellency, and which appears to me of a nature not to encounter any difficulty, and may be regarded as an intermediate mean until His Majesty shall think proper to bring forward the ulterior project of the subject mentioned in this article, observing, at the same time, that I do not pretend to propose this as an exclusive mean; but that if your excellency should have any other to propose, by which the United States might freely enjoy this navigation without waiting the result of the ulterior measures, which circumstances may or may not be such as to permit the establishment of this navigation at least, I shall be much charmed at being able to think, in this manner, to have given you at least, one more subject to consider this discussion to mutual satisfaction. There are some other points in this project, of less importance, but which appear to me susceptible of changes which I shall have the honor of adding, in which I think we shall readily agree.
I expect to go to the Sitio to-morrow, and I shall have the honor of presenting my respects to your excellency at the conference on Sunday, when I hope to receive the determination of your excellency on the subject.

I have the honor to be, &c.

In the fifth article, the word "offhand" appears to me too vague and indefinite, and therefore it would be better to omit it. In the last paragraph of the sixteenth article, for "la Espana," should be substituted "las dos Potencias," because the two Powers having equally the liberty of arresting the vessels of the other in case of neutrality, they should be equally held to compensate; and although the United States do not support a great war, I conceive it possible, in the case of war, they would not want resources of this kind. And in regard to American cargoes, there are very probable circumstances of avoiding soon, might be able to make use of the right which this article would concede. It appears also that the price of the articles should be fixed in this convention; and as it is impossible, in the case of taking them, there will be exercised that price should be fixed high enough to hinder them from being taken without a real necessity, in which case those who have easily have them also on paying a high price, and the neutral powers would be indemnified for their detention, and for having lost the object of their voyage. Wherefore, I propose that, in lieu of the words "por tanto de valor," there be inserted, "at double the price of these effects cost," which will be proved by the papers relative to the cargoes found on board of the said vessels.

In the seventeenth article, I propose that, instead of "d'Espagne," towards the end of that article, the words "it shall be" be inserted and that, instead of the last words, beginning with "Limo," there be inserted, "if it shall not be proved that they truly belong to the subjects or citizens of the contracting Power which shall be neutral."

In article twenty-first, I propose to change the following words: Instead of "S. M. Católica," insert "the two Powers;" and instead of "conceders," "shall mutually give on both sides to the commerce between the two nations."

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

MONSEIGNEUR LE PRINCE:

If I have rightly understood what you did me the honor to say to me at the conference to-day, on the subject of my letter of the 9th current, that you could not agree to add what I proposed to you in the last article of the project of the 15th instant, being at that time temporary, and liable to be changed as soon as the interior measures brought into question in the last article shall have been determined, I have not thought proper to insert in a treaty whose articles are of a permanent nature; but that you would agree to propose to His Majesty, that, by a separate instrument, the accommodation of a depot at New Orleans, which I proposed, shall be agreed on, and that, in the same instrument, to insert the arrangements relative to the prizes made upon the Americans during the war lately terminated; having, therefore, reduced the proposition in this proposition, I have the honor to reply, that, although I do not see, under the same point of view as your excellency, that such measures will naturally be practised hitherto, yet the regard I have for your excellency's opinion, and my sincere desire of rendering the arrangements we are treating of as agreeable to Spain as may be compatible with the principles on which we are to act, I shall be pleased to lose time to acquiesce in this matter, provided that the latter convention be of the same force, and executed at the same time as the principal treaty; and the better to explain my intentions hereon, I take the liberty of sending, herein enclosed, the project of two separate articles for the latter instrument, such as I can sign, and, as I doubt not, your excellency will find reasonable.

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

SIR:

In answer to yours of yesterday, with the two articles referred to our conference to-morrow, the one relative to the mode in which you wish the effects of the citizens of the United States, navigating the Mississippi, should be deposited, and the other for regulating the prizes made during the present war; I can assure you that His Majesty, and to support the propositions contained in a treaty in which we are engaged, it will not be proper for me to engage in confidence or communication with. As to what respects the point of prizes, I cannot add any thing not already contained in my former official letters, since His Majesty will not admit this matter to be included in a treaty or convention.

The Prince of Peace to Mr. Pinckney.

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

SIR:

On considering the letters which your excellency has written and what you have done me the honor to say to me in conversation in reply to the representations which I have made relative to the vessels which have been taken by the ships of war of Spain during the war, it appears clearly that we agree upon the principles which ought to determine this business, since the verbal conversion which you made with Mr. Short, "That Spain will observe in the determination the same conduct towards you which is prescribed by the treaty of commerce between France and the United States," is so much the more satisfactory, as your excellency, by your letter of 23d of September, extends this principle to the vessels of the United States which have been intercepted in the American seas as in those of Europe.

What at present appears to me necessary is to put it in my power to send to the President of the United States the result of the claims which I have had the honor to make in virtue of my commission on this subject, and to agree upon arrangements for giving effect to these principles. With this view I have the honor to propose that your excellency communicate to the officially commission of His Majesty on the subject, and that the principles being thus stipulated, commissioners be named on both sides for ascertaining the damages which may be due to the citizens of the United States according to those principles.

The Prince of Peace to Mr. Pinckney.

SAN LORENZO, October 18th, 1795.

SIR:

You refer me, in your letter of the 15th instant, to mine of the 23d ultimo, for what I have said on the mode in which the captures of the vessels of the United States, lately made in America, shall be judged, and to my verbal conversation, on this point, and I can assure you Mr. Short, that we have concluded a rule of procedure, conformably to the principles adopted. But, from the same context of my letter already mentioned, is to be clearly inferred the distinction of two epochs; the one from the beginning of the war until the 6th of April, when His Majesty ordered the vessels of the United States to be treated in the same manner as those of France; and the other from the 6th of April last until the present time. The captures made within the first, must be judged according to the marine ordinance, (ordenanza de corso) and the general orders communicated at the time; and the vessels which may have been detained since the first of April, in the present year, shall be treated in the same manner as those which were then brought from the coast of CANTABRIA.

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

SAN LORENZO, October 29, 1795.

Monsieur le Prince:

I am mortified on finding, by the letter with which you honored me on the 18th, that your excellency proposes to divide the war, which has just been terminated, into two epochs, and that the American vessels which have been detained by those of Spain, during that war, should be differently treated, according to the time at which they were taken; as it seems to me that that justice which should govern the conduct of nations towards neutral flags, is always the same, and ought not to be limited to the variations of time and circumstances. It is very clear that the United States were as much neutral and as friendly to Spain at the beginning of the war, as after the 1st of April last, and that consequently they should expect similar treatment at both epochs. That which is at least certain is, that, at all times, they ought to be treated according to the laws of nations, and I conceive I have proved very clearly what those laws are on this subject in my official letter of the 29th of September last; and, in order to avoid repetitions, I take the liberty of requesting your excellency to recur to that letter for the reasons upon which our claims are founded. As I do not know what are the general orders, mentioned by your excellency, which were given before the 1st of August, 1795, I cannot answer that the United States will be contented with the determinations founded on them if they are conformable to the armed neutrality of 1786, to which Spain and the United States have declared their adhesion, the United States will have nothing to say against them; but if they were formed upon the supposition that France was not a legitimate Power, the laws of nations cannot take place in cases respecting the commerce with that nation, and the United States would not consent to a proposition which would do so much wrong to a friendly and equally Power, which would sacrifice the honor of her flag and the property of their citizens, when they were occupied in lawful commerce: but, in order to avoid all discussion on a subject rather delicate, I have the honor to submit to this, some specific propositions, founded upon justice, and the laws of nations as now established by the consent of a great, majority of the nations of Europe, and adopted by Spain herself, which are, that no vessel of the United States, which has been detained by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty since the commencement of the war, can be deemed good prize, unless she carry articles, which are contraband of war, to the enemies of Spain, or unless she be intercepted in such a vessel to enter a port insalubrious to Spain, which was blockaded, having come from the blockade; that, in order to determine what shall be deemed a blockade, this denomination is confined to that only where, by the disposition of the Power making the attack, the arrested vessels were sufficiently near to cause an evident danger of their entering.

That law whatever shall be deemed contraband of war, nothing ought to be acknowledged such, except the merchanisations comprised under that denomination in the 21st article of the treaty made between Spain and England on the 2d of May, 1667, or in the 21st article between France and the United States, concluded in 1778.

That His Catholic Majesty shall cause to be delivered to the owners belonging to the citizens of the United States, without delay, all the cargoes, which have been taken in this war, except those which come within the abovementioned case, with the damages due for their detention and other losses, and, if it be impossible to restore them at present, that His Majesty cause to be paid to the owners the amount of their just value.

The Prince of Peace to Mr. Pinckney.

SAN LORENZO, October 20, 1795.

SIR:

Informed by yours of yesterday of the objection made to the addition proposed to be made to the last article of the treaty, relative to the permission given by His Catholic Majesty to the citizens of the United States, for three years, to deposit their merchanisations at New Orleans, I repeat to you what I have already said, that I cannot vary it in the least; observing, however, that, in the interval, His Majesty will have extended the medium through which the navigation may increase the commerce of his subjects, and of the citizens of the United States.

The Prince of Peace to Mr. Pinckney.

SAN LORENZO, October 22, 1795.

SIR:

Observing, by yours of the 20th current, that you do not agree to the distinction made, in mine of the 18th instant, of the epochs relative to the detention of the vessels of the United States, since the beginning of the war between Spain and France, lately terminated, you refer to what you expressed on the subject, in years of the 20th September last, and conclude by repeating that all detentions of the United States will be governed by the principles which you lay down as most consonant to the interests of the States, and conformable to the laws of nations. Without waiting to prove to you the modifications which, according to the same laws of nations, those principles are susceptible of, I only inform you that the vessels, detained before the 1st of April, must be judged, like all those of the other Powers, according to the marine ordinance (ordenanzas de corso) of the 1st of May, 1794; in general the United States as well as all others, until the special exception in their favor, verified on the 6th of April last, by just considerations, towards France. This is the reason why they should be judged according to the said ordinance until the epoch mentioned, from the moment that there is no ground for seeing that this, from the moment of their detention, has been abandoned, and, for the same cause, I conceive every proposition superfluous, which is not conformable to the said ordinance, and I shall not subscribe to any.

I hope you will entirely agree with me in opinion, as I cannot conclude the treaty until this point be fully settled.

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

SAN LORENZO, October 23, 1795.

M. LE PRINCE:

The propositions which I had the honor to communicate to you in my letter of the 90th current having been formed upon principles already recognized by Spain and by the United States, I thought it the best mode for determining all discussion on the subject; for it appears clear that, where there is a difference of opinion between two independent Powers, it is a happy circumstance if they can have recourse to principles already admitted by both parties, without the one being obliged to give up his opinion, or to sacrifice his rights to the other. With this impression, I have the honor of repeating to you that I cannot agree to any proposition which does not contain substantially what I proposed to your excellency in my former representations.

I take the liberty of observing, here, that your excellency does not appear to have received correct information as to the immediate liberation of the American vessels, taken since the 6th of April last, as, out of the five carried into Santander, for which I have presented a claim, to wit: the Liberty, of New York; the Maria, of Boston; the Providence, of Philadelphia; the Ahab, of New York; and the Three Friends, of Salem; the Liberty was detained one hundred and ten days; the Three Friends was detained at the departure of the last post; and the three others put to sea without a part of their cargoes, which your excellency had ordered to be restored, although I know that the officers of the marine, at that place, have received positive orders from your excellency for the restitution of the said vessels and effects.

As to what concerns the treaty, I agree with your excellency that it would not be convenient to your excellency or myself to sign it until we have agreed relative to the vessels; and I can add, that even then, I cannot sign, unless the manner of navigating the river Mississippi, by the citizens of the United States, be regulated upon the principles of some one of the propositions which I have had the honor of making to you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Mr. Pinckney to the Prince of Peace.

SAN LORENZO, October 24, 1795.

M. LE PRINCE:

Important affairs demanding my return to England, I shall have the honor to take leave of their Majesties, as we have agreed, to-morrow; and I take the liberty of requesting you to have the usual passports expedited for my journey. Wishing to enter France by the way of Perpignan, I am desirous, also, of taking the route of Valencia and Barcelona, and shall be charmed to execute the orders with which your excellency may be pleased to honor me.

I am, Sir, at any place on the road. I embrace this opportunity of testifying to your excellency my acknowledgments for the marks of good will, and for all the friendly offices, received from you during my stay here, and I pray you to accept the sentiments of respect and high consideration, with which I have the honor to be, &c.

The Prince of Peace to Mr. Pinckney.

SAN LORENZO, October 28, 1795.

SIR:

In consequence of having yesterday signed with you a treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, between the King my Lord and the United States of America, and of the information lately received from the Governor of Louisiana, intimating that the Governor of the Natchez had advanced to occupy the post of the Barones of Margot, comprehended within our ancient limits, and that some inhabitants of Kentucky, and the neighboring States also, intended taking possession, His Majesty has commanded the said Governor to suspend all hostility, in case any shall have been committed on his part, or on that of the citizens of the United States, leaving matters in the situation in which they may be on the receipt of the order until the ratification of the treaty. And he most sincerely enjoys all the military officers of the two Floridas to maintain perfect harmony with the commanders of the troops of the United States on those frontiers, as His Majesty wishes that the said treaty may eradicate every motive of dispute which has hitherto existed, and that it may more and more strengthen the reciprocal friendship of both countries, not doubting but you will communicate every thing, without loss of time, to the President of the United States, that he may expedite similar orders for preventing every kind of inconvenience on both sides, and perhaps an effusion of blood, now as useless as repugnant to humanity.

ART. 1.

ART. 2. This agrees with our proper boundary.

ART. 3. The instructions do not mention this, but I thought it might prevent disputes in future, and would have an injurious effect with the Indians.

ART. 4. The wording of the latter part of this article seemed objectionable, and various alterations were proposed. It required much contest to obtain any alteration from the mode first proposed by Spain, whose doubts were principally founded on a jealousy of our letting in others. The substance, however, appears to me not disadvantageous, when considered as connected with the provision in the 21st article, and the wording fully authorized by my instructions.

ART. 5. This article occupied much time, and great prejudices were to be removed. The only part, as it now stands, which may appear objectionable, is the kind of defensive alliance we herein make with Spain against our respective Indians; and as the case was new, and the instructions not pointed on this head, I wished other modifications, more for the sake of further investigation than from an opinion of disadvantage resulting from it: for, it appears to me, under our present and probable future circumstances, to be a beneficial stipulation.

ART. 6. Taken from the 7th of Prussia, with a small addition at the end, which appears to be not objectionable.

ART. 7. The first part taken from the 16th of Prussia; the latter part I added, because I considered it a good stipulation in all situations, but particularly so in Spain.

ART. 8. Taken from the 19th of France.

ART. 9. 16th of France.
Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Randolph.

SAN LORENZO, 28th October, 1796.

DEAR SIR,

I herewith send to you a treaty which I have just signed conjointly with the Prince de la Paz, His Catholic Majesty's first minister, and plenipotentiary for negotiating this business. The stipulations which it contains have been formed to the best of my judgment, in conformity to my instructions, and, where they left a latitude to the negotiator, according to what I conceived the interest of our country; and I sincerely believe them to be placed on the most advantageous basis, and that we could, at least, attain, by friendly negotiation, the correspondence which passed between the minister and myself, since my letter of the 30th of September, which covered our written negotiation to that time. These will throw some light on points in the treaty which may require it, and render them, I hope, less liable to give you a long detail of the oral part of the negotiation, which was frequent, diffuse, and extensive. I, however, took care to bring forward the written documents herewith, which relate to the most material points. I can safely say that, if the treaty be defective, it has not originated in want of assiduity. You will observe by my note of the 24th of October, that I found the difficulties of such an accommodation as I could arrive to were so insuperable that I had asked for my passports to return. This may illustrate the difficulties I had to encounter, and the prejudices to be removed, which it requires some knowledge of the national character fully to conceive. The peace concluded between this country and France, and the pacific disposition (at least externally) displayed to Spain by the British cabinet, added to our critical situation with the last Power, rendered this negotiation more difficult than it might otherwise have been. With respect to commercial arrangements, you will find that, in the outset of the negotiation, I endeavored strenuously to urge a close connexion; but finding the mind of the minister completely made up on this point, and that he advanced reasons for delaying arrangements of this nature, which appeared to me to be founded on the true interests of Spain, connected with views in other relations at this juncture, I have lately ceased to insist on this subject; besides which, I believe they wish to reserve the commercial advantages they can offer as the equivalent for a guarantee of their American possessions.

I am informed by the Secretary of State here, that he has lately received advice that a party of ours having advanced to the Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee, and the Yazoo, and an advantageous post called the Barancas de Margot, the Spanish commandant had sent a party to occupy that post; but the minister assures me that he has sent orders to the commanding officer in the Floridas to abstain from all hostile operations.

I have been so much occupied on my return in a few days. Mr. Charles Rutledge will remain here as chargé des affaires, by appointment of Mr. Short. I mentioned him to you in my letter of the 30th, September, and I now enclose an extract from that letter, which concerns him, lest the first may have miscarried. I am, my dear sir, with esteem, your faithful and obedient servant,

THOMAS PINCKNEY.
SPAIN.

illustrious order of the Golden Fleece and Great Cross of the royal and distinguished Spanish order of Charles III., Commander of Valencia del Ventoso, Rivera, and Acciuchal in that of Santiago, Knight and Great Cross of the religious order of St. John, Counsellor of State, First Secretary of State and Despatch, Secretary to the Queen, Superintendent General of the ports and highways, Protector of the Royal Academy of the Noble Arts and of the Royal Societies of Natural History, Botany, Chemistry, Astronomical and the King of the Province of the Archdiocese of his armies, Inspector and Major of the Royal Corps of Body Guards, &c., &c.; and the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of their Senate, has appointed Thomas Pinckney, a citizen of the United States, and their envoy extraordinary to His Catholic Majesty. And the said plenipotentiaries having agreed on the following Articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between His Catholic Majesty, his successors and subjects, and the United States and their citizens, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. To prevent all disputes on the subject of the boundaries which separate the territories of the two high contracting parties, it is hereby declared and agreed as follows, to wit: the southern boundary of the United States, which divides the States of Florida and West Florida, shall be the line running on the Mississippi at the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of latitude north of the equator, which from thence shall be drawn due east to the middle of the river Apalachicola, or Chatahoochee: thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint; thence straight to the head of St. Mary’s river; and thence down the middle of the said river to its mouth; and, from thence due west, to the brow of the Atlantic Ocean. And if it shall be agreed that if there should be any troops, garrisoned on either side of the said boundary, the party, in the territory of the other, according to the above mentioned boundaries, they shall be withdrawn from the said territory within the term of six months after the ratification of this treaty, or sooner if it be possible; and that they shall be permitted to take with them all the goods and effects which they possess.

ART. 3. In order to carry the preceding article into effect, one commissioner and one surveyor shall be appointed by each of the contracting parties, who shall meet at the Natchez, on the left side of the river Mississippi, before the expiration of six months from the ratification of this convention, and they shall proceed to run and mark this boundary according to the stipulations of the said article. They shall make plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and shall have the same force as if they were inserted therein.

And, if on any account, it should be found necessary that the said commissioners and surveyors should be accompanied by guards, they shall be furnished in equal proportions by the commanding officer of His Majesty’s troops in the two Floridas, and the commanding officer of the troops of the United States in their southwestern territory, who shall have the same authority with respect to the furnishing of guards to the former as the latter has with respect to the latter. And making every other arrangement which may be necessary or useful for the execution of this article.

ART. 4. It is likewise agreed that the western boundary of the United States, which separates them from the Spanish colony of Louisiana, is in the middle of the channel or bed of the river Mississippi, from the northern boundary of the United States to the mouth of the Red River of the Mississippi. And His Catholic Majesty has likewise agreed that the navigation of the said river, in its whole breadth, from its source to the ocean, shall be free only to his subjects and the citizens of the United States, unless he should extend this privilege to the subjects of other Powers by special convention.

ART. 5. The two high contracting parties shall, by all the means in their power, maintain peace and harmony among the several Indian nations who inhabit the country adjacent to the lines and rivers which, by the preceding articles, form the boundaries of the two Floridas. And the better to obtain this effect, both parties obligate themselves expressly to restrain by force all hostilities on the part of the Indian nations living within their boundary; so that Spain shall not suffer any of her citizens, agents, or officers, to attack the citizens of the United States, nor the Indians inhabiting their territories to attack either the citizens of the United States or their officers, nor will the United States permit any of their citizens, agents, or officers, to attack the Indian nations; and His Catholic Majesty, or his Indians, in any manner whatever. And whereas several treaties of friendship exist between the two contracting parties and the said nations of Indians, it is hereby agreed that, in future, no treaty of commerce, alliance, or alliance, which may be made between them, shall be admissible against the said nations of Indians, and in their treaties at law in which they may be concerned before the tribunals of the other party, and such agents shall have free access to the proceedings in such causes, and at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials.

ART. 6. Each party shall endeavor, by all means in their power, to protect and defend all vessels and other effects belonging to the citizens or subjects of the other, which shall be within the extent of their jurisdiction, by sea or by land, and shall use all their efforts to recover, and cause to be restored to the right owners, their vessels and effects, which may be taken or taken possession of, of their said jurisdiction, whether they are at war or not; and the Power whose subjects have taken possession of the said effects.

ART. 7. And it is agreed that the subjects or citizens of each of the contracting parties, their vessels or effects, shall not be liable to any embargo or detention on the part of the other, for any military expedition, or other public or private purpose whatever. And in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest, for debts contracted, or offences committed, the laws and proceedings of the country, in which the persons or vessels are detained, shall govern; and provided they be treated with the utmost humanity and kindness, in all respects, and no longer detained than for the purpose for which they were detained, and so as not to be an obstacle to the navigation of the same. And the said officers and agents of either party, having charge of the subjects or citizens of both parties shall be allowed to employ such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors, as they shall think proper in all cases; and in all their trials at law in which they may be concerned before the tribunals of the other party, and such agents shall have free access to the proceedings in such causes, and at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials.

ART. 8. In case the subjects and inhabitants of either party, with their shipping, whether public and of war, or private and of merchants, be forced, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, or any other urgent necessity, for seeking of shelter, to enter into the ports, roads, or harbors, belonging to the other party, they shall be received and treated with all humanity, and enjoy all favors, protection, and help; and they shall be permitted to refresh and provide themselves, at reasonable rates, with victuals, and all things necessary for the accomplishment of their purposes, or separation of their ships and prosecution of their voyage; and they shall no ways be hindered from returning to their own ports or roads, and when they please, without any let or hindrance.

ART. 9. All ships and merchandise of what nature soever, which shall be rescued out of the hands of any pirates or robbers, on any high seas, shall be brought into some port of either State, and shall be delivered to the custody of the officers of that State, in order that they may be restored entire to the true proprietors, as soon as due and sufficient proof shall be made concerning the property thereof.

ART. 10. When any vessel of either party shall be wrecked, foundered, or otherwise damaged, on the coasts, or within the dominion of the other, their respective subjects or citizens shall receive, as well for themselves, as for their vessels and effects, the same assistance, as if they were due to the inhabitants of the country where the damage happened, and shall pay the same charges and duties only as shall be imposed by the said inhabitants of the country where the damage happened; and if the operations of repair would require that the whole or any part of the cargo be unloaded, they shall pay no duties, charges, or fees, on the part which they shall refuse and carry away.

ART. 11. The citizens and subjects of each party shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, and they shall have the same freedom granted to the citizens and subjects or citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament, or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves, or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying the usual duties of the country wherein the said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases.

And in case of the absence of the representative, such care shall be taken of the said goods as would be taken of the goods of a native in like case, until the lawful owner may take measures for receiving them. And if question shall arise among several claimants to which of them the said goods belong, the same shall be decided finally by the laws and judges of the land wherein the said goods are. And where, on the death of any person holding real estate within the territories of the one party, such real estate being worth ten thousand dollars, or more, is desired, or claimed by any citizen or subject of the said United States, or of any alien, such subject shall be allowed a reasonable time for answering to the demand, or for the production of such evidence as shall be necessary to determine the question of whether the said goods are or are not the property of those of whom the said certificates express, as well upon the high seas, as in the ports and havens, not only by the parties, but likewise by other persons expressly showing that her goods are not of the number of those whom said certificates name as contraband.

Art. 12. The merchant ships of either of the parties which shall be making into a port belonging to the enemy of the other, any valuable cargo or contraband shall be open for inspection, and the master, or captain, of the ship, or any other persons, shall be required to produce certificates, upon the same footing as certificates of any other ship of war, or privateer, to act as privateers against the said United States, or against the citizens, people, or inhabitants, of the said United States, or against the property of any of the inhabitants of any of them, from any Prince or State with which the said United States shall be at war.

No ship or vessel being in the possession or under the command of the said United States, shall, on the same footing, as if she were the property of any of them, from any Prince or State with which the said King shall be at war. And if any person of either nation shall take such commissions or letters of marque, he shall be considered as a pirate.

Art. 15. It shall be lawful for the Master, or other proper officer, of the said United States, to sail with their ships in any of the said States, to use all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandise laden thereon, for any port, to the places of those who now are, or hereafter shall be, at enmity with His Catholic Majesty, or the United States. It shall be likewise lawful for the Master, or other proper officer, of any ship, or vessel, which shall sail, with the same liberty and security, from the places, ports, and havens, of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy aforesaid, to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy, to another place belonging to an enemy, which shall be the case in any case where it is hereby agreed that the said ships shall give freedom to goods, and that every thing shall be deemed free and exempt, which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the subjects of either of the contracting parties, either private or public, to any representatives; and such ships shall be entitled to the same privileges belonging to persons who are on board a free ship, so that, although they be enemies to either party, they shall not be made prisoners or taken out of that free ship, unless they are soldiers, and in actual service of the enemies.

Art. 16. This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandise, excepting those which shall be declared, by the laws of the parties, to be of contraband; and under this name of contraband, or prohibited goods, shall be understood arms, great guns, bombs, with the fuses, and the other things belonging to them, cannon, gunpowder, match, pikes, swords, lances, spears, halberds, mortars, petards, grenades, saltpetre, muskets, musket balls, bucklers, helmets, breastplates, coats of mail, armor, and all other military and warlike instruments whatever. These mercantiles, which shall not be reckoned among contraband or prohibited goods; that is to say, all sorts of cloths, and all manufactures woven of any wool, flax, silk, cotton, or any other materials whatever, all kinds of wearing apparel, together with all species whereof they are used to be made gild and silver as well coined as uncoined, tin, copper, brass, lead, and all other kinds and all other things proper either for building or repairing ships, and all other goods which have not been worked into the form of any instrument prepared for war, by land or by sea, shall not be reckoned contraband, much less such as have been already wrought, or wrought to any other use whatever, or whatsoever all other mercantiles and things which are not comprehended and particularly mentioned in the foregoing enumeration of contraband goods; so that they may be transported and carried in the free manner by the subjects of both parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, such towns or places of war, as may be, at that time being, blocked or invested by the said ships, in consequence of storms or other accidents at sea, be under the necessity of taking the cargo of any trading vessel or vessels, in which case they may stop the said vessel or vessels, and furnish themselves with necessary, giving receipts, in order that the Power to whom the said ship of war belongs, may pay for the articles so taken, in accordance to the price for the goods on board, to those to whom they may appear to have been destined by the aforesaid papers; and the two contracting parties engage that the vessels shall not be detained longer than may be absolutely necessary for their said ships to supply themselves with necessaries; that they will immediately pay the value of the receipts, and indemnify the proprietor for all losses or caprices which may have sustained in consequence of such necessary send and receive, or any contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place wherein the said ship sailed, in the accustomed form; and if any one shall think it fit or advisable to express in the said certificates the person to whom the same belongs, it shall be allowed; but also all other persons and ships belonging to the party of the other contracting party, and adjudged by the competent tribunal, according to what is above set forth, that all the circumstances of this omission having been well examined, they shall be allowed to be legal proofs, unless they shall give legal satisfaction of their property, by testifying an equivalence of the cargo of such ships, or of any other ship, to the same amount, or to the number of two or three men only, to which the master or commander of such ship or vessel shall exhibit his passports concerning the property of the ships brought out according to the form inserted in this present treaty; and the ship, when she shall have showed such passport, shall be free, and at liberty to pursue her voyage, so as it shall not be lawful to molest or give her chase, in any manner, or force her to quit her intended course.

Art. 19. Consuls shall be reciprocally established, with the privileges and powers which those of the most favored nations enjoy in the ports where their consuls reside, or are permitted to be.

Art. 20. It is also agreed that the inhabitants of the territories of each party shall, respectively, have free access to the courts of justice of the other, and they shall be permitted to prosecute suits for the recovery of their properties, the payment of their debts, and for obtaining satisfaction for the damages which they may have sustained, whether the persons whom they may sue be subjects or citizens of the country in which they may be found, or any other persons whatsoever who may have taken refuge therein; and the proceedings and sentences of the said courts shall be the same as if the contending parties had been subjects or citizens of the said country.

Art. 21. In order to terminate all differences, on account of the losses sustained by the citizens of the United States, in consequence of their vessels and cargoes having been taken by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty during the late war between Spain and France, it is agreed that all such cases shall be referred to the final decision of commissioners, to be appointed in the following manner: His Catholic Majesty shall name one commissioner, and the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, shall appoint another; and the two commissioners shall agree on the choice of a third, or, if they cannot agree so, they shall each propose one person, and of the two names so proposed one shall be drawn, by lot, in the presence of the two original commissioners, and the person whose name shall be so drawn shall be the third commissioner; and the three commissioners, so appointed, shall be sworn impartially to examine and decide the claims in question, according to the merits of the several cases, and to justice, equity, and the laws of nations. The said commissioners shall meet and sit at Philadelphia; and in the case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence, of any such commissioner, his place shall be supplied in the same manner as he was first appointed, and the new commissioner shall take the same oaths, and do the same duties. They shall receive all complaints and applications authorized by this article, during eighteen months from the day on which they shall assemble. They shall have power to examine all such persons as come before them, on oath or affirmation, touching the complaints in question, and also to receive in evidence all written testimony, authenticated in such manner as they shall think proper to require or admit. The award of the said commissioners, or any two of them, shall be final and conclusive, both as to the justice of the claim and the amount of the sum to be paid to the claimants; and His Catholic Majesty undertakes to cause the same to be paid in specie, without deduction, at such times and places, and under such conditions, as shall be awarded by the said commissioners.

Art. 22. The two high contracting parties, hoping that the good correspondence and friendship which happily reigns between them, will be further increased by this treaty, and that it will contribute to augment their prosperity and opulence, will in future give to their mutual commerce all the extension and favor which the advantages of both countries may require.

And in consequence of the stipulations contained in the fourth article, His Catholic Majesty will permit the citizens of the United States, for the space of three years from this time, to deposit their merchandises and effects in the port of New Orleans, and to export them from thence, without paying any other duty than a fair price for the hire of the stores; and His Majesty promises, either to continue this permission, if he finds, during that time, that it is not prejudicial to the interests of Spain, or, if he should not agree to continue it there, he will assign to them, on another part of the banks of the Mississippi, an equivalent establishment.

Art. 23. The present treaty shall not be in force until ratified by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the undersigned plenipotentiaries of His Catholic Majesty and of the United States of America, have signed this present treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, and have thereunto affixed our seals, respectively.

Done at San Lorenzo el Real, this seven and twentieth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

ALGIERS.

REPORTED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 29, 1796.

The committee to whom was referred the President's communication of the 15th instant, report:

That the expense of procuring and transporting to Algiers the naval and military stores included in the douceur for peace, will probably amount to about one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, making the whole douceur and the ransom of the prisoners about seven hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars; and that, besides the stipulated annuity of twelve thousand sequins, the custom of Algiers will render necessary a present, biennially, of nine or ten thousand dollars, and upon the appointment of a consul, a present of twenty thousand dollars.

That, of the money included in the douceur for peace, sixty thousand dollars were paid at the time of signing the treaty, and the residue was expected to be paid soon, and when the prisoners should be released, and has probably been paid. And,

That, in the opinion of the committee, it will be expedient for the Senate to advise and consent to a ratification of the treaty.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 25, 1796.

United States, March 25, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I send herewith, for your information, the translation of a letter from the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic to the Secretary of State, announcing the peace made by the republic with the Kings of Prussia and Spain, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel; and that the republican constitution decreed by the National Convention had been accepted by the people of France, and was in operation. I also send you a copy of the answer given, by my direction, to this communication from the French minister. My sentiments therein expressed I am persuaded will harmonize with yours, and with those of all my fellow-citizens.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic to Mr. Pickering.

PHILADELPHIA, the 1st Ventose, (11th of March, 1796, O. S.)

Sir: The Committee of Public Safety, by their last despatches, charged me to announce to you that peace had been made between the French republic and the Kings of Prussia and of Spain, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel.

With very great satisfaction I acquit myself of the duty enjoined on me by the committee. I am persuaded, sir, that the Government of the United States will participate in it and that, since the French people are combating for liberty, it cannot observe their successes with an eye of indifference.

I embrace this opportunity of announcing to you, that the republican constitution decreed by the National Convention, has been accepted by the French people, and that the constitutional government is in operation.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my esteem,

P. A. ADET.

Mr. Pickering to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 14th, 1796.

Sir: I have laid before the President of the United States the letter with which you honored me on the 11th instant, and I am directed to assure you of the high and sincere satisfaction he derives from the information you were charged by the Committee of Public Safety to communicate, that peace had been made between the French republic and the Kings of Prussia and Spain, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel.

With equal satisfaction the President receives the further information which you have been pleased to give, that the republican constitution decreed by the National Convention has been accepted by the French people, and that the constitutional government is in operation.

With great respect, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

BRITISH TREATY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 30, 1796.

United States, March 30, 1796.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

With the utmost attention I have considered your resolution* of the twenty-fourth instant, requesting me to lay before your House a copy of the instructions to the minister of the United States who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to that treaty, excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed.

In deliberating upon this subject, it was impossible for me to lose sight of the principle, which some have avowed in its discussion, or to avoid extending my views to the consequences which must flow from the admission of that principle.

I trust that no part of my conduct has ever indicated a disposition to withhold any information which the constitution has enjoined upon the President as a duty to give, or which could be required of him by either House of Congress, as a right and with truth I affirm, that it has been, as it will continue to be, while I have the honor to

* Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of the instructions to the minister of the United States who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain, (communicated by his message of the first instant) together with the correspondence and other documents relative to the said treaty; excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed.
preside in the Government, my constant endeavor to harmonize with the other branches thereof, so far as the trust delegated to me by the People of the United States and my sense of the obligation it imposes to "preserve, protect, and defend, the constitution," will permit.

The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion, the disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions, which may have been proposed or contemplated, would be extremely improper: for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences; perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other Powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate; the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members. To admit then a right in the House of Representatives to demand, and to have, as a matter of course, all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign Power, would be to establish a dangerous precedent.

It does not occur that the inspection of the papers asked for can be relative to any purpose under the cognizance of the House of Representatives, except that of an impeachment; which the resolution has not expressed. I repeat that I have no disposition to withhold any information which the duty of my station will permit, or the public good shall require to be disclosed; and, in fact, all the papers affecting the negotiation with Great Britain were laid before the Senate, when the treaty itself was communicated for their consideration and advice.

The course which the debate has taken, on the resolution of the House, leads to some observations on the mode of making treaties under the constitution of the United States.

Having been a member of the General Convention, and knowing the principles on which the constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion of this subject; and, from the establishment of the Government, to this moment, my conduct has exemplified that opinion, that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made, and promulgated, thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations; and in all the treaties made with them, we have declared, and they have believed, that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the constitution, every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced; and, until the present time, not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced: for, till now, without controversy the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

There is also reason to believe that this construction agrees with the opinions entertained by the State conventions, when they were deliberating on the constitution, especially by those who objected to it; because there was not required, in commercial treaties, the consent of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate, but of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting; in treaties respecting territorial and certain other rights, and claims, the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses, respectively, was not made necessary.

It is a fact, declared by the General Convention, and universally understood, that the constitution of the United States was the result of a spirit of amity and mutual concession. And it is well known that, under this influence, the smaller States were admitted to an equal representation in the Senate, with the larger States, and that this branch of the Government was invested with great powers; for, on the equal participation of those powers, the sovereignty and political safety of the smaller States were deemed essentially to depend. If other proofs than these, and the plain letter of the constitution itself, be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the journals of the General Convention, which we have deposited in the office of the Department of State. In those journals it will appear that a proposition was made, "that no treaty should be binding on the United States which was not ratified by a law," and that the proposition was explicitly rejected.

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty; as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and that the power to make treaties and the execution of the Constitution of the United States, that the boundaries fixed by the constitution, between the different departments, should be preserved; a just regard to the constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request.

G. WASHINGTON.
GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all whom it may concern, greeting:

It has been represented to me that certain tribes of Indians, called the Miamies, in the United States, have obtained from His Majesty plenipotentiaries, and, in consequence, shall be delivered up by the Indians to a superintendent appointed by the Government of the United States, to be dealt with according to the laws of the United States; whereas the third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between His Majesty and the United States, expressly provides, "that it shall, at all times, be free to His Majesty's subjects and to the citizens of the United States, and also to the Indians dwelling on either side of the boundary line, freely to pass and repass, by land or inland navigation, into the respective territories and countries of the two parties on the continent of America, (the country within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted) and to navigate all the lakes, rivers, and watercourses, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other."

It has been represented to me that the King's Majesty having persuade[d] that the said Indian treaty was concluded in consequence of instructions given by the Government of the United States at a time when that Government had not yet been apprised of the terms and stipulations of the treaty entered into by the respective plenipotentiaries, at London, on the 19th of November, 1794. Even if any doubts could arise, such a situation renders them peculiarly liable to such impressions, His Majesty trusts, therefore, that the Government of the United States will readily agree in the propriety of an explanation, which, under the circumstances above stated, appears to be of such indispensable necessity; and the undersigned is directed to propose, on His Majesty's part, that an article should, for that purpose, be added to the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, and of the United States, so as to form a part thereof, conformably to the provisions contained in the 29th article of that instrument, by which it shall be declared that no treaty, subsequently concluded by either party with any other State or nation, whether European or Indian, can be understood, in any manner, to derogate from the rights of free intercourse and commerce secured by the said treaty. It is, therefore, directed, that the undersigned, on behalf of His Majesty and to the citizens of the United States, and to the Indians on both sides of the boundary line; but that all the said persons shall remain at full liberty freely to pass and repass into the countries on either side of the said boundary line, and to carry on trade and commerce with each other, and the undersigned is instructed and authorized to arrange the terms of such article, with any person who may be appointed by the Government of the United States. And to propose, and to sign the said article, as the said treaty, declaring to be permanent.

If this measure, which appears to His Majesty conducive to the principles of justice and good faith, and indispensable for the circumstances of the case, should meet the approbation of the Government of the United States, the undersigned is instructed and authorized to arrange the terms of such article, with any person who may be appointed by the Government of the United States, to ratify the said article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation; and the undersigned is instructed to propose, on His Majesty's part, that an article should be added to the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, signed at London on the 19th of November, 1794. And it being the sincere desire of the United States, as well as of His Britannic Majesty, to prevent the inconvenience which may arise from the uncertainty of the limits of the said treaty, it is deemed it expedient to declare their understanding thereof, by an explanatory article: Now, be it known, that, pursuant to the laws of the United States, I have intrusted, and do hereby intrust, and give full power to, Timothy Pickering, Esq., a commissioner appointed by the United States, to agree with His Britannic Majesty, on an article explanatory of the understanding with the said article, subject to the ratification of the King his master: his Majesty being always desirous to take the earliest and most effectual means of removing any cause of uneasiness between the two Governments, and to maintain with the United States the most uninterrupted harmony and good understanding.

G. WASHINGTON.

EXPLANATORY ARTICLE.

Whereas, by the third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London, on the nineteenth day of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, it was agreed that it should at all times be free to His Majesty's subjects, and to the citizens of the United States, and also to the Indians dwelling on either side of the boundary line, assigned by the treaty of peace to the United States, freely to pass and repass by land or inland navigation, into the respective territories and countries of the two contracting parties, on the continent of America, (the country within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted) and to navigate all the lakes, rivers, and watercourses, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other; I have appointed a commissioner named the part of His Britannic Majesty, on an article explanatory of the understanding with the said article, subject to the ratification of the two parties on the subject of the two articles aforesaid; such explanatory article, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications mutually exchanged, to be added to, and constitute a permanent part of, the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto attached.

G. WASHINGTON.
and Southern States of America, (and now His Majesty’s chargé des affaires to the United States) and the President of the United States having named, for their commissioner, Timothy Pickering, Esq. Secretary of State of the United States, to whom, according to the laws of his country, he has intrusted this negotiation, they, the said commissioners, having communicated to each other their full powers, have, in virtue of the same, and conformably with the last article of the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, entered into this explanatory article, and do, by these presents, explicitly agree and declare, that no stipulations in any treaty subsequently concluded by either of the contracting parties, with any other State or nation, or with any Indian tribe, can be understood to derogate, in any manner, from the rights of free intercourse and commerce secured by the aforesaid third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, to the subjects of His Majesty, and to the citizens of the United States, and to the Indians dwelling on either side of the boundary line aforesaid; but that all the said persons shall remain at full liberty freely to pass and repass, by land, or in land navigation, into the respective territories and countries of the contracting parties, on either side of the said boundary line, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other, according to the stipulations of the said third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation.

This explanatory article, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be added to, and make a part of, the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, and shall be permanently binding upon His Majesty and the United States.

In witness whereof, we, the said commissioners of His Majesty the King of Great Britain and the United States of America, have signed this present explanatory article, and thereto affixed our seals.

Done at Philadelphia, this fourth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six.

4th Congress, 2d Session.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 9, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

Herewith I lay before you, in confidence, reports from theDepartments of State and the Treasury, by which you will see the present situation of our affairs with the Dew and regency of Algiers.

UNITED STATES, January 9, 1797.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Secretary of State respectfully makes the following brief representation of the affairs of the United States in relation to Algiers.

When Colonel Humphreys left America, in April, 1795, he was accompanied by Joseph Donaldson, Esq. who had been appointed consul for Tunis and Tripoli, and him Colonel Humphreys was authorized to employ, in negotiating a treaty with Algiers, while he should proceed himself to France, for the purpose of obtaining the co-operation of that Government in this negotiation.

They arrived at Gibraltar the 17th of May. Colonel Humphreys concluded that it was expedient for Mr. Donal- don to go first to Alicante, rather than Algiers, in order to be near at hand to ascertain facts and profit of occasions. He gave him instructions accordingly; and having also instructed Mr. Simpson, our consul at Gibraltar, to renew our peace with the Emperor of Morocco, Colonel Humphreys sailed from Gibraltar the 24th of May, and arrived at Havre de Grace the 30th of June, from whence he set off immediately for Paris. The object of his mission was communicated by our minister, Colonel Monroe, to the committee of public safety. On the 21st of July, he had received only a verbal answer, that the French Government was disposed to interest itself, and to do every thing in its power to promote the accomplishment of our wishes on the subject in question. On the 8th, assurances were received that immediate measures should be taken for giving particular instructions to the agents of the republic to use its influence in co-operation with us. The multiplicity of affairs with which the officers of the Government were occupied, and the getting from London a sum of money necessary to purchase the usual peace presents, prevented a conclusion of the arrangements at Paris until September. It had been judged expedient by Colonel Humphreys and Colonel Monroe, that Joel Barlow, Esq. should be employed in the negotiations with the Barbary States and his consent had been obtained. By the 11th of September, all the writings on the part of Colonel Humphreys were prepared for Mr. Barlow, to proceed with the instructions and powers from the Government of the French republic, to its agents in Barbary, in lieu of our negotiations.

Colonel Humphreys left Paris the 12th of September, and reached Havre the 14th, where he found the master and mate of the United States’ brig Sophia both sick with fevers. While waiting there, impatiently, for their recovery, he received intelligence from our consul at Marseilles, that Mr. Donaldson had concluded a treaty of peace with the present immediate given, by a loan from Mr. Barri, the Dew’s broker. Mr. Donaldson, knowing that funds had been lodged in London, to answer his stipulations, engaged to make the payments in three or four months.

Colonel Humphreys had received advice, under date of the 30th of July, from the Messrs. Barings, in London, to whom the funds had been remitted, that, having made progress in the sales of the United States’ stock, they should hold, at his disposal, the whole of the value of eight hundred thousand dollars, meaning to furnish, by anticipation, the value of that part which remained unsold, if the service of the United States required it. Colonel Humphreys counting on the money as always ready after this period, sent Captain O’Brien from Lisbon to London, in the brig
Sophia, to receive it. Owing to contrary winds, she did not leave Lisbon till the 24th of December. The other details, relative to the pecuniary transactions, appear in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The disappointments in the pecuniary negotiations put the treaty in jeopardy. The Dey became impatient, and threatened to abandon it; and it was with extreme difficulty that it was prevented. Mr. Barlow returned to Algiers and opened negotiations with the Dey at this period; but on the 15th of February, 1796, he was compelled to conclude with the Dey the treaty mentioned in the letter of July last, for the delivery of slaves, and for the payment of the stipulated sums.

On the 3d of that month the Dey declared what should be his final determination; that, in eight days, Mr. Barlow and Mr. Donaldson should leave Algiers; and if, in thirty days after, the money was not paid, the treaty should be at an end, and his cruisers should bring in American vessels, the Dey would no longer consider the United States as having the last hope of finding a treaty with the Sultan. This was sent of a frigate. This fortunately succeeded. For the particulars of this transaction, the Secretary begs leave to refer the President to the enclosed letter from Messrs. Barlow and Donaldson.

Colonel Humphreys not deeming himself authorized to confirm this promise of a frigate, referred the matter to the Executive of the United States; and, for this end, dispatched Captain Humphreys, brig Sophia, to Algiers. There was, evidently, no alternative; and the promise was confirmed. The frigate is now building in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and is expected to be finished in the spring. Captain O'Brien returned to Lisbon, where he arrived on the 9th of February, 1796. TheDey had advanced forty thousand dollars and twenty-five thousand pounds. This sum was embarked on board the Sophia and, on the 4th of August, Captain O'Brien set sail for Algiers. He has not since been heard of, and there is room to fear that some misfortune has befallen him. The money was insured, at a small premium for the dangers of the seas. Against all risks, they declared, unless you a premium as Colonel Humphreys judged it inexpedient to give, seeing the Sophia was a vessel of the United States, having a special passport from the President, as well as a passport, in the Turkish language, under the seal of the Dey of Algiers.

Such arrangements have been made by Mr. Barlow and Mr. Donaldson, with the house of the Messrs. Bacri, at Algiers, of which the Secretary has been duly informed, to ensure the payment of the four hundred thousand dollars, originally expected of the latter place; and the same house have become engaged to the Dey and regency for the residue of the money due as the price of peace, without which he would not agree to the redemption of the captives. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates these further sums to be provided:

To fulfill the terms of the treaty—

For two years' annuities to the Dey, $555,759
For which to be added the 10,000 sequins promised by Mr. Barlow and Mr. Donaldson, to Mr. Bacri, mentioned in their letter, 98,345
And for the expenses of the captives performing quarantine at Marseilles, and transporting them to America, estimated by the consul at Marseilles, at about 6,500

$378,600

On the 31st ultimo I received a letter from Mr. Barlow, dated the 12th of July, informing the agent, a Mr. Famin, at Tunis, who had been recommended to him by the French consul, Herculius, had concluded with the Dey of that regency a truce for six months from 15th day of June last, and this without any present.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

To the President of the United States.

AGLIERS, April 5th, 1796.

Sir:—
After finishing our dispatches on the 3d instant, to send by the courier to Tangier, we found that the port was to be opened immediately. We therefore gave up that mode of conveyance for a more direct and speedy one by way of Algiers. Very many have now what we hope will be more agreeable news to announce to you. For two days past, we have been witnesses to a scene of as complete and poignant distress as can be imagined, arising from the state of total despair in which our captives found themselves involved, and we without the power of administering the least comfort or relief which was mentioned which we, of sending us away, had been reiterated with every mark of a fixed and final decision. And the Dey went so far as to declare that, after the thirty days, if the money did not come, he never would be at peace with the Americans.

Bacri, the Jew, who has as much art in this sort of management as any man we ever knew, who has more influence with the Dey, and who all the regency are likely to consult, is mentioned as the subject for three months past, now seemed unable to make the least impression. And the Dey finally forbade him, under the highest displeasure, to speak to him any more about the Americans. His cruisers are now out, and for some days past he has been occupied with his new war against the Danes. Three days ago the Danish prizes began to come in, and it was thought that this circumstance might put him in good humor; so that the Jews might find a chance of renewing our subject in some shape or other. And we instructed the Jew, that if he could engage him in conversation on his cruisers and prizes, he might offer him a new American built ship of twenty guns, which should sail very fast, to be presented to his daughter, on condition that he would wait six months longer for his money. The Jew observed that he had better say a ship of twenty-four guns, to which we agreed. After seeing him three or four times yesterday, under pretenses of other business, without being able to touch upon this, he went this morning and succeeded. The novelty of the proposition gained the Dey's attention for a moment, and he consented to listen to us on the subject. But he told the Jew that it must be a ship of thirty-six guns, or he would not listen to the proposition. We were convinced that we ought not to hesitate a moment. We accordingly went and consented to his demand, and he has agreed to let every thing remain as it is for the term of three months from this day. But desired us to remember that not a single day beyond that will be allowed on any account.

We consider the business as now settled on this footing, and it is the best ground we could possibly place it upon. You still have it in your power to say peace or no peace; you have an alternative; in the other case you had none, but war was inevitable; and there would have been no hope of peace during the reign of this Dey.

The guns are to be eight pounders, (English nines,) twenty-four on the main deck, eight on the quarter deck, and four on the forecastle. The twelve last may be smaller. She ought to be built in long proportion, and formed for sailing fast, a circumstance particularly pleasing here. We think such a vessel fitted for sea may be delivered in America for forty-five thousand dollars. Then, as by the terms of the treaty we have to deliver a quantity of long sea timber, its value would be more than compensated on Board to transport a cargo of them to this place. And in this way a saving may be made of about ten thousand dollars in freight.

In order to save the treaty thus far, which has been the subject of infinite anxiety and vexation, we found it necessary, some time ago, to make an offer to the Jew, of being paid over five thousand dollars if he succeeded, and to be distributed by him, at his discretion, among such great officers of state as he thought necessary, and as much of it to be kept for himself as he could keep, consistent with success. The whole of this new arrangement will cost the United States about fifty-three thousand dollars. We expect to incur blame, because it is impossible to give you a complete view of the circumstances; but we are perfectly confident of having acted right.

With regard to the transfer of the funds to this place, we believe it can be done with the least difficulty through Leghorn: that is, to draw from that place on London, Madrid, or Lisbon, as shall be most advantageous, perhaps at all, sending the ship a part in specie from Lisbon, which we believe would be the preferable mode for such a sum as you can ship.
Mr. Donaldson sails to-morrow for Leghorn, there to wait your orders on this head. There is no time to be lost. You will be pleased to instruct him as soon as possible, and let our measures, from this time forward, be effectual. We are obliged to incur a considerable expense to get this letter to Alicante. We hope it will reach you soon.

We remain, sir, &c.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 4, 1797.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to directions from the President of the United States, respectfully makes the following representation respecting the application of the fund destined for the execution of the treaty with Algiers.

In pursuance of an act passed on the 31st day of February, 1795, the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars was borrowed of the Bank of the United States, which was paid in six per cent. stock. A conviction of the urgency of the case, and a disposition to accommodate the Government, alone induced the Bank to consent to the loan, as the stock was then salable in large quantities at par, including interest. Bills of exchange were not readily obtainable, and the sudden exportation of so considerable a sum of specie would have been attended with inconvenient effects. Indeed, no alternative offered but to renounce the negotiation, or to remit stock as a fund.

Various causes operated to produce a depression of the prices of all kinds of public stock, soon after the remittances had been made. The rates at which sales have been effected are as follows:

<td>$800,000 in stock, will therefore produce, in sterling money,</td>
<td>154253 15 00 or 985,572 29</td>

</table>

Of the sum of $305,911 57, appropriated for treaties with Mediterranean Powers, by the act of May 31, 1796, there was estimated for a deficiency on account of the treaty with Algiers, the sum of 51132 00.

The whole of the grants for the Algerine treaty may therefore be considered as equal to an effective fund in London of 736,704 22.

The expenses of carrying the treaty into effect are estimated as follows:

The naval stores, stipulated by Mr. Donaldson, were estimated at $857,000, but which, agreeably to his enumeration of the articles, will cost, agreeably to the estimate of the purveyor, marked A, 108,415 00. The freight of the said stores is computed at 5,000 00. The expense of the frigate lately promised, agreeably to the estimate of the Secretary of War, here-with transmitted, marked B, will be 99,727 00.

The whole expense of fulfilling the treaty, according to this estimate, therefore, is 992,163 25.

From which the sum effective of the values of the provisions already made, being deducted, as before estimated, 736,704 22.

There will remain to be provided, 255,759 03.

The annexed paper, marked C, is a copy of a representation from Messrs. Barings and Company to the minister of the United States in London, dated August 9th, 1796, the accuracy of which is confirmed by the correspondence therein referred to. There is, therefore, no room to doubt that the delays, and consequent accumulation of expenses, are to be attributed solely to the extraordinary events of the war in Europe, and to other causes over which the Government of the United States have had no control.

By the last article of the treaty, the United States are bound to pay an annuity of twelve thousand Algerine sequins in maritime stores. The cost and freight of the articles required by the Dey for the first two years' annuity will, agreeably to the purveyor's estimate, marked D, be 184,216 63.

For which the appropriation made by the act of May 6, 1796, for two years, being deducted, 48,000 00.

There will remain to be provided on this account, the sum of 96,216 63.

All which is respectfully submitted by

OLIVER WOLCOTT, Secretary of the Treasury.

JAMES M’HENRY.

C.

In the execution of the business with which Baring and Co. have been entrusted, they have communicated to Mr. Pinckney, from time to time, every material circumstance which has occurred; but, as the present position is extremely critical and important, they will endeavor to state as concisely as possible, from the commence ment of the business, for the consideration and determination of Mr. King.

March 7, 1795. The President of the Bank remit to Baring and Co. eight hundred thousand dollars in certificates of the six per cent. stock, with orders to sell the same, without causing a depression in the prices, and thus injuring the credit of American funds. The nett proceeds, after deducting the usual commissions, are to be held at the disposal of Colonel David Humphreys. And we are directed to inform Colonel Humphreys of the progress we may make, from time to time, in the sales of the stock, and also of the terms upon which remittances can be made to Cadiz or Leghorn.

This contains nearly the whole of our orders, or at least the whole of what we conceive to be necessary for the information of Mr. King in the present moment; the further letters from America being almost wholly answers to our numerous letters, and do not contain a syllable of disapprobation with regard to our conduct, but the reverse.

March 31, 1795. Colonel Humphreys writes from Philadelphia that we would furnish him with information, assistance, &c. directed to him at Lisbon.

April 38. We wrote very fully to Colonel Humphreys, containing every information relative to the probable sale of the stock, and the various means by which he could execute his commission through London, Lisbon, Cadiz, and Italy, in general.

May 19. We wrote still more fully in answer to his letter of the 31st of March; wherein we offered to anticipate a considerable sum on the value of the effects in our hands, for which there was no demand at the moment. We explained to him the value of the Italian coins, those of Spain being well known—mentioning that it was easier to procure money at Leghorn, where there was no restraint, than at Cadiz, where dollars where more plentiful, but the exportation was exclusively in the bank of St. Charles, from whom it was difficult to obtain permission; that we would procure any quantity in London; to which we added the names of our correspondents at the different places, offering every service in our power, direct or indirect.

May 18. Colonel Humphreys advises of his arrival at Gibraltar.

July 21. We advise Colonel Humphreys that we had sold three hundred thousand dollars; that we were ready to pay one hundred thousand pounds to his order; and if he wanted a further sum, we desired to be informed.

July 27. Colonel Humphreys directs us to pay forty thousand dollars to Mr. Deas for Mr. Andrews, which was immediately complied with by a credit on Hamburg for that value.

We informed Colonel Humphreys that, having made further progress in our sales, we should hold the whole of the value of eight hundred thousand dollars at his disposal, meaning to furnish, by anticipation, the value of that part which remained at that time unsold, if the service of the United States required it.

November 29 is the next letter from Colonel Humphreys, and the commencement of our difficulties. He informs us that he should send the Sophia, for the purpose of receiving Portugal gold and Spanish dollars in London, to the amount of six hundred and fifty thousand Spanish dollars. He further opens credits in favor of Messrs. Dohrman, of Lisbon, which were punctually paid; and he desires remittances on Lisbon, which, from the scarcity of paper at the time, was effectuated to a very trifling amount.
This letter was followed and confirmed by others from Colonel Humphreys, dated the 16th, 22d, and 24th of December, of a similar tenor, or very nearly so, and the arrival of the brig Sophla, from Lisbon.

Although Colonel Humphreys has not mentioned to us the reasons for this proceeding, we may compute it to the advice contained in one of the letters of Captain Crandon, by which he advertised the probable period of the coming of the Spanish vessels, and the probability that the Spanish dollars of which a sum of that description could be procured in London of Spanish dollars, having ourselves never experienced the least difficulty in disappointment for large sums.

December 22. We answered these letters, advising Colonel Humphreys of the impossibility to procure Portuguese dollars, which had been received for many years; of the extraordinary turn which had appeared with regard to bullion, in consequence of the immense drains upon the country for carrying on the war, and which has finally compelled the minister to abandon his favorite project of a second loan to the emperor. But as the difficulty had only appeared to appear, we hoped that, with some delay, we should be able to collect the dollars, for the purpose of executing the orders of Colonel Humphreys.

January 17, 1798. Finding it impossible to procure gold, and no silver arriving, we submitted the whole of the orders and correspondence to Mr. Pinckney, when it was determined to purchase such silver or Spanish dollars as should arrive, but it could not be known whether the wind or the weather would prevent the arrival of these dollars, or that we should be able to collect the dollars, for the purpose of executing the orders of Colonel Humphreys.

In the mean while, we wrote to Messrs. Parish and Co., of Hamburg, to know whether Portuguese gold or Spanish dollars could be obtained in that place.

Jan. 19, 20—Feb. 2, 12, 1798, are letters wrote to Colonel Humphreys; wherein we acquainted him with our prospects; and from time to time, gave him an account of sums given in exchange for dollars, and that no silver had arrived in London.

February 18. Having determined with the approbation of Mr. Pinckney, to send the Sophia to Hamburg, in consequence of the encouragement of Messrs. Parish and Co., on applying to Captain Crandon, he observed that it was contrary to his instructions, which were to return to Lisbon; and as considerable doubts existed about proceeding to Hamburg, Mr. Pinckney declined giving a positive order to Captain Crandon, which proved fortunate, as, immediately after, advice was received from Messrs. Parish and Co., that the dollars they had in view had been purchased, most probably for account of the British Government.

On this occasion, and under this date, we wrote to Colonel Humphreys, by the brig Sophla, and by the packet, acquainting him with our disappointment in toto, which we accompanied, at the intimation of Mr. O'Brien, with letters of credit on Madrid and Cadiz. And, in order to finish this part of the subject, as it was necessary for the Sophia to return, we observed that, had it been delayed for a few months, we could not have procured one half of the quantity of the Spanish dollars required.

March 1. We advised Colonel Humphreys that we had received a large sum in bills drawn on Leghorn on the British Government, being for money sent to Algiers, and which appeared afterwards to be for the release of the Corsican prisoners.

March 28, 29, are answers to letters from Colonel Humphreys, relative to our accounts chiefly, dated 17th of February and 9th of March, which we do not notice, concluding that he was satisfied, as nothing appears in reply to us but, as there was reason to fear the dispatch of the Spanish dollars would not be executed in Spain, the Government there refusing a licence, notwithstanding the endeavours of Messrs. Jeyes and Sons, aided by the American minister or resident.

April 1, we wrote to Messrs. Fonnerneau, of Leghorn, not only to open the necessary credit, but to explain to them, in a full and confidential manner, the nature and extent of our preceding disappointments, requesting (with the approbation of Mr. Pinckney and Colonel Humphreys) that they would convey to Algiers (through the medium of Bacri, who is brother to the person employed and trusted at Algiers by the Day for all his transactions with Europeans) such information as should satisfy the Day that the delay in paying the money did not arise from the want of funds, credit, or endeavors, on the part of the United States, but must be solely attributed to the political difficulties of the day, and to the usual channels or mode of transmitting the coins for the purpose.

It is unnecessary to quote dates of letters, as there appears but one opinion on the subject, namely, "that the business must finally be done at Leghorn, and both Mr. Pinckney and Colonel Humphreys recommend most earnestly that the information alluded to should be conveyed to Algiers." Since 2d April, we have written several letters to Messrs. Fonnerneau, over our letter of the 1st, promising to follow the orders of Colonel Humphreys; and that Bacri would communicate to Algiers every thing we had desired.

June 17. (Messrs.) Fonnerneau advise the delivery to them, on that day, of the orders from Colonel Humphreys to pay to the order of Mr. Donaldson four hundred thousand Spanish milled dollars, which they acquaint him shall be immediately complied with.

June 19. Mr. Donaldson acquaints Messrs. Fonnerneau that he should accept the sum and, on a meeting between them and Bacri, the price of the dollars, with that of the agio, was settled, to the satisfaction of Bacri.

July 15. Mr. Donaldson agrees with Bacri, with whom he had been remaining two hundred and sixty thousand dollars, which Bacri offered to negotiate to him, and to give him a receipt for the whole four hundred thousand dollars, which he engaged to ship for Algiers; but a certain difficulty on his side would not permit him to sign receipts to us for more than he had absolutely received in cash.

July 16. The French entered Leghorn, and Fonnerneau embarked on board an English frigate.

July 18. We have not heard from Algiers, or through the usual channels, or mode of transmitting the coins for the purpose.

Bacri, under the same inquires, about Mr. Donaldson's credit on us, and whether we have orders for more than $400,000.

This question leads to a state of the account, with an estimate of the effects in our hands. Of the original sum sent to us, we have only sold $600,000, the price having fallen at one time so low as 89; and believing that Government would feel reluctant to sell under 90, we had determined to anticipate on the value of the remainder, waiting for our reimbursement in due time.

The $600,000 above have produced
$611,053

Some have sold above 90 per cent. and none below that price, which leaves about 3s. 11d. per dollar. The present price is 86, with little demand. Suppose the remaining $240,000 produced
3d. 9d. per dollar, the amount will be
45,000

Total amount of sales and effects,
$156,053

The great defalcation in the nominal dollars arises from the remittances being made in funds, which sell at 10 per cent. under par, and the payment being made in foreign money, at a rate very much above par; that of Leghorn, in particular, has advanced 16-18 per cent. above what it was, not a long while since.

Our payments are as follows:

Ditto of sales and effects,

The sum of £3,497, paid by us for dividends, will be received again by us from America, and of course appear, ultimately, to the credit of the United States.

Under all the circumstances which have been stated, it is submitted to Mr. King what ought to be done in the present moment?

Mr. Fonnerneau says, that reliance may be had on Bacri having conveyed to Algiers the information requested; and, moreover, that it will be thoroughly satisfactory at that place. Bacri is a wealthy man, and willing to do a friendly action; that he is much trusted by the French, and that the banker of Fonnerneau is also banker to the French.

On the other hand, the sum to be drawn is more than sufficient to enable Bacri to fix the course of exchange for many weeks, and also the agio, for a considerable time. This idea may be carried still further: for, in the present situation of Leghorn, there is, in fact, no exchange, and the drafts of Mr. Donaldson must be negotiated elsewhere. The Italians moreover know, that bills drawn from Leghorn, subsequently to the entry of the French, cannot be negotiated in the Leghorn market.

Baring and Co. can have no difficulty with regard to themselves. They are directed to hold the proceeds or value (which they conceive to be equal the intention of the United States) at the disposal of Colonel Humphreys, who directs them to pay $100,000 to the order of Mr. Donaldson, which will be punctually compiled with to the extent of sales and value of what remains under a proper licence. But that zeal which has induced them to follow this business into foreign ports, without any other motive for their so doing, induces them to submit the difficulties which occur with regard to the actual position of Leghorn, a doubt whether the business can be executed from thence at present, and still more, the defalcation which must arise respecting the funds, to the consideration of Mr. King, for his better judgment; and which they trust will serve as an apology for the detail with which they now trouble him.

ALGIERS.

REPORTED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 16, 1797.

Mr. Marshall, from the committee to whom was referred the President’s message of the 9th inst. relative to our affairs with the Dey and regency of Algiers, having considered the same, made the following report:

The further sum of two hundred and fifty-five thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine dollars and three cents, being a balance of nine hundred and ninety-two thousand four hundred and sixty-three dollars and twenty-five cents, not yet paid, will be necessary to carry into effect the treaty with Algiers, agreeably to primary stipulations, including the frigate of thirty-six guns, promised the Dey; that, for the balance of the annuity granted by the said treaty, calculated for two years, at one hundred and forty-four thousand two hundred and forty-six dollars and sixty-three cents, the further sum of ninety-six thousand two hundred and forty-six dollars and sixty-three cents; that for the ten thousand sequins promised the Jew broker by Mr. Donaldson, the sum of eighteen thousand dollars and that, for the expenses of the captives performing quarantine at Marseilles, and transporting them to America, the sum of six thousand dollars will also be necessary making in the whole three hundred and seventy-six thousand eight hundred and five dollars and sixty-six cents, which sum, in the opinion of your committee, ought to be appropriated out of some effective fund, for the purposes aforesaid.

FRANCE.

No. 118.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 19, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

At the opening of the present session of Congress, I mentioned that some circumstances of an unwelcome nature had lately occurred in relation to France; that our trade had suffered, and was suffering, extensive injuries in the West Indies, from the cruisers and agents of the French republic; and that communications had been received from the commerce which interested danger of a further disturbance of our commerce by its authority, and that were, in other respects, far from accelerating the pursuit. It was, I reserved for special message a more particular communication on this interesting subject. This communication I now make.

The complaints of the French minister embraced most of the transactions of our Government in relation to France from an early period of the present year. First, and with reference to the year 1793, required a particular examination of all the transactions of our Government from that time to the present. The other indispensable duties of the office prevented my entering on this examination as early as I had expected, and the result of this examination, I am now, by the direction of the President of the United States, to communicate to you. This history of our affairs you will find supported by documents, many of which were delivered to you at your departure, and the residue will be herewith transmitted.

The discussion on this subject will be confined to facts, you will duly appreciate; and from the whole, joined with your own observations, you will be enabled to answer this of the Senate, and to demonstrate their impartiality as a neutral nation, their fidelity in the observation of treaties, and their friendship as an ally.

The discussion on which I am entering will involve much repetition; for the general questions and particular cases intermixed together in the minister's last note, have been subjects of controversy and correspondence from May, 1793, to this day. Some other points have, indeed, been contended for which the time has now passed without notice. Why they are omitted I know not: for in these cases the United States were as positively charged with violating treaties, as in those which he has been pleased now to detail. Some of them it may be proper to introduce, to render less imperfect the view of our relations to France.

The complaints of the French minister against the United States have reference to three principal subjects:

1st. To the abandonment of their neutral rights, to the injury of France, in not maintaining the pretended principles of the modern law of nations, that free ships make free goods, and that timber and naval stores, for the equipment and armament of vessels, are not contraband of war.

2d. To violations of our treaties with France, even in their letter.

3d. To the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Great Britain; which he alleges "deprives France of all the advantages stipulated in a previous treaty." A fourth complaint is truly ingenious. The fortune of war has constrained some of the belligerent Powers, from enemies, to become her allies; and if the alleged abandonment of the rules of the modern law of nations, in its consequences, works an injury to those alliances, from that circumstance it follows, that the interests of France are injured. Perhaps it will be in time to notice this last charge when those allies themselves complain; if the answer to the first, involving the same principle, should not render such notice altogether unnecessary.

I shall now present to your view those facts and observations which will prove, we conceive, that the minister's complaints are unfounded.

Under the first charge, that we have not maintained, as we ought to have done, our neutral rights, it is alleged:

1st. That the abandonment, that free ships make free goods, is an established principle of the modern law of nations, and that Great Britain, by capturing French property on board our vessels, has violated our neutral rights; and that, unless we compel Great Britain to respect those rights, France will be justified in violating them.

Not to remark on the singular reasoning, that if one warping Power commits an act of injustice towards a neutral and innocent nation, another warping Power may lawfully commit the like injustice, we may ask what authority is adduced to show that the modern law of nations has established the principle, that free ships make free goods? Vattel says positively, "that effects belonging to an enemy found on board a neutral ship are seizable by the rights of war." Agreeably to this long established rule of the laws of nations, France herself, in her maritime laws, has directed that the merchandizes and effects belonging to her enemies, which shall be found on board neutral vessels, shall be good prize. By a former law, indeed, the neutral vessels themselves, as well as the effects of her enemies on board, were declared to be good prize. Vattel remarks, however, that this inconvenience is repaired in many cases by the operation of the law of Sping and Sping; and that, elsewhere, the goods of the enemy were alone subjected to confiscation. And in the treaty of commerce between France and the United States, in 1786, it was stipulated that "all effects, provisions, and merchandise, whatsoever, belonging to her enemies, and found on board the vessels of Hamburg, should be confiscated."

Mr. Adet remarks, that one of his predecessors, in July, 1793, applied on this subject to the Government of the United States, but was unsuccessful. He must refer to Mr. Genet's letter to Mr. Jefferson, dated July 9th, 1793, [The subject was referred in terms very extraordinary in his letter of July 30th, 1793.] to which Mr. Jefferson answered on the 24th, declaring "his belief that it cannot be doubted but that, by the general law of nations, the goods of a friend found in the vessel of an enemy are lawful prize." It is true that sundry nations, desirous of availing themselves of having their vessels stopped at sea, ran sacked, carried into port and detained, under pretense of having enemy goods on board, have, in many instances, violated the special treaties, another principle is altogether the effect of particular treaty, controlling, in special cases, the general principle of the law of nations, and therefore taking effect between such nations only, as have so agreed to control it." And it is plain that it was to avoid the inconveniences resulting from this general rule, that provision was made of nations, that France and the United States should be neutral in all transactions with belligerents, that free ships should give freedom to goods; and that all things should be deemed free which should be found on board the ships belonging to the subjects of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should be neutral to the same extent. The Paris convention was also planned with the idea that a naval war was intended to operate (indeed it was not a naval, but a commercial war), and that the neutral object, and otherwise could have no operation at all) when one of the parties should be at war with a nation or nations with whom the other should be at peace. France, therefore, has now no right to complain if the goods of her enemies find protection on board American ships. The reason thereon, the right of contraband is to be made on such goods: the just equilibrium between her and the United States will be restored when we are at war and she at peace at which time the goods of our enemies will find protection on board the vessels of her citizens.

It is alleged that we have abandoned the modern public law on contraband, and by our treaty with Great Britain and the other belligerent Powers, exercising the rights assured to them by the law of nations, made prize of enemy's property on board neutral vessels, and of contraband goods belonging to neutrals. Eager as neutral nations must be to seize the opportunity, held for them, of making their commerce more secure, to use their military power, it was perfectly natural that the nation should desire to establish a rule as free ships shall make free goods, or, in other words, that neutral bottoms should protect the goods on board, to whosoever these belonged; and it was equally natural that these nations should desire to diminish the list of contraband goods. In respect to the treaty with the French, which was the first treaty of Great Britain with a neutral power, whose dominions, chiefly, the other maritime nations of Europe received supplies of timber and naval stores, to strike these from the list of contraband, or, by some means, to exempt them from capture.

With these dispositions, the Empire of Russia, in February, 1830, made public the principles on which she would maintain the commerce of her subjects. It is necessary here to recite only two of them. 1. That all the effects belonging to subjects of the nations at war should be free on board neutral vessels, contraband goods excepted. 2. That the articles of contraband should be restricted to the 10th and 11th articles of her treaty of commerce with Great Britain, extending to the articles of all the belligerent Powers.

To enforce the observance of these principles, she gave orders for equipping a considerable part of her marine.

In July of the same year, Denmark acceded to the principles of the armed neutrality, and made a convention with Russia for maintaining them. It is apparent, from the terms of the convention with Great Britain, concluded the 11th of July, 1670. In the third article of the convention, it is said: "It is entirely natural that the description of contraband goods in general terms: "Any provisions of war, as soldiers, arms, machines, cannon, ships, or other things of necessary use in war." But the French, in the 18th article, 1670, between Great Britain and Denmark, "to explain the treaty of commerce of 1670 between the Powers," the articles declared contraband are particularly enumerated, and among those we see "timber for ship building, tar, rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and generally whatever serves directly for the equipment of a vessel, unwrought iron and planks, etc. It is remarkable that these are the very articles admitted as contraband in the treaty of commerce. Mr. Adet declares "all the commercial relations between France and the United States are entirely broken."

But it is further to be noticed that this convention between Russia and Denmark, concluded in the midst of the American war, was the principles of its treaty with other European Powers as well as with Great Britain, that the proclamation of the King, in the 9th article, to have been concluded and agreed on, for the time that was to last, though it was to serve as a basis to future engagements which circumstances might render necessary, on account of new naval wars in Europe; and with the latter view, the King declared "that no interposition of the neutral Powers. He therefore was urgent that the Empire, with all the parties to the maritime convention, "should propose to the belligerent Powers the establishment of a Congress, in which the different concerns, both of the Powers at war and of the Neutral Powers, shall be examined and terminated. And these concerns be the "pacification, and the manner of giving a permanent code of laws," objects truly important, and merits the whole solicitude manifested on the occasion by the King.

But these steps of the King of Sweden serve as additional proofs that the principles of the armed neutrality were not considered by the belligerents, or by the existing by the law of nations of nations. For, permanently to establish those assumed principles, by introducing them into a maritime code, was obviously the influential motive with the King for desiring a Congress, at which such a code might be settled with the assent of all the nations of Europe. But this project did not succeed; nor was commerce made peace at different periods; and with that war ended the maritime convention. This, no nation has reason to regret that the King, on our own, as well because the principles in question respect some very valuable portions of our exports, as because our disposition and our policy preserving us in peace, such an extended liberty of commerce would produce highly advantageous to us as a country. Nor, as the Powers at war were very well conscious that the law of nations, the marine laws of France, her own treaties, as well as those of Sweden, Denmark, and Russia, and the influence of the sovereigns of all other nations, and even the system of the armed neutrality,contestably establish these principles, that enumerated goods on board of neutral vessels are rightful subjects of capture, as well as that timber and other articles for the equipment of vessels, are contraband of war; and, therefore, that the admission of these principles in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, not being a grant to her of any right (for in what sense could we be said to give what she before possessed?) furnishes no just ground of offence to France. But if the United States, at a future time, should desire to return to her? Or how are we chargeable with "partiality in favor of England," because we do not take up arms to compel her to respect it? But Mr. Adet, still resting on the idea that, to compel Great Britain to renounce, is to grant her a right, seems to imagine that we shall attempt to have, by either of the means the King has suggested by saying "that France, having the right, by her treaty with Great Britain, to enjoy all the advantages in commerce and navigation, which the United States have granted to the other neutral Powers, is not, by the stipulations of the treaty of 1794, (with Great Britain) relative to commerce and navigation, by the testamentary bequests by which he refers to has no relations as they become common to her." But we shall assuredly lose no particular favor to Great Britain, or to any other nation, in respect to commerce and navigation, we readily admit that, by this article, France would be immediately entitled to the same rights in navigation. But, in regard to contraband of war, we have granted nothing, and, therefore, under that article, France can claim nothing.

FRANCE.

Under the influence of present and temporary interests, the very nature of the stipulations between France and the United States, on the subject of free commerce and the navigation of the seas, made it difficult for the contracting parties, to look for the basis of their treaty "the most perfect equality and reciprocity." Would they then conspire to their own hurt? Would they voluntarily and mutually stipulate for injuries? Or for advantages? Certainly the latter; and in fact the agreement was expressly advantageous which secured to each, in its turn, the freedom of commerce provided by the rules that free ships should make free goods and that timber and naval stores should be excluded from the list of contraband.

Connected with this subject is what concerns the articles of provisions. Mr. Adet says, "after having assured to the United States, the same free commerce with other Governments, as the United States enjoyed with England, the treaty, in a word, it desired to have commerce only with England. Thus it stipulates, by the 18th article, that the American vessels laden with grain may be seized under the frivolous pretext that it is extremely difficult to define the cases wherein provisions would be generally excepted, could be classed in the list of contraband of war.

There are so many extraordinary and ambiguous expressions in Adet's notes, in the above paragraph, that "the American vessels laden with grain may be seized under the frivolous pretext that it is extremely difficult to define the cases wherein provisions would be generally excepted, could be classed in the list of contraband of war." The Federal Government is constituted of the citizens who have a common interest with their fellow-citizens of the United States. That common interest has a peculiar relation to commerce, on the freedom and extension of which their general prosperity and the public happiness depend. Will it then be believed that the Government wished this commerce to be restrained, particularly the commerce in which the United States are at all times the valuable part of our exports? Especially, will it be believed that the Government desired that our citizens might have commerce only with England.

Let the general sense of our fellow-citizens answer these charges. Let the great mass of our commercial men lead an example and they whose enterprise traverses the seas, and great in the globe, to extend their gainful trade; citizens whose commercial adventures to France and her colonies have annually raised to many millions; adventures by which many have hazarded their credit and their fortunes. Yet, among all our citizens, there has been more solicitude to form a commercial treaty with Britain; none more decided in approving that which has been made.

For the reasoning of our own Government on this subject, I beg leave to refer you to my letter of September 19, 1797, written, by the President's direction, to Mr. Monroe. Therein it was attempted to show the necessity and our right to make a treaty with that nation. I hope it will appear to you that the conclusion is there fairly drawn; that even the 18th article, as respects provisions, would open the Favourable engagements.

Before the treaty with Great Britain, her cruisers captured neutral vessels bound to France with provisions. She agreed, in certain cases, provisions were contraband of war; consequently, that she might lawfully capture and confiscate such provisions, she directs the principle and constitutes the laws on that subject. In this dilemma, it was agreed by the treaty, that, whenever provisions, becoming contraband by the law of nations, should be captured, they should be paid for with a reasonable mercantile profit. This stipulation, without admitting the right of a nation to confiscate the goods of a neutral in case of capture, would certainly tend to promote, rather than to discourage, adventures in provisions to France.

But as this treaty has been the subject of serious complaint on the part of France, it is important to inquire with what force of reason the complaint is made.

I might pass over the unworthy insinuations of the minister, that the treaty was entered into by us, in order to ensure advantages to the English, and to furnish our own Government with a reply to the claims of France, and peremptory motives for refusal to adhere to them; that the true object of the negotiation was inessentially disguised under the specious pretences, and covered with the veil of dissimulation. These insinuations have been indiscriminately addressed to the people of the United States. They will gain no belief. It may, however, be useful for you to be truly informed on this subject.

The President's message to the Senate, on the 16th of April, 1793, does not declare (as Mr. Adet asserts) "that Mr. Jay desired to make the treaty of the Union and the wrongs.

The President says that Mr. Jay's mission would announce to the world "a solicitude for a friendly adjustment of all the differences which had so long dis-arranged from the United States, such an envoy would carry with him a full knowledge of the existing temper and sensibility of our country, and be thus to vindicate our rights with firmness, and to cultivate peace with sincerity." And shall the partisans of either of these objects be denied to us? What were our counsellors? The most urgent regarded the spoliations on our commerce, and the inexecution of the article of the treaty of peace respecting the posts. With the latter was connected the Indian war, with which we had been harassed for so many years; and with the former, the injury or ruina of our merchants, and the consequent extensive damage to agriculture. These being the most prominent objects of our countrymen, of course, must be attended and without them the mission probably would not, at that time, have been contemplated. But had we no other "complaints? Did not the impression of our seamen, like the spoliations on our commerce, excite an universal complaint?

Mr. Jay, to be sure, did not object to British vessels having a commercial treaty? Was it not even a subject of complaint and reproach? Was not the inducing her to enter into such a treaty measures agitated in Congress? Had not a commercial treaty with Great Britain been earnestly sought for from the outset of his mission, and war to the time of Mr. Jay's mission? How, also, could Mr. Jay, after adjusting the primary principles of his mission, have omitted to insist on objects of his mission, better calculated to improve the state of our commerce, than by forming arrangements calculated to extend and protect our trade, to promote good neighborhood; or a friendly and mutually beneficial intercourse; by prescribing a previous demand of justice and satisfaction to basty reprisals, which naturally leads to an agreement on other regulations, to prevent disputes, or to adjust them when they should arise? All these objects, then, and whatever else would be the means of "cultivating peace," were clearly comprehended in the President's message.

But Mr. Adet says, "that Mr. Jay's negotiation was enveloped from its origin in the shadow of mystery." And to whom was our Government bound to unveil it? To France, or to her minister? Mr. Adet should answer, or not have complained. And was it for this, to make us dependent on the French empire, that our alliance was formed? Did we stipulate to submit the exercise of our sovereignty (if it is not a contradiction in terms) to the direct interference of the Government of France? Let the treaty itself furnish the answer.

The essential and direct end of the present defensive alliance is, to maintain the liberty of the United States and the liberty and security of the American states in the seas, unimpaired, of the said United States; as well in matters of Government as of commerce." So, likewise, the treaty of amity and commerce, in its preamble, declares that His Most Christian Majesty and the United States, wishing to fix regulations which might be obtained in the most perfect equality and reciprocity, and reserving, withal, to each party the liberty of admitting at its pleasure other nations to a participation of the same advantage.

Corresponding with this declaration in our treaty of amity and commerce with France, is the declaration of the 35th article, that "the representatives of the United States, in France, are the ambassador, or the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, in France, have received express orders to make the following declaration to the court of London:"

The United States of North America, who are in full possession of independence, as pronounced by them on the 4th of July, 1776, and having proposed to the King to consolidate, by a formal convention, the connection begun to be established between the United States, and the representatives of the United States have signed a treaty of friendship and commerce, designed to serve as a foundation for their mutual good correspondence.

His Majesty being determined to cultivate the good understanding subsisting between France and Great Britain, by every means in his power, thinks it necessary to make this proceeding known to the court of London, and to declare, at the same time, that the contracting parties have paid great attention not to stipulate any exclusive advantages in favor of the French nation, and that the United States have reserved the liberty of treaty with every nation whatever, upon the same footing of equality and reciprocity." Why, after all this, do we hear from Mr. Adet the complaint, that the negotiations of the British treaty were secretly conducted? In other words, that, in exercising their absolute and unlimited rights of "government and commerce," the United States did not lay open to the French minister, or his Government, the instructions to our envoy, for securing this object, nor guard against the views of our commercial and fiscal required; a communication was made to the French minister. He was officially informed "that Mr. Jay was instructed not to weaken our engagements to France." This instruction was obeyed; Mr. Jay having taken care to insert, in the 59th article of the treaty, this explicit stipulation: that "nothing in this treaty contained shall be construed as an indulgence of privileges or advantages, or a cession of our sovereignty, with the French Republic, to persons injured by the violation of the treaty by the Powers, it having been committed under a treaty with France, or the refusal to receive our emissaries, if they be duly authorized, or the refusal of the United States to open the ports of Italy."

The Government gave a further proof of its candor and friendship, by communicating to the French minister the treaty itself, prior to its ratification, "in order to enable him to make such observations thereon as he might judge proper." The minister communicated it to Mr. Adet, a letter of the 10th of April, of 1795, and the refutation of his objections in the Secretary's answer, dated the 6th of July following.

With these facts in view, facts of which the chief are drawn from our treaties with France, and from her own acts and laws, what opinion is to be formed of Mr. Adet's declaration, "that the executive directory regards the treaty, by which the French nation is excluded with a violation as a violation of the treaty made with France, in 1778, and equivalent to a treaty of alliance with Great Britain?"

I will now advert to the charge, "that, far from offering the French the succors which friendship might have been given without compromising it, the American Government, in this respect, violated the letter of the treaty." As far as I can at war with France, shall not fix their ships in the ports of the United States.

1st. That such prizes are not to be arrested or seized when they enter the ports of the United States.

2d. That the officers of the United States shall not make any examination concerning the lawfulness of such prizes, but,

3d. That they may hoist sail at any time, and depart, and carry their prizes to the places expressed in their commissions.

4th. That, on the contrary, no shelter or refuge shall be given, in the ports of the United States, to such as shall have made prize of the subjects, people, or property, of France; but if such shall come in, be forced by stress of weather, or the danger of the sea, all proper means shall be vigorously used that they go out, and retire thence as soon as possible.

It will also be convenient here to notice the stipulations contained in the twenty-second article. These are:

1st. That foreign privateers, not belonging to French subjects or citizens, having commissions from any other Power which the United States have at war with France, shall not fix their ships in the ports of the United States.

2d. That they shall not sell their prizes, nor in any other manner exchange their ships, merchandises, or any other lading.

3d. That the United States shall not purchase victuals, except such as shall be necessary for their going to the nearest part of the Prince or State which granted the commission.

The cases that have occurred in the course of the present war, in relation to our treaty with France, particularly the seventeenth and twenty-second articles just mentioned, have led to numerous discussions, in which several points have been deliberately settled, either by legislative or executive acts, or by judicial decisions.

The first important executive act was the proclamation of neutrality by the President of the United States.

This was signed on the 4th of April, 1793.

At the next meeting of Congress, on the 3d of December, 1795, the President laid this proclamation before both Houses. The Senate, in their address in answer to the President's speech, thus express their opinion of the proclamation:

"We deem it a measure well-timed and wise; manifesting a watchful solicitude for the welfare of the nation, and calculated to promote it."

The address of the House of Representatives was unanimously agreed to. We read in it this paragraph: "The United States having taken no part in the war which had embraced, in Europe, the Powers with whom they have the most extensive relations, the maintenance of peace was justly to be regarded as one of the most important duties of government, with the preservation of the same; and the restoration of peace, and the promotion of commerce, and the extension of friendship, and the vindication of the rights, and the maintenance of the honor of the United States, have been the objects of the measure which the President has adopted."

The next executive act, noticed by Mr. Adet, is the letter of the 4th of August, 1795, written, by the President's command, by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the collectors of the customs, and accompanied by the rules by which the President had adopted for preventing all armaments in favor of any of the belligerent Powers. These rules were considered as just and necessary deductions from the laws of neutrality, established and received among nations. The letter from the Secretary of the Treasury is explanatory of these rules, and, among other instructions, particularly points the collectors to the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of our treaty with France; lest, by inadvertence, or misconception of them, she might be injured, and her enemies benefited. The letter concludes with an explicit direction to execute them with the utmost anxiety, "because omissions would tend to expose the Government to injuries insinuations and suspicions, and proportionately to commit the good faith and peace of the country."

How could such rules, with such reasons to enforce them, not equal justice?

They were framed and required to be executed with strict impartiality, and, consequently, were to prevent Frenchmen from continuing those agressions on our sovereignty, neutrality, which had been committed under Mr. Genet's orders, and which were calculated to involve us in a war with Britain, Spain, and Holland: for, at that time, these were all combined against France. Frenchmen were to have no other privileges than those secured to them by treaty, (except that they were not forbidden to sail under our prizes in our ports) and our own citizens were to be restrained from committing hostilities under the banners of France, as well as those of other Powers.

The third offensive act was the President's submitting to Congress these measures, and suggesting the expediency of extending our legal code, giving competent jurisdiction to the courts, and providing adequate penalties to prevent or punish violations of the laws of nations.

The next complaint respects the act of Congress passed on the 9th of June, 1794, "for the punishment of certain crimes; and also for the protection of the United States against those to which their attention had been called by the letters of the President of France from the 30th of May, 1794.

Mr. Adet asks, "What was its result?" And gives, himself, the following answer: "In consequence of this law, the greater part of the French privateers have been arrested, as well as their prizes; not upon formal depositions; not upon an established testimony, not upon a necessary body of proofs, but upon the simple information of the counsel of one of the Powers, having with the French republic, frequently upon that of sailors of the enemy Powers, sometimes according to the orders of the Governors, but often upon the demand of the district attorneys, who assert, upon principles avowed by the Government, that their conviction was sufficient to authorize them, without complaint or regular information, to cause the privates to be prosecuted in virtue of the law above mentioned." And "when the ministers of the republic have asked for justice of the Government, for the vexations experienced by the privateers, in contempt of the 17th article of the treaty, they have never been able to obtain satisfaction."

Judging only by these declarations of Mr. Adet, a stranger would imagine there had been a combination of the Governments of France and the United States to torment the French privateers, and do them injuries in the way of prize and damages. But our own citizens place a different estimate on this impeachment of their President, their Senators, and Representatives in Congress, their Judges, and other public officers; and an examination of the cases cited by Mr. Adet to support his statement will manifest its fallacy.

First case. The French privateer Sans Pareil and her prize the Perseverance.

On the 26th August, 1794, Mr. Fauchet complained that the prize had been seized on the pretext that the Sans Pareil was armed purpously to prey on commerce. The answer of September 3d, from the Secretary of State, which Mr. Adet censure as " indicative of delay," assured him that the Secretary had urged the Governor of Rhode Island to set the circumstances of the case without delay. On the 27th of December the Secretary informed Mr. Fauchet, that the Governor had decided that the prize should be restored. On the 17th of October Mr. Fauchet renewed his complaint, for on the suit of the claimant the prize had again been arrested. The Secretary referred the claimant to the State authorities. But on the 24th, with information that ought to have satisfied Mr. Fauchet: for, admitting that, agreeably to the law of the 5th of June, 1794, the courts had jurisdiction, and were bound in duty to take cognizance of captures made within the jurisdiction of the United States, or by privateers illegally fitted out in their ports (the right of doing which Mr. Fauchet did not contest) they could not refuse it if the facts of the case, and the circumstances against which the claimant's complaint is being the judgment for cost and damages to which an unjust prosecutor is exposed. The circular letter written on this occasion to the Governors of the States manifests the solicitude of our Government to prevent vexatious suits.

By the copy of the proceedings in the Supreme Court of the United States, in this case, you will see that the court did not, as stated by Mr. Adet, determine that "the tribunals could decide whether a prize belonged to enemies or to neutrals." The question before the court was of the cognizance of a captured vessel and cargo, the former the property of a Swede, and the latter belonging partly to some Swedes, and partly to a citizen of the United States. It was held, therefore, that the Supreme Court, exercised jurisdiction, applied to the case in which one of the claimants was a citizen of the United States. And after solemn argument, the court decided "that the district court of Maryland had jurisdiction, and should accordingly proceed to determine upon this case agreeably to law and right."

I will add only one more remark: That the 17th article, the letter of which we are charged of violating, in substance, is not so much as a penalty as a "delay," as the words are translated: "the time occupied in the examination concerning the lawfulness of such prizes?" and it is the "examination concerning the lawfulness of such prizes" which the article forbids. But no examination of such prizes has been attempted by our Government or tribunalns, unless on clear evidence, or reasonable presumption, that the captures were made in circumstances which amounted to a violation of our sovereignty and territorial rights.

Third case. The French privateer L'Ami de la Point a Petre, Captain William Talbot, and her Dutch prize the Vrouw Christina Magdalena.

To the information contained in the papers collected in this case I have to add, that this cause was finally decided in favor of the American claimant in 1795. The court, unequivocally of opinion that, in the particular circumstances of Talbott's case, notwithstanding his French commission, and his taking an oath of allegiance to the French republic, he continued to be a citizen of the United States. But the cause, as I informed, did not appear to have been decided in accordance with the principle that "claim is to be made either to the States General of the Commonwealth of Liberté, which had been fitted out in the United States, and had no right to claim to the prizes," and in fact Talbot and his crew, taken together as consorts; and in fact it was Ballard's vessel that took the prize; Talbot not coming up till an hour after the capture. Ballard was afterwards tried before the circuit court for piracy.

The court, in its judgment, held that the prize Talbot's vessel was owned by citizens of the United States, to whom the prize money would eventually find its way in case of restitution to the captors.

Ballard and Talbot were both citizens of Virginia. The attempt of the latter to become a French citizen was considered to be fraudulent, being made for the sole purpose of obtaining a commission, under color of which he might plunder the nations with whom the United States were at peace.

An observation ought not to be omitted here, that, although the captors, Talbot and others, had been defeated both in the district and circuit courts, yet they carried the cause up to the supreme court: thus using the legal right of appeal. In the case of the United States v. the brigantines, mentioned in the above article, the subjects of Powers who were enemies to France, has formed a principal subject of Mr. Fauchet's and Mr. Adet's complaints.

4th. Under the head of complaints for vexatious prosecutions, Mr. Adet mentions only two cases in which damages and interest were allowed to the French captors, viz. one of la Nuestra Senora del Carmen, at Rhode Island, and the other of la Princesse des Asturies, at New York. "Yet (says he) the tribunals have always allowed damages from 5 to 25 per cent. on the prizes illegally taken, in the case of facts which will warrant the taking away from the claimant, I am not possessed of documents to determine. I presume it is to be understood in a general sense only, and is not intended to exempt him from every exception. And in this sense there will be no difficulty in admitting the truth of the assertion, and in cases of the legality of the captures, in which the tribunals either decided in favor of the claimant, or allowed damages.

The last decision was confirmed by the Supreme Court, and without damages, insomuch as the testimony was considered to be so ambiguous as to prove nothing.

The same remarks apply to the prize of the privateer General Lecourzus, with this addition, that one of the judges dissented from the opinion of the court, being firmly of opinion that this privateer was covered American property.

The privateer la Parisienne had been registered as an American coasting vessel, under the name of the Hauck. During the embargo, in the spring of 1794, she slipped out of Charleston, and went to Port de Paix; where she was sold to one Biocho, a Frenchman, who armed her and provided her with a commission. Having afterwards arrived at Charleston, and cruised all along the coast of the United States, she was taken by a British privateer, under the pretence of her being a foreign vessel, whilst she was in the legal predicament of a coaster. The district court condemned her; but, on the application of Biocho to have her restored on paying the appraised value, the judge permitted him to take her in a state of warlike possession. Afterwards, the district court awarded two valuable British prizes, the brigantines Cesar and Favorite. On their arrival, the one at Charleston, the other at Savannah, the claimants were convicted of being accessories in the restitution, as having been captured by an illegal prosecutor. The decrees of the courts were in favor of the captors, but without damages. The supreme court disapproved of the restitution of the privateer without dismantling her; but the payment of damages. All the other cases of captures by French privateers, which have been brought up to the supreme court, were decided against the claimants. In none of these cases would not have warranted an award of damages, in others the counsel for the captors omitted to ask for them. When you read the cases cited, you will see that the discretion of the court to grant or refuse them; this discretion being regulated by all the circumstances of each case. Hence, when a party is drawn before the court without good cause and vexatiously, damages are always given; but are denied when there appears a reasonable cause of controversy.
5th. Mr. Adet having briefly noticed several cases by name, seems to reserve those of the Vengeance and the Casius for a full display of unwarrantable conduct in the Government and courts of the United States, and therefore descants on them at some length, but with so many aberrations from the facts, with so many erroneous ideas concerning the jurisprudence, and so many injurious insinuations into the courts and their officers, it will be necessary that you should learn the true history of these cases from authentic documents.

Case of the French Privateer la Vengeance.

For the full history of this privateer and her prize, I must refer you to the documents in the case. The principal facts are thus briefly stated: In August, 1794, the Spanish privateer la Vengeance, having arrived at New York with a valuable Spanish prize called the Princessa de las Astorias. Don Diego Pintado, the owner, commenced a suit for his vessel, on the ground that she had been taken by an illegal privateer. The suit was instituted by Mr. Troop, not wanting, but upon information which was afterwards verified by the oaths of several witnesses. In the progress of the case, it appeared that the witnesses produced on behalf of the captors, for whom a decree was finally given, the clashing ideas, of the judge's opinion, in favor of the captors; but he expressly declared that there was probable cause for the seizure.

Mr. Adet having been pleased to license the court, the district attorney, in his official capacity, of a violation of law on the part of the privateer la Vengeance, in consequence of which a Spanish subject had been injured. Mr. Harrison, upon an inquiry, found at least a probability that the complaint respecting the privateer was true. This probability arose from what he considered as affording the certainty of a violation of law and contrary to the treaties of Commerce between the United States and Spain, and to the progress forbidding the arming of privateers in our ports. The decision of this and of the prize cause depended on the same evidence. The decision being in favor of the captors, Mr. Harrison acquiesced in it as it respected the privateer; and he united, with his associate counsel in the prize cause in advising the like subservience; both the Spanish consuls deemed it his duty to pursue the case to the court in the last resort. This can warrant no complaint: for Mr. Harrison remarks, that perhaps there never were causes in which more contradictory and irreconcilable evidence was offered, and in which the minds of the auditors were more divided as to the real state of facts. The evidence against the privateer was for the most part conclusively proved, but there was no evidence when such exportation was prohibited by law. The evidence which appeared in the other causes gave rise to this prosecution; and upon the trial the judge condemned the privateer. An appeal from this sentence was interposed by the French consuls. The appeal was heard in the circuit court, and upon new evidence the sentence of the district court was reversed.

Mr. Adet complains that, while one suit was pending for the prize, and another against the privateer, the attorney-general should have exhibited a second information against the privateer, on which he was arrested anew, for having excepted himself from the law in violation of the treaty between the United States and Spain; and that this information was filed on the simple declaration of Mr. Giles, the marshal of the court, who, as informer, was to share part of the confiscation. As Mr. Harrison remarks, it was in favor of the privateer that this second information was filed while the first was pending, because it saved time. He had postponed the latter until the first had been decided, there might have been some foundation for a charge of unnecessary delay. Mr. Harrison's state of the case shows that this second information was not made on the declaration of the marshal, but on the evidence that appeared on the examination of the first.

Mr. Adet having been pleased to license the court, the clerk, and marshal, of the district court of New York, I have taken the liberty to transmit to you the other documents in this case, the letters of Mr. Harrison and Mr. Troop. They will answer the double purpose of justifying them, and of vindicating our Government and tribunals.

Mr. Adet particularly notices the papers he had received from St. Domingo, "proving," as he says, "in the most convincing manner, that the Vengeance (la Vengeance) had arrived at Port de Paix without any armament or equipment whatever; that she had been sold, armed and equipped wholly, and commissioned as a privateer, on the territory of the republic. These documents were certificates of the general, the ordonnateur, and of the greater part of the principal officers of St. Domingo, &c. He has also produced a copy of the ordinance of Governor Leveaux, of October 1795, to Mr. Harrison, that these papers were sent to him, and by his answer of October 3d, that he received the same with the most perfect satisfaction. The bill of sale (one of the papers) was produced to the court, in behalf of the claimant of the privateer, but that certificate of General Leveaux could not be considered as evidence in the cause; and if it had been admitted, "the claimant would be very cautious of producing it, on account of its differing from the witnesses."76

6th. Case of the French privateer le Casius.

For the full history of this case, I must also refer you to the documents, and here only present you with a concise statement.

The Casius, under the name of les Juneaux, was fitted and armed for a vessel of war in the port of Philadelphia, in violation of the law of the United States in December. This was ordered to be taken, and the militia of the State of Delaware to intercept her. The attempt was made, and failed—the crew of les Juneaux, which was unexpectedly found to be very numerous, resisted the officers who went on board, manned their cannon, and brought them to bear on the cutter in which the militia (about forty in number) were embarked. Their force being inadequate to the entrance, they were obliged, with an intention to return the attack, to give up the siege. They did so but les Juneaux had sailed and gone to sea. The agent Mr. Guenet, by whom les Juneaux had been fitted out, was tried in the circuit court at Philadelphia, convicted of the offense, and received sentence of fine and imprisonment.

It appears that Mr. Adet succeeded on behalf of Mr. St. Domingo. Samuel B. Davis, a citizen of the United States, took the command of her, with a commission from the French Government. Davis probably sailed from Philadelphia in les Juneaux for the purpose of finally taking the command of her. Her name was now changed to le Casius; and on a cruise welcomed the clashing of the gun, and the cry, "le Casius! le Casius!" was heard by Mr. Ketland, who purchased an interest in her after her sailing. The schooner and her cargo were condemned as prize at St. Domingo. In August, 1795, Captain Davis, commanding le Casius, came with her to Philadelphia. She was immediately known. Mr. Yard, with a view of obtaining an indemnification for the loss of the schooner and her cargo, instituted a suit in the district court, to which the captors were arrested. Soon after, the Supreme Court being in session, Captain Davis's counsel applied for and obtained a prohibition to the district court, to stop its proceeding by which the suits both against him and le Casius were defeated. The prohibition was granted on this principle: that the district court might not deprive the jury of the jurisdiction of France, for adjudication, by French vessels, and all questions incidental to it, belong exclusively to the French tribunals: and consequently that its vessel, of war, and their officers, might not be liable to the process of our courts, predicated upon such capture and subsequent proceeding within the jurisdiction of the French Government. Mr. Ketland having purchased an interest in the vessel, and obtained his commission from the French Government, to obtain information of Mr. Ketland, to be issued from the circuit court, by which le Casius was attached as a vessel armed and equipped as a ship of war in the port of Philadelphia, with intent to cruise and commit hostilities against nations without the formality of a declaration of war. Mr. Adet complained that the process was taken out of the circuit court; because, as he alleged, it had no jurisdiction, and that it would be attended with delay, that court sitting but twice a year; whereas, the district court, in which it was said the prosecution (if at all permitted) should have been commenced, was always open. I consulted gentlemen of legal knowledge on the point of jurisdiction in this case, and they were decided in their opinion that the circuit court had jurisdiction, and exclusively of the district court. You will see, also, in Mr. Rawle’s statement of this case, that this opinion was adopted and supported by two gentlemen of eminence at the bar; you will further see, in that statement, that the Government of the United States had no part in originating the controversy; that we prepared the cause for trial, and on a plea calculated to defeat the prosecution. At length, in October term, 1796, the cause was brought to a hearing. In the course of the argument, the question of jurisdiction presented itself. The argument followed the following line: In November, 1797, I had received notice of this event, (on the 19th of October last) I wrote to Mr. Adet, informing him that le Casius remained in the custody of the marshal, but ready to be delivered to his order. To this no answer was returned; but he mentions the matter in the note subjuncted to his notes of the 15th November, intimating that the United States were not answerable, in this case, for a violation of treaties and for the damages the Casius had sustained. Here the affair rests.
FRANCE.

In his letter of the 3d of June, 1796, which you will find among the papers, respecting the Casius, Mr. Adet mentioned the affair of the Favorito, which he states as an idea that the Executive might, in like manner, leant against le Casius to cease. But the proceedings in the case of the Favorito were wholly in the hands of the executive officers, who were under the President’s immediate control, and to whom, on evidence satisfactory to the Executive, orders were given to discontinue the process. In this affair of the Favorito, we are not aware that we had anything to do with it, and after this note of the President’s letters that he would cease the process; which is just what the affair of the Favorito was in the court. You will observe, in Mr. Fauchet’s letter of the 23d of September, 1794, a very formidable complaint, in this affair of the Favorito—that it was pretended that a privateer, fitted for a cruise, had deposited arms on board her, and that this pretense was used for visiting and pillaging her: that she was a ship of war of the republic, then serving as a store ship until she could be repaired: that the sovereignty of France was violated, and her flag insulted. Yet, by the letter of John Lamb, Esq. collector of the port of New York, of the 23d of November, 1794, you will see that it, at the time the seizure was made of the suspected vessels, “she being totally dismasted, her crew sent on board other ships of war, and her sails, rigging, and other materials, sold at public auction, she was considered as a holly otherwise, the event would have not taken place.” The collector further declares that the charge of pulling down the national flag, and hoisting another in its place, was groundless.

The cases in question, mentioned by Mr. Adet, in which French privateers and their prizes have been brought under the cognizance of our courts of justice, and first, all, to which an answer can be directed. Had he cited the other cases, which, he says, would fill a volume, we have no doubt there would be found in them, in those which have been mentioned, abundant reason to justify the Government and the tribunals.

Mr. Adams’s arguments are not confined to imputations of injustice experienced by French privateers and their prizes from our courts.

First, he protests against the violation of the 17th article of the treaty, in contempt of which the American tribunals have taken cognizance of the validity of prizes made by French ships of war or privateers, under pretext of the capture of a French ship, or of a part of the cargo, as a violation of the 17th article of the treaty. But his predecessor, Mr. Fauchet,* after saying that our admiralty courts interfered in prize cases, on the ground of “seizure within the jurisdictional line of the United States, or of armament, or augmentation of armament, of the capturing vessels in their ports,” immediately adds, “on this subject, sir, you request me to specify to you a circumstance in which a prize was arrested, which did not constitute a rule that armament, and you take the trouble to establish that they have a right to intervene in every case that can be brought under those heads. In the first place, sir, I never have, at least to my recollection, contested the right of your courts, or of the Government of the United States, to pronounce the title of property, in each and every case, in which there might have been brought into those trials, which do not belong to them.” He then says that he could cite a great number of affairs to which he alludes, but contents himself with mentioning only two. The first is the case of Talbot, of which I have already given some details, and which, with the documents referred to, will show this to have been the case of the last 17th article, of which your citizens, of Marcy, seises, also already mentioned, and which will not justify a complaint; for, although the final decision was in favor of the privateer, yet the sentence of the district court was not reversed in the circuit court, but upon the introduction of the testimony and the supreme court allowed no damages, because the testimony was so ambiguous as to justify the decision.

But quitting the contradictory declarations of the French ministers, and referring you to the letter dated August 16th, 1793, from the Secretary of State to our minister at Paris, (which has been published) for the reasoning of Mr. Adams, I come to their right of violating our laws and the effect of the belligerent powers arming their vessels in our ports, consequently to restore to their proper owners, prizes taken and brought in by vessels so unlawfully armed, or when taken within our line of jurisdiction, I will only add here, that the principle of the rules on this subject, first adopted by the President on the most mature deliberation, and then sanctioned by the 5th of September, 1793, the rules which had influence in the proceedings, in the prize causes in question. If, then, the 17th article of the French treaty has been violated, this, no American citizen will be inclined to believe; and we might suppose, that the consideration of such controversies by the courts of the United States, is not the act of an enemy, of which the Federal Courts, have all deliberately concurred in the violation. Neither the rules adopted by the President, nor the act of Congress, have made a new law respecting such prizes: they have only directed the modes of proceeding to fill our neutral duties, agreeably to the universal law of nations. The judges have applied this law; but not without due attention to the obligations of our treaties, which they regard as supreme laws of the land.
